We do not know how hard the Secretary of State fought in the Cabinet committee, but we know that he has lost every battle down the line. The leaks that I have established from journalists are undoubtedly authentic— [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] The Secretary of State is entitled to deny any of the points that I am about to make, and I look forward to hearing whether he denies any of them. From these leaks it is clear that the state earnings-related pension scheme, which would have doubled pensions in real terms by 1998, is to be abolished, with the result that at least 2 million pensioners will remain in means-tested poverty. All the supplementary benefit additional payment for diet and heating are to be abolished, including the £5 heating allowance for the over-85s, and all the supplementary benefit single payments for clothing and furniture are to be ended. Housing benefit, which has already been cut by this Government by £200 million, is now to be cut by up to a further £2,000 million, which will literally double the rents of hundreds of thousands of occupational pensioners and low-paid families.

Supplementary benefit mortgage interest payments are to be abolished for the poorest families struggling to buy a house, which can only have the effect of forcing thousands of unemployed claimants and one-parent families out of their homes and on to the streets. There can be no other consequence of that action. Unemployment benefit, which has already been taxed by the Government, and where the earnings-related supplement has already been abolished, at an average loss to the unemployed of £16 a week, is now to be reduced from 12 to six months, although 1·25 million claimants have already been deprived of it because they have been unemployed for more than a year.

Sixteen to 18-year-olds are now to be denied supplementary benefit in order to conscript them on to youth training schemes, even though the employers are opposed to the idea because they do not want to train reluctant trainees. The death grant is to be axed, the maternity grant is to be axed — except for the very poorest — and the maternity allowance is to be means-tested for the first time. Family income supplement is to be ended and replaced by family credits, which will reduce the benefit for many families by up to £10 a week and transfer the benefit from the wife to the husband.

This is not a review of the welfare state. It is a massacre of the welfare state. It represents the ending of the principle of entitlement, it represents an intensification of poverty on an unprecedented scale, and it represents a deterioration back to the means-test state of the 1930s. This is not a new Beveridge. These reviews represent the revival of the mass unemployment, mass poverty and mass dependence on means-tested benefits from which the Beveridge report was intended to rescue this country. It is not a radical reconstruction of the welfare state that is about to be carried through by the Government. It is a radical dismantling of the welfare state. It is the new poor law.

Nowhere is that more unmistakable than in the Government's plan to axe the state earnings-related pension scheme, and nowhere is it more dishonest or cynical. On 20 May 1983, conveniently just a few days before the last general election, the Prime Minister gave a solemn and binding pledge in a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John), when she said:

> "Nor are there any plans to change the earnings-related component of the state pension."

That pledge is now being betrayed.

No less binding, however, was the pledge give by the Secretary of State, when he said:

> "My aim in setting up an inquiry is not to call into question the fundamental pensions structure that was established in the 1970s with all-party agreement, and to which I was a party." —[Official Report, 23 November 1983; Vol. 49, c. 360.]

[Mr. Meacher]

I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman nods his assent. How he can renege on such a clear and unequivocal promise without resigning, I do not know.

The arguments that the Government have given for the abolition of the scheme simply do not hold water. They claim that the scheme cannot be afforded because of the growing number of pensions. The truth is that that number will fall steadily over the years into the next century. The worker-pensioner ratio will improve over the next 30 years. The Government's independent adviser, the Social Security Advisory Committee, recently said:

"At this distance in time we do not think there can be solid grounds for altering the scheme now for fear of all the worst outcomes occurring steadily for 40 years."

The scheme could only not be afforded if economic stagnation continued uninterruptedly for the next 40 years. Perhaps, for all I know, that, privately, is the expectation in the minds of some Ministers. It is not consistent for the Secretary of State, when he is trying to convince the nation of the burden of pensions, to assume, as he did in his recent paper "Population, pension costs and pensioners' incomes", an economic growth rate of 1·5 per cent. a year, while at the same time — the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he wants to preen himself, as he so often does, on the Government's economic success, speaks, as he did on 31 January and in the Budget debate, of growth "continuing at 3 per cent. a year". — [Official Report, 31 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 499.]

That is simply not consistent.

The truth is that the Government want to destroy Labour's state earnings-related pension scheme—which I repeat, is the best deal that pensioners have ever had — because of the Prime Minister's obsession with increasing the private sector and limiting the role of the state. As the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle)—I am glad that he is present—has rightly pointed out, those on low incomes, who predominate in the state earnings-related pension scheme, are precisely those who are least able to make adequate provision for themselves in the private sector. Indeed, I go further than the hon. Gentleman. The state earnings-related pension scheme came into being in the 1970s precisely because of the failure of the private sector in the 1950s and the 1960s to provide pensions above the poverty line for over half the population.

This act of ideological vandalism against the state earnings-related pension scheme ignores the fact that the state pension scheme is inherently better than any private scheme could ever be, because only the state, unlike any private scheme, can give a proper copper-bottomed guarantee against inflation. Only the state scheme, and no private scheme, can ensure that job mobility is not impeded and that insuperable problems of pension transferability do not arise.

Anyone who destroys the earnings-related pension scheme is the enemy of the pensioner. I vow that the Labour party will fight to preserve that scheme and will take that fight to the country. If the Tory wreckers do destroy it, I give this pledge: because the scheme is the best yet devised for the low-paid, for women and widows, and for guaranteeing protection against inflation, the Labour party will restore it as one of our foremost priorities on winning the next election.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): As the scheme, unlike private schemes, is not a funded scheme, will the hon. Gentleman tell the House and country whether he proposes to meet its colossal costs after the year 2000 by raising income tax to 50p in the pound, by doubling the rate of national insurance contributions, or by raising VAT to 25 per cent.?

Mr. Meacher: The best calculation that the Government Actuary can make—I recommend that the hon. Gentleman should look at this independent source — is that there might be an increase in the level of employers' and employees' contributions to 16 to 20 per cent. The present level is 17·6 per cent. In other words, there will be a small difference between even the maximum increase in the level of contributions and that which exists now. It is perfectly affordable.

The real issue is whether Britain has a Government who can ensure an adequate level of economic growth, not continuing economic stagnation, and the expenditure of £20 billion a year on keeping 3·5 million people unemployed. If we can change the Government, there is no reason why we cannot afford the scheme.

What we are seeing in the Fowler reviews is the ugly face of welfare capitalism. It is camouflaged by the right hon. Gentleman's claim that his objectives, as he will no doubt say again today, are the targeting of aid, simplification and improving work incentives. Each of those conceals a different reality.

"Targeting" is a Tory code word for more means testing and for taking more money from the not quite so poor working class to give it to the very poor in the working class, while the rich on £40,000 a year sweep up the increased tax handouts.

"Simplification" is a euphemism for more cuts and more rough justice. It does not even overcome the fundamental drawbacks of means-tested benefits which the Secretary of State identified in a letter to the Child Poverty Action Group on 30 May 1984 as being "complicated to legislate for, administer and understand, and generally the most expensive benefits in terms of manpower needed to administer them."

"Improving work incentives" is Fowler-speak for saying that the poor need the spur of their poverty in order to escape it, while for the rich it is the rate for the job and no amount of handout is too much.

Like the rampaging Federation of Conservative Students, these reviews are stained with the goose-step of the new Right. For them—they are well represented in the higher reaches of the Tory party and Parliament—the only acceptable recipients of welfare are the destitute and the deranged and even the most meagre of state benefits fosters irresponsibility. For them to be unemployed is to be workshy. For them, child benefit encourages feckless breeding, and teenage benefits erode traditional parental controls. It is an ugly philosphy, put forward by an increasingly authoritarian party. It is a callous and compassionless view of society which is rejected by the great majority of the British people.

The Labour party has a different philosophy of care and compassion, of dignity and security against want without stigma. For the pensioners we would restore the link with earnings which the Government so meanly took away——

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge) rose——

Mr. Meacher: No, I shall not give way.

We would preserve and strengthen the state earnings-related pension scheme to ensure that the lower paid get the best possible deal in retirement, which otherwise they will not get. For families, we would retain and improve child benefit as the single most important protection against family poverty and against the poverty trap. For the growing army, brought below the state poverty line by Tory policies—it is a growing army of 8 million—we would seek to bring to an end the present degrading supplementary benefit system whereby millions of claimants are herded into offices every week to be dealt with by overworked and underpaid staff in a bureaucratic system fraught with complexity, delays and frustrations on all sides.

For both tenants and owner-occupiers struggling to buy their houses we would consolidate the provision of housing aid, not decimate it as the Government are planning to do. For the disabled, a vital but all too often forgotten group, a new component is needed — a disability costs allowance—to compensate for the extra costs of living arising from disability. But it will inevitably be expensive and its implementation, as for other objectives, must depend on our economic success in reducing the over-swollen army of the unemployed, which is our highest priority.

None of that will be brought about by a Government who regard the welfare state with disdain, nor by a Prime Minister who has made it clear that she regards claimants as scroungers and the unemployed as workshy. That is why the Tory dismantling of the welfare state has now become not just a major political issue but a fundamental reason why the Labour party, which believes in the welfare state, will be returned to power at the next election.

4.9 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"notes the Government's commitment to improving the Social Security and Health care systems in this country as shown by increased spending on the National Health Service and increased benefit levels for pensioners and others; supports the Government's aim of reducing the burden of taxation and National Insurance contributions especially for the lower paid; notes the Opposition's plans to end mortgage tax relief and increase income tax and National Insurance contributions; and congratulates the Government on having set in hand the most thorough review of the Social Security system for 40 years."

One of the endearing features of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is that the weaker his case, the more strident he becomes. There is one difference about his speech today. Normally, he sets up a smoke-screen to disguise the fact that the Opposition have no policy. Today, he has set up a smoke-screen to disguise the fact that the Opposition have found a policy, and that is the policy that he put forward last Monday. I shall come to it in a moment.

First, I shall set out the facts of the Government's policies. On social security, we are paying higher pensions to more pensioners than ever before. We have increased benefits for the long-term sick and disabled by 30 per cent. We have raised child benefit and one-parent benefit to the highest real value. In the Health Service, more patients are being treated than at any stage in its history. The hospital building programme has been restored after the Labour Government's savage cuts in the capital programme. New forms of treatment are being made available.

Today, I am publishing a report that shows that the cost of heart transplants, for example, are lower and the benefits greater than had previously seemed likely. I shall be seeking expert advice on how the Health Service should approach the issue of expanding transplantation in the light of that report.

In terms of cash provided, the Government are spending over £40 billion a year on social security, over £17 billion a year on the National Health Service and, with local government, some £3 billion on personal social services. In addition, the increased efficiency of the National Health Service is now releasing substantial extra resources for patient care. Last year, health authorities in England, by managing their activities more effectively, were able to release £100 million for developing patient services. I have approved plans for health authorities for the coming year which will release a further £150 million for patient services.

My Department alone uses over 40 per cent. of total public spending. Against that background, it is ludicrous for the hon. Gentleman to charge that in some way the Government are presiding over the dismantling of the welfare state. We are committing record resources to the welfare state, but, what is more, we are seeking to ensure that those resources are used to more effect than ever before.

The Government are prepared to have their achievements in office and their policy proposals compared with the previous Labour Government's record and with the plans which are now coming forward from the Labour party.

Mr. Jack Dormand (Easington): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way so early in his speech. As the picture that he has painted is so different from our experiences in our constituencies, despite what he has said, does he feel that there are any weaknesses or deficiencies in the National Health Service, and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Fowler: All Governments face incredible problems in the Health Service. Unlike the hon. Member for Oldham, West, it has never been part of my case to pretend that by waving a financial wand all the problems of the Health Service—new forms of treatment, waiting lists and hospital building—magically will be resolved at once.

The Government are now putting to effect more resources than ever before. We are also seeking to ensure that the Health Service uses those resources to better effect. It is a question of the practical policies needed to fulfil the ideals that the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) and I share.

The same charges were made in 1982, 1983 and 1984, in the Opposition's almost annual debate on the dismantling of the welfare state. Until now, the only distinction of the hon. Member for Oldham, West is the rather unlikely one of sounding even more hysterical than the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). Now, for the first time, the Opposition have put forward their policies. For the first time, we are dealing not just with generalities from the Opposition—the hon. Gentleman has set out the policies that he would like to see a Labour Government adopt. Last Monday an official statement said:

[Mr. Fowler]

"Michael Meacher 'Shadow Secretary of State for Health and Social Security' produced his 'considered response' to the Government's review of social security and published two chapters of a full scale book which he intends to publish."

Nothing that I say should be taken as dissuading the hon. Gentleman from following his published plans. To be fair, the press has been rather hard on the hon. Gentleman, because it takes considerable character to produce the kind of report that he published last Monday. The hon. Gentleman has exposed, clearly and frankly, the ambitions and aspirations of a future Labour Government. The direction of their policy is now clear, and, to put it in language that the hon. Gentleman has used time and time before, he has lifted the veil on Labour's secret manifesto. He has set out what Labour would do in power, in contrast to the evasive generalities with which we have had to deal until now.

In the light of that, let me take the hon. Gentleman's comparison. Let us compare what the Government are doing with what the hon. Gentleman wants to do. The Government take the view that control of public spending is essential on economic and social grounds. Economic collapse and high inflation affect most the weakest in our society. If one needs any proof and establishment of that, one has only to return to the period between 1974 and 1979 when prices increased by 110 per cent. That was disastrous news for thousands of pensioners.

The hon. Gentleman has set out a plan for social security which he estimates would cost £7 billion a year. Even on the information that he has provided, it is clear that the cost would be at least twice that—an addition of well over £15 billion to public spending. His plan for the disability costs allowance, which he repeated again in his speech, would cost upwards of £4 billion. His plan to give an educational maintenance allowance to all those aged over 16 still at school would cost up to £1 billion. His income maintenance benefit could involve spending billions of pounds—£2 billion extra on benefits for the unemployed and £1 billion more for single parents. Even on the hon. Gentleman's own costings, the inevitable consequence of his policies would be a massive increase in income tax and national insurance contributions.

Mr. Meacher: I am sure that it gives the right hon. Gentleman great pleasure to indulge in references to handouts from Conservative Central Office, but I assure him that most people are likely to take a great deal more seriously the kinds of independent costings made by The Economist, which is in no way a Left magazine. Its view is that the total costings would be under £7 billion, of which £4 billion would be accounted for by the abolition, under the consultative document — as a Green Paper proposal—of the married man's tax allowance and the switching of that into a substantial increase in child benefit.

The disability costs allowance, which we have costed very carefully at between £1·5 billion and £2 billion, is indeed a big extension of the social security system, and I have made it absolutely clear that it could be achieved only if we were to make substantial inroads into the £20 billion that the Government are now spending on keeping 3·5 million people unemployed.

The remainder of the package—about £1 billion—is easily accounted for by the fact that tax reliefs given to the rich over the past six years are estimated now to have an annual running cost of £3 billion. All that I was modestly suggesting was that we take back, for the purpose of the proposals, one third of that amount.

Mr. Fowler: The public will decide which of the figures is correct. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, the report in The Economist, to which he refers, takes his own estimates of the figures and makes that quite clear. If the hon. Gentleman's plans are put into the Library, I shall be content to give detailed costings of them. It is clear from the press, from politicians and from all kinds of other commentators that the hon. Gentleman has not done the work on the costings that needs to be done. When he has done that work, he will find that the figure is over £15 billion.

The hon. Gentleman's plan has been attacked in relation to its effect on mortgage tax relief, and rightly so. Let us not beat about the bush. The hon. Gentleman wants to reduce mortgage tax relief. That is what my hon. Friends said, and they are right. In his consultative document — to which, presumably, at least the hon. Gentleman is committed — he favours a housing allowance. He repeated that this afternoon in the debate. A cash benefit would be payable towards housing costs, whether rented or owner-occupied, and whether the claimant was in or out of work. The level of benefit would relate directly to income, but only those on over one and a half times average earnings would receive less assistance from housing allowance than they do now from mortgage interest tax relief. In other words, the hon. Gentleman has confirmed today that all those on over one and a half times average earnings will be worse off under his plan. [Interruption.] I understand that the hon. Gentleman is standing by the proposals, but the official Opposition are trying to distance themselves from them. I think that the time has come to ask what are the Opposition's policies.

Mr. Meacher: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether he defends a system under which those on £30,000 a year receive, according to a parliamentary answer, £32 a week in mortgage interest tax relief, while those on £5,000 a year get only £7 a week? Does he or does he not believe that that is right?

Mr. Fowler: I believe that the present mortgage tax relief system is broadly right, and I am entirely frank about that. It seems to be common ground now that the hon. Gentleman has confirmed that he is seeking to reduce the amount of tax relief going to all those earning over one and a half times average earnings. That is the message that should go out from the debate this afternoon.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I do not wish to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman's sport in baiting the official Opposition, but it would be helpful to other Opposition Members if he would address himself to the question whether he is considering the abolition of the state earnings related pension scheme.

Mr. Fowler: If the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) will wait for a few seconds, I shall be dealing directly with the social security review.

If the hon. Member for Oldham, West wants to have a serious debate about social security, it is important for us to know what he is proposing. He says in his report that he wishes to end the upper earnings limit on national insurance contributions and to bring in higher rates of contribution for high earners. That would mean extra contributions, probably averaging between £20 and £30 a week, for about 3 million people. As I have said, his costings are hopelessly optimistic. To carry out his proposals would mean an increase in the basic rate of income tax of as much as 15p in the pound. It is no good the hon. Gentleman seeking to deny it. He must face the full impact of his proposals. He cannot put up a series of ideas without any thought for the cost, as I am sure his shadow Cabinet colleagues will agree.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: I should like to continue, if I may.

I am asked about our policy. It is to control public spending and to bring down inflation. It is to encourage industrial investment. [Interruption.] Compared with inflation of 110 per cent. between 1974 and 1979, the Government's achievement on inflation stands very good comparison with that of the previous Labour Government.

Mr. Canavan: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: Not for the moment.

The Government's policy is to encourage industrial recovery and to create new wealth, which is essential in dealing with our social programmes. It is to reduce the tax burden, and in particular the tax burden on the lower paid. It is to encourage home ownership with tax relief on mortgages.

Mr. Meacher: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: Not for the moment.

It is to continue with our policy of committing resources to our social programme and to ensure that the money is being used to best effect.

As for social security, the most significant aspect is the new agreement which now exists between the parties, as I understand it, that there is a need for reform. There is no point in the hon. Member for Oldham, West publishing a book if he does not feel that there is any need for change. It is precisely for that reason that the Government set up their review of social security. Since then there has been an unprecedented debate on the future of social security. We have received about 4,500 pieces of evidence.

Mr. Nellist: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: No, I will not give way. The hon. Member for Oldham, West would not give way, so I do not see why I should.

On the question of personal pensions alone, we have distributed over 30,000 consultation documents. We have held almost 20 public hearings of evidence, in which 70 organisations took part.

Mr. Nellist: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: No, I will not.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not persist when the Secretary of State has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Mr. Fowler: I have given way several times previously, and the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) is the last person in this House to whom I am prepared to give way.

Let me be clear——

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Fowler: I shall not give way. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because of the various actions that the hon. Gentleman has taken.

Let me be clear that, despite all the predictions and forecasts that have been made about the outcome of the social security review, the Government have not yet reached conclusions. When decisions are made——

Mr. Nellist: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: —they will be published and there will be a proper opportunity for public consideration.

I recognise that scarcely a day goes by without someone suggesting a new change in social security that I have in mind. Some of those so-called disclosures have a rather curious ring——

Mr. Nellist: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Member for Oldham, West quoted in his speech one report——

Mr. Nellist: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: I shall not give way.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West quoted one report in The Guardian in which he suggested that the Government were going to save more in one area of housing benefit than we spend on housing benefit. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the report, he will see that what is being suggested is that we are going to end housing benefit for all those over supplementary benefit. That is the gist of the report. The Daily Telegraph suggested that I was going to abolish the state earnings related pension scheme. Only a few weeks earlier, on 28 February, the same paper carried a report that the Government were expected to stand firm on their commitment to the state earnings related pension scheme.

Mr. Nellist: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already said to the hon. Gentleman that he must not persist if the Secretary of State is not giving way, and it is clear that he is not.

Mr. Fowler: In a spirit of enormous generosity, I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Nellist: It works if one persists, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Is it not the height of irony, if not hypocrisy, for the Secretary of State to defend with pride the reduction of inflation under this Government when the price that has been paid is 5 million people without work, 6 million people living in damp houses, 8 million people living on poverty wages, 9·7 million people who cannot afford a week's holiday away from home and an estimated 15 million people living on or below supplementary benefit levels? Is not the real message that the Secretary of State is giving today that, in his Government's understanding, the poor are not yet poor enough for unemployment to fall and the rich are not yet rich enough for investment to take place?

Mr. Fowler: I know that the hon. Gentleman has been having some reselection problems in his constituency, but that is going a little far.

It is unlikely that we shall reach a consensus during the debate, but I shall do my best. Surely the hon. Gentleman will accept that the control and reduction of inflation makes sense from not just an economic but a social and industrial point of view. The fact is that if inflation is out of control, the people who suffer most are those on fixed incomes, pensioners and those most in need. That is why I say, and that is why the Government say, that it is essential, on economic and industrial and social grounds, to control inflation. As far as the Government and I are concerned, we stand entirely by that policy.

The response to the stories that have been circulated must be to wait and see. Let me be absolutely clear. The Government are looking at all the options in terms of social security reform. The Government are reviewing the entire social security system. We are considering all the options in child benefit and supplementary benefit. We are also considering all the options in retirement pensions. That is what the review is about. There is no point in carrying out such a review if I am not prepared to consider all the options that are put to me.

The Government are carrying out a review that should have been carried out years ago. It should have been conducted long before now, 40 years after Beveridge.

"It is absurd for the hon. Gentleman to believe that he can try to tie my hands as to what I should consider."—[Official Report, 8 November 1984; Vol. 67, c. 231.]

I used those words in the debate on 8 November, and I stand by them.

What is significant is that there is now a consensus that change is needed. There is a consensus for three main reasons. The first is the sheer scale of the social security system. By any standards, it is an enormous undertaking, now consuming nearly one third of all public spending and also involving my Department in dealing with well over three quarters of the population as either contributors or beneficiaries. We have some 30 different benefits with their own rules of entitlement and payment. That, I suspect, is why policy reviews in the past have been narrowly focused on one benefit or one small part of the machine. The aim in our review has been to pull all the strands together into a consistent plan. It has demonstrated that there is, it seems to me, a consensus on one point —that virtually everybody regards the present system as too complicated and too difficult for people to understand and for the staff to work. Indeed, the complexity is such that parts of the social security system—here I agree with what the hon. Member for Oldham West said——

Mr. Canavan: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: Let me finish the sentence.

Parts of the social security system are in danger of becoming impossible to operate.

I give way to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Mr. Winnick: The Secretary of State was not willing to comment on the state earnings related pension scheme other than to tell us about the review. Is it not a fact that, according to a reply that I received from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, in 10 years' time someone on average earnings will receive an additional £31, and someone on three quarters of average earnings will receive an additional £21? Are not those significant sums? They demonstrate what my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was saying—that if the scheme is allowed to continue, a large number of people will be able to live in retirement without poverty. Is not that all the more reason why the scheme should remain in existence?

Mr. Fowler: I shall have to ask the hon. Gentleman to wait and see the proposals. Of course, I am conscious of the points that he puts forward as well as of the need to prevent people in old age sinking into poverty. None of us wants that. However, in this debate I cannot pre-empt the proposals that I shall make.

Mr. Kennedy: I appreciate what the Secretary of State says about not pre-empting the outcome of the review. In November, the right hon. Gentleman said in the House that he did not intend "to call into question the fundamental pensions structure that was established in the 1970s with all-party agreement, and to which I was a party."—[Official Report, 23 November 1983; Vol. 49, c. 360.]

Does that statement still have the categoric ring that it had when the right hon. Gentleman delivered it in November, or is it now open to doubt?

Mr. Fowler: I think that the hon. Gentleman is getting his years wrong. He will have to judge all the statements that I and any of my right hon. Friends have made against the criterion of what is proposed. It is ludicrous to try to seek this afternoon to define what that is because the hon. Gentleman cannot see the whole picture.

Much of the complication in the social security system flows from the piecemeal development and augmentation of the system over the past 40 years. If we are to get rid of as much of the complication as possible, we shall have to decide what is really needed now. That means a reshaping of the system, not a tinkering at the edges. For the review to be a real review, it had to look at all the options—and that is what we have done. There is no point in having a review if every part of the existing structure is regarded as sacrosanct. I am prepared to be held to my commitment to meet social need; I am not prepared to be a prisoner of the existing structure.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Fowler: Secondly, when we talk about need, we should be absolutely clear what we mean. Beveridge was talking about poverty against a very different background. There have been enormous increases in the material prosperity of this country since then. There has been a real increase in GDP per head of about 115 per cent. since 1948. That growth in general prosperity has been reflected in the level of all the main social security benefits.

Mr. Nellist: What about the last six years?

Mr. Fowler: The basic rate of supplementary benefit has more than doubled since that time and long-term benefits, especially pensions, have improved substantially more.

Mr. Canavan Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: No, I shall not give way.

Nevertheless, no one can doubt that need exists in this country, and one of our aims must be to target the help available more effectively to meet that need. There are also changes in balance between different groups within the population in need. For example, I think that few would disagree with my diagnosis that one of the areas which today gives most concern is the position of poor families with children — working families and unemployed families. I think that even the Opposition will agree with me about that.

Thirdly, social security is not somehow isolated from the rest of Government policy. In approaching our review of social security I have sought to avoid the straitjacket of focusing only on the social security system. I have been concerned with how social security relates not just to our social policy and objectives, but to our economic objectives and employment policies. I do not define social objectives merely as greater spending on social security or higher rates of unemployment benefit. I am much more concerned to see people taken off social security benefits and able to support themselves through productive employment.

Mr. Canavan: The Government have to find the jobs first.

Mr. Fowler: Yes. Our social policy objectives are the same as our overall policy — to achieve a stronger economy and to tackle unemployment.

Mr. McCrindle rose——

Mr. Fowler: The review, therefore, has a number of different objectives—to simplify the elaborate tangle of benefits and entitlements which have built up in the past 40 years, to ensure that the new structure meets today's needs, and to achieve the right relationship between our objectives for social security and our economic and employment policies.

Mr. Canavan: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: No, I shall not give way.

For the past 40 years we have reacted to the emergence of various needs, adding to or subtracting from the system until it is difficult to see what the system seeks to achieve. I want a simpler system which is easier for people to understand, a better administered system with more use of computers rather than the filing cabinets to which the hon. Member for Oldham, West referred, a system which places more trust and responsibility with the individual rather than the all-providing state and which places the fewest possible obstacles in the way of employment and economic activity.

The Government have shown their commitment to the welfare state, but we want a modern welfare state. We want a modern social security system which uses today's methods to meet today's needs and a modern Health Service which uses its resources to maximum effect to meet the varying needs. That is the kind of welfare state that we want, and our proposals will be directed to that end.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): The Secretary of State ended with a splendid peroration, but he did not say how he expected to achieve the golden age that he described. We have to contend with the situation as it is now.

Let us cast our minds back to the words of the Conservative party in the general election of 1979—the black day that marked Britain's decline from a caring society seeking to overcome many of the problems that faced us then to the present level of despair and the ever-increasing problems that we now experience. I wonder whether the Secretary of State remembers the commitments that his party made at that time. It promised to rebuild our economy—ha, ha!—and to reunite a divided and disillusioned people. In fact, the Government have created more divisions in society than any of us can remember in our entire political lives. Even their most ardent supporters, if there are any left, cannot claim that they have achieved that commitment. Lord Stockton himself said in another place five months ago

"it breaks my heart to see what is happening in our country today." — [Official Report, House of Lords, 13 November 1984; Vol. 457, c. 240.]

I am sure that that sentiment is echoed in the hearts and minds of the overwhelming majority of people today.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, there is enormous wealth for the minority while the majority of families suffer massive, degrading and soul-destroying unemployment, with all the physical and psychological ills that stem from it. When my constituents ask why we are in such a hell of a mess when the Tories promised so much in 1979 and again in 1983, I cannot explain the reasons. We all remember the Prime Minister's cynicism on the steps of No. 10, and I make no apology for reminding the House of it because it will never be forgotten. Then we had North sea oil, which was supposed to be such a splendid stroke of good fortune to revitalise the economy, to allow us to invest in new products and industries and to improve massively the standard of living of our people. Yet rotten housing remains the lot of thousands of families. That is certainly true in the west midlands. Thousands are still homeless and millions are out of work. The young are condemned to despair and the rest now realise what a massive confidence trick the Prime Minister perpetrated on them and what massive damage she has done to the country in the past five and a half years.

I also cannot explain to my constituents the utter folly of it all. They ask how anyone can claim that there is no money to invest in new jobs or to pull down the ancient, boarded-up houses in my constituency and build new ones. Three and three quarter million homes are still unfit or seriously affected by dry rot, but fewer than 40,000 new local authority homes were started last year. That is a wretched total. Yet there is massive unemployment among building workers, whose skills remain unused while building firms try desperately to find work and to re-employ their former work force. My constituents point out that the Prime Minister found £38 million for the Falklands affair, and I have to agree, but I cannot explain why she was able to find money for that purpose but not for the decent homes and jobs that my constituents and others throughout the country so desperately need.

When my doctors tell me that we cannot afford to appoint the surgeons and nurses needed for the Health Service and the staff needed to care for the elderly, I have to agree that it is appalling that those skills are being wasted, but I also point out that the people who complain of these things have the power to get rid of the Conservatives in the next general election. I hope that they will all take my good advice.

It is clear, in spite of what the Secretary of State said, that the NHS needs more resources. The Government's policy of high unemployment and growing poverty places ever-increasing demands on the NHS. The privatisation of catering and cleaning is a massive irrelevancy. It creates unemployment among hospital staff—among ancillary workers, many of whom have given unstinting service to the hospital service over many years—in order to enable the Government's pals in private firms to make a profit. Private firms can only make their profits by using the minimum number of staff and providing a restricted service for a reduced number of hours. That is what is happening to services in the hospitals. Private firms could not make their profits otherwise.

Who would have imagined that we would see the day when trained doctors and nurses would be unemployed? That day has arrived. The Secretary of State should pay some attention to that problem, but he has not even mentioned it. Who would ever have thought that thousands of kidney, heart and cancer patients would die each year because of a lack of facilities for adequate care and treatment? Is the Prime Minister concerned about the fact that the rate of death from cervical and breast cancer is rising in this country, while in America, Canada and Sweden the rates are falling dramatically because the Governments of those countries are determined to support a proper, national well-resourced service?

The Prime Minister does not trust the NHS. She does not permit it to deal with her own health problems when they arise. However, she should visit some of the NHS hospitals, including some of the teaching hospitals. I know that the staff would very much like her to see the conditions in which they have to work, and the extent to which they suffer from overwork. The Prime Minister should see the Victorian hospitals with their unending corridors. She should see the huge Victorian wards that provide no privacy for patients or doctors. Any hospital in the country could tell the right hon. Lady that, although the Select Committee recommended that more patients should be treated by fully trained doctors, consultants—although they are being trained — are not being appointed. If that situation could be improved, there could be better care for patients, better diagnoses and probably shorter stays in hospital. Those improvements could well save money and enable better use to be made of existing resources.

The Prime Minister prefers to turn to private hospitals for her own care, but it must have been embarrassing for her when the press uncovered the dreadful story of how the equipment for the latest treatment on her eye had to be borrowed from an NHS hospital. One might have expected the right hon. Lady to declare an allegiance to the NHS from that point on.

New technology in the NHS needs resources. Caring for the increasing number of elderly patients in more congenial conditions, preferably at home, or in the community, and caring for mentally ill and handicapped patients in the community rather than in massive hospitals, also requires resources.

The NHS has suffered as a result of the Chancellor's public expenditure cuts. If it is simply to respond to the technological and demographic pressures alone, it requires a growth in funding of at least 1·5 per cent. each year. Yet the health authorities have had to find £48 million from a reduced budget in order to meet part of a pay settlement that the Government refused to meet. Levels of staffing have been cut or frozen, and nurses sacked.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Short: The Royal College of Nursing has drawn attention to the inadequate number of nurses in the wards in many areas, which places a strain on the remaining staff, and can be dangerous for the patients.

Mr. Galley: The hon. Lady claims that numbers of staff have been cut. How can she say that, when during the last six years more than 40,000 extra nurses and more than 5,000 extra doctors and dentists have been provided? The hon. Lady claims that resources are inadequate. As she knows, the Select Committee last year investigated the matter and found that the NHS had received extra resources of 17 per cent., which at least kept pace with changing demand. The hon. Lady was a party to the production of the Select Committee's document. She accepted the fact that there had been a growth in available resources.

Mrs. Short: None the less, nurses and doctors are unemployed. Consultants say that they are understaffed and that they have long waiting lists. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) is a valued member of the Select Committee, and I enjoy his company. However, there still remains the fact that disadvantaged patients are suffering. Elderly people are waiting not weeks but years for, for example, hip replacement operations. Despite the fact that resources have been allocated to the NHS, these problems remain. We cannot gloss over the facts. Staff are being sacked, wards are being closed and as a result waiting lists are lengthening.

The Government are obsessed with reducing taxation for the well off. The Prime Minister's values and social beliefs are those that determine Government policy. In her view, there are masses of people who are scroungers who enjoy living on Government handouts. She wishes to reduce social security benefits and to introduce means tests for many more people. The right hon. Lady even believes that it might be possible to introduce a means test for maternity benefits. That is one of the latest ideas. The Select Committee made it clear that expectant mothers in the poorer sections of the community—those living in the inner cities—require more rather than less support. Better diet and proper rest and care would reduce the perinatal mortality rate of such mothers. The overall rate has fallen, and we are pleased about that, but in some of the industrial areas the perinatal mortality rate is still too high. Many general practitioners tell me that they are in despair about how to reduce the rate.

Mr. Galley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Short: I have to believe the letters that I receive from general practitioners working in cities such as Manchester and Liverpool, where conditions are very difficult. Those doctors are not receiving any support in the form of more staff, partners, nurses or community social workers. The situation is bound to affect patient care.

The Opposition believe firmly in the abolition of poverty. The Government, on the contrary, are creating ever larger areas of poverty and acute distress. They are placing a dreadful burden on our people. The Government insist on managing poverty. Our intention is to eliminate it.

4.58 pm

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): It was correct and timely for the Government to engage in a wide-ranging review of social security, the results of which we look forward to seeing soon. For far too long, like Topsy, our social security system has grown. We have a massively complicated system and cannot always be sure that benefits are directed to those in greatest need. I hope that when the review is enacted in legislation there will be evidence of some streamlining and updating. At the risk of upsetting the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), might I add that I hope that benefits will be targeted at those in greatest need.

Ever since I came to the House there has been a debate across the Floor of the Chamber between those who believe in the universality of benefits and those who, like me, recognise the limits of what we can expect from the taxpayer to finance benefits. I have always taken the view that some selectivity or targeting of benefits to those in greatest need should be the order of the day.

If economies can be identified during the reviews, that is all to the good. I am even prepared to accept, as a starting point, the requirement that the reviews should result in no extra cost to the Exchequer. There is a good deal of misdirected benefit in the present system, just as there are many people in considerable need who do not receive the assistance which we all want to extend to them.

I accept that in our present economic circumstances there should be no major increase in the amount of money that we devote to social security, but I hope that I should not be alone in not being happy if the reviews were an attempt massively to save on the present outlay, at the risk of reducing the amount of benefits targeted at those in greatest need.

The language which the Labour party has employed in these matters in the past few weeks has been excessive to the point at which its credibility, and especially that of its spokesman, has been brought into severe doubt. The Labour party has failed to cost its proposals, in so far as they can be called proposals. Television viewers will have noticed the Opposition spokesman's remarkably slippery performance on "Newsnight" on Friday evening, and again today he was unable to tell us what it would cost to introduce the no doubt desirable benefits which Labour proposes. The hon. Gentleman's failure to do that must lead us to question his credibility. Although I shall have some critical questions to direct to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench, the motion employs extravagant terms and will, I hope, be treated with contempt.

Mr. Frank Field: The hon. Gentleman always listens carefully to these debates, but he is being unfair to my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). My hon. Friend costed his proposals today. The Secretary of State also costed them and reached a figure double that quoted by my hon. Friend. Although there is dispute as to their cost, it is unfair to say that my hon. Friend's proposals have not been costed.

Mr. McCrindle: I heard my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and I heard the hon. Member for Oldham, West on Friday evening and again today. I accept that he has moved since Friday, when he gave no estimate, but that which he gave today was immediately questioned by this side of the House and does not begin to persuade me that I should pay attention to what he says.

Although this is a debate between the two sides of the House, there is a need for debate within the political parties on the future of social security. If my line is not completely acceptable to some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I hope it will be accepted that only by exploring different means of achieving the same ends will we be able to target benefits more cost effectively. I must await the final reports, and a good deal of what I shall say is based upon press reports. I have no alternative, as I am not privy to information about the authenticity of those reports.

I am worried about reports on the state earnings related pension scheme, which have been widespread in the past few days. On the basis of the wish being the father to the thought, the Treasury might assiduously have been peddling to newspapers likely to take its line the thought that there will be a winding up or a substantial revision of the state earnings related pension scheme. For the sake of this debate, I must assume that there is a prospect of some change. I shall react when the proposals are known fully, but there are a few facts of which it would be appropriate for me to remind my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Before they moved on to higher things, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health were, like me, responsible during the passage of what is now the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 for saying that we all wanted to end what was called pensioneering—the tendency for the Labour party to accentuate state pensions when in office, only to find that trend reversed when the Conservatives were in office, when there was emphasis on the desirability of occupational pension schemes. Many of us, including my right hon. Friend and my right hon. and learned Friend, were aware of the damage that that was doing, not least to the future of occupational pension schemes, with which, as the House knows, I have a long association.

If there is material alteration of the state earnings related pension scheme, the effect on the development of good occupational pension schemes cannot be advantageous. The two systems have co-existed for some 10 years and it would be unfortunate if we were forced to return to pensioneering, of which there was a good deal of evidence in the speeches of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and of the hon. Member for Oldham, West.

People in the state earnings related pension scheme are for the most part lower-paid. I have long professional and political experience of these matters, and such people are the least likely to make pension provision for themselves through private schemes. The pensions industry, to which my right hon. Friend and I look for a massive upsurge of development when decisions on a personal portable pension are announced, is not equipped or especially keen to attract pensions business from such people.

If SERPS is wound up, and if the encouragement which will no doubt be given is not taken up by those who are principally concerned, I fear that those people will reach retirement age having made no additional provision, as a result of which they will be forced on to supplementary benefit. Before the Government put the final seal of approval on the SERPS proposals, they should make quite sure that that fact has been taken into account and that supplementary benefit is costed just as carefully as the amount necessary to keep SERPS in existence into the 21st century.

I appreciate the point about the burden on the future working population, but I wonder whether it has not been projected—perhaps because of an inspired leak from the Treasury—on the basis of the worst possible scenario, with virtually no growth anticipated in the economy. SERPS is not a state charity, which recent press reports may have led some people to believe. What comes out of SERPS is related to what the contributors put in. The economics of SERPS must be immune to population statistics and the projected problems of 20 to 40 years hence.

If the Government decide to take the action which has been widely suggested, I should require much more information about the costing on which such a decision is based. Am I correct in saying that SERPS is effectively a self-financing scheme? How likely is it that personal pensions will be taken up by those manual workers who for the most part are not attractive to pensions interests? Would it not be grossly unfair to give continuing tax concessions to those in occupational pension schemes—which I welcome—and to continue the index-linking of pensions in the public sector at the same time as removing the only basis upon which the people to whom I have referred can build up their basic old-age pensions? The Government must address their mind carefully to these questions before any decision is taken to introduce a move in the direction which has been suggested.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West was anxious to tell us — it seems that he knew more about the Government's plans than even the Government did—that child benefit now paid to the woman would in future be paid to the man. I have no idea how accurate that is, but one of the advantages of the existing system is that, regardless of the circumstances, the woman can at least rely on a basic income. A fairly strong case would have to be argued before any change took place.

As one who has supported disproportionate benefit to one-parent families, I am beginning to wonder whether residual poverty in 1985 exists within families irrespective of whether they are one-parent. To that extent, when the review emerges, I hope to see a reassessment of where we pay the disproportionate benefit. We cannot continue to assume that the deserving cases of 1970 to 1980 will necessarily be the deserving cases as we move into the 1990s.

I have long taken the view that to pay out paltry sums in death grant and maternity allowance to everyone, irrespective of need, is an insult to the great majority of us who do not require them, and a disservice to those who require them at a considerably higher level. There is a case for abolishing these as specific grants and for merging them into supplementary benefit. If that were possible, I hope that the amounts paid would be considerably higher than at present and that they would go only to those with a considerable need.

Mr. Frank Field: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that if his proposal were implemented, and these grants were made part of the supplementary benefit scheme, the poor in work would be prevented from claiming?

Mr. McCrindle: Such facts must be taken into account. However, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that the supplementary benefit scheme is said to be under consideration in the light of family income supplement. There have been reports that FIS might be merged with supplementary benefit. I am not opposed to that idea, and I say that as a long-term supporter of FIS. If that happened, the problem to which the hon. Gentleman drew my attention would, to say the least, be minimised.

There has been much difficulty with heating allowances, particularly in the last two or three years when there has been a three-tier system. It is my hope that the system of heating allowances will be scrapped, absorbed yet again into the supplementary benefit system and payable to those old-age pensioners who already qualify for supplementary benefit.

I am not persuaded that the housing benefits scheme meets the needs of those whom it was intended to assist. Therefore, I am prepared to concede that there is scope for considerable rationalisation. Beyond that I would not wish to go today, but those of us who are interested in these matters will look closely at any proposed changes in housing benefits. For the moment, I concede that this is a far from perfect system and that there may well be an argument for changing its direction.

I am with the Government over a pretty wide area of the revision of benefits. I am with them in their aim for greater simplification. I am with them as they seek to achieve economy while targeting the benefits to those who need them most. But I hope I shall be forgiven for urging caution over the state earnings related pension scheme, because the Government might succeed merely in transferring the problem to supplementary benefit, and that surely cannot be their aim.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle), not least because of his expertise in pensions and other aspects of the welfare state. The hon. Gentleman made some points with which I disagree, but on the whole he delivered a well-argued and well-informed speech which was different from many of those we hear from the Conservative Benches, which merely say "Amen" to the case advanced by the Government.

The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar said that there was a limit on the extent to which funds could be allocated. We must all have regard to that, but many Conservative Members do not accept any limitation on defence expenditure. We are all aware of the astronomical sums spent on Trident, and the abolition of Trident could to a considerable extent alleviate the problems faced by the Secretary of State for Social Services. The right hon. Gentleman spoke with horror of suggestions that taxation might increase. That took some nerve, bearing in mind that he belongs to a party which, since it came to power, has clamped 15 per cent. on practically every transaction.

Over 40 years ago the Beveridge report foresaw a time when poverty in the United Kingdom would cease to exist. All the major causes of poverty—old age, unemployment, disablement and sickness—were taken care of by a scheme of national insurance with a safety net of national assistance. Although the foundations of the welfare state were laid shortly afterwards, Beveridge's recommendations were never fully implemented. The rot set in right away with the post-war Labour Government. Beveridge had proposed a single rate for retirement pensions, unemployment and sickness benefits of 27 per cent. of average earnings for a single person and 45 per cent. for a couple. These figures would, Beveridge stated, guarantee the minimum income needed for subsistence. However, when the scheme was introduced in 1948, retirement pensions were set at 18·9 per cent. of average earnings for a single person, and 30·5 per cent. for a couple. Flat rate unemployment benefit and sickness benefit were set at much the same rates—a far cry from those originally proposed by Beveridge.

Any review of the social security system should begin with the acknowledgement that the existing system has never attained the objectives set by its founder. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) referred to the Secretary of State's peroration. I am afraid that the decoded message of his speech means farewell to the welfare state.

In theory, the welfare state has looked after its recipients from the cradle to the grave. A quick look at what has happened to the two benefits at each end of the life cycle reveals the ineffectiveness of the system in doing that. I am referring to the maternity grant and the death grant, to which the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar referred. The former has remained at £25 for many years, and should be pitched at a higher level, and the death grant of £30 is a poor joke in the worst possible taste. It has not been increased since 1967. Its declining value has been recognised by successive Governments, but none has sought to increase the level of the grant. It should now be around £350 to cover the average cost of a funeral.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar, who thought that the maternity grant and the death grant should be abolished. When we talk about abolishing such benefits, we should bear in mind that insurance contributions are based on people receiving such benefit. It would be wrong for the benefits to disappear while the level of national insurance contributions is maintained.

These are far from being the only benefits that are inadequate or have been under attack in recent years. The effects of inflation and the failures of Governments have resulted in a serious erosion of most of the benefits and has brought about a situation in which, far from the supplementary benefit system being a safety net for a relatively small number of people, has become a necessity for 4·5 million people, of whom three quarters of a million are in Scotland. These are the 1983 figures, and no doubt the position has worsened in the meantime.

Between 1979 and 1983, more than £2,000 million was cut by the Government from the social security budget. Last year benefits rose between 4·7 and 5·1 per cent., but the real increases received by many people did not even reach the level necessary to keep benefits in line with inflation. This was because of new regulations which came into force; for example, the changes in "available scale margin", which did many pensioners out of £1 a week for their heating allowance.

Since then we have seen a large increase in dental charges, and a massive increase in prescription charges. The changes in the regulations covering board and lodging payments, which are especially damaging in Scotland, will mean an average loss of £13 a week for thousands of unemployed persons in lodgings. Many of them have no homes to which to return and will end up homeless.

In Scotland, apart from the housing welfare organisations, which one would expect to be concerned about this, the Churches and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children have expressed grave disquiet, and no wonder, for Government policies will deliberately put people on to the streets. We have now learnt that eight out of the 21 DHSS resettlement and re-establishment centres are to close within three years, including the only one in Scotland, at Bishopbriggs near Glasgow. The Glasgow resettlement unit caters for homeless men and is a vital lifeline for those who find themselves in that unfortunate position. It is typical of the Government to make cuts which affect the weakest and most vulnerable in our society.

When one looks at the situation in the wider context, the extent to which benefits have been eroded can be clearly seen. Three decades ago our welfare system was the envy of the world. Today, our levels of spending on both health and social security are far lower than those of most other Western nations. Let us consider unemployment benefit as an example. The United Nations Economic Commission for Europe carried out a study which showed that in 1972 unemployment benefit stood at 75 per cent. of earnings, but by 1982 it had dropped to 47 per cent. Most other European countries, by comparison, have improved on the 1972 position—West Germany from 70 to 75 per cent., France from 85 to 90 per cent., the Netherlands from 85 to 89·5 per cent. and Sweden from 77·3 to 80·2 per cent.

On health care as well, our record is poor and getting steadily worse. Although the NHS is often in the vanguard of the development of modern medicine, it is near the bottom of the league when it comes to applying and supplying established technology. Taking the treatment of kidney failure, the insertion of cardiac pacemakers or coronary bypass operations as examples, we are well behind other European countries.

The most important reason for this failure is a simple lack of money for the NHS. In the financial year 1980-81, in Scotland, 6·8 per cent. of GDP was spent on health services. This compares with 8 per cent. in West Germany and France, 8·4 per cent. in Ireland and the Netherlands, and 9·6 per cent. in the United States and Canada. The average in the EEC is 7·8 per cent.

Mr. Galley: Will the right hon. Gentleman clarify why this argument is of any relevance? If administrative costs for health care in France, for example, are much higher than they are in this country, percentages of GDP are irrelevant to the argument.

Mr. Stewart: When the Prime Minister talks to the House twice a week on the subject of unemployment, she suggests that it is acceptable in the United Kingdom because, she alleges, other countries in Europe are suffering in the same way. That is not quite true. There are countries with unemployment which is infinitesimal compared to unemployment in the United Kingdom. If it is in order for the Prime Minister to measure us against other European countries, it is in order for me to do so as well.

The health service in Scotland has failed to come up to expectations in recent years. In its first 25 years the NHS in Scotland saw expenditure increase by between 4 and 5 per cent. a year. Since 1973 the average increase has been 1 per cent. in real terms. This is less than half the amount required to maintain standards. No wonder private health care is booming, and no doubt that is what the Government are trying to encourage. The underlying aim is to turn the NHS into a second-class service, and eventually it will be only for those who cannot afford to pay for the best treatment. So far, the Government have been thwarted and forced to back down.

Scotland has a bad and shameful record of poor health, deprivation and poverty, and that shame should be borne equally by those in government at Westminster and by those Scots who should know better than to let their countrymen suffer in regional poverty. It is estimated that over 1·5 million Scots are living in poverty or on the margins of poverty. Scotland has so many poor because of the failure of Westminster Governments and because we have not yet secured our own independent Parliament.

The social security review is likely to lead to a further erosion of benefit. I believe that that is what it is intended to achieve. The outlook for the poor of Scotland and the United Kingdom is bleak while they are subjected to these plans.

5.29 pm

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): Labour contributions have shown how easy it is to misrepresent and exaggerate by using statistics selectively. It was especially disappointing to hear the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) talk about perinatal mortality rates and give the impression that they are terrible. The hon. Lady knows that there are record low levels of perinatal mortality and that during the past five or six years great strides have been made. Not even the hon. Lady has a magic wand to create perfection and a nil rate of perinatal mortality.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to the effective management of NHS resources. It is true that no ministerial team in the history of the Health Service has done more to give value for money to the patient than the current Secretary of State and his team. However, I urge my right hon. Friend to show greater vigour in some of the policies that he is implementing, especially the competitive tendering exercise within the NHS. It is estimated that this year £9·4 million has been saved from the competitive tendering exercise that has been carried out so far, consisting of £8·2 million from contracts awarded to private companies and £1·2 million from contracts awarded in house. Those savings must be offset against redundancy payments which are associated with that contracting out.

Although one accepts that the policy is just getting into its stride—the circular setting out that policy was issued in 1983—these savings for the benefit of patients are peanuts. With a total budget for these ancillary services of more than £850 million, much larger savings—at least £100 million a year—should be available for patients. The number of private contracts in the laundry sector has fallen from 11·7 per cent. of total contracts in 1981-82 to 9·2 per cent. of total contracts in 1983-84. We need more oomph behind the policy of competitive tendering.

There is growing concern that some health authorities may be seeking to frustrate the policy, putting the interests of staff before those of patients. Authorities are accountable to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for their stewardship, but I should be happier if there were more external audits to ensure that contracts were awarded fairly.

Great progress has been made with the appointment of general managers. It is right, however, to express concern about the pace of change and to define the criteria by which the new general management style is to be judged. Personnel changes involve a mammoth management task for the Health Service, but it is about time NHS management board appointments were completed. There are still two vacancies, and only the chairman comes from outside the DHSS and the NHS.

Mrs. Renée Short: We told the hon. Gentleman what would happen.

Mr. Galley: I am trying to be constructive, not destructive like the hon. Lady. The quality of board members is high, but we need to appoint speedily outsiders who will bring fresh ideas to the management of the Health Service.

Many regional and district general managers are in place and the terms seem to be set to make appointments at unit levels. Considerable costs, according to the terms that have been negotiated, might be involved. It is legitimate to put to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State our concern that those enhanced payments should be justified, and be seen to be justified, by results. There should be clearly defined productivity indices by which Parliament and Ministers can judge the effectiveness of general management policy, of which I am an enthusiastic supporter.

Another major challenge faced by the Health Service involves the care of priority groups, especially the elderly, and the availability of community care. No one should underestimate the Health Service's achievement in coping during the past 10 years with a 75 per cent. increase in geriatric outpatient attendances, a 70 per cent. increase in inpatient attendances and a more than 90 per cent. increase in day patient attendances. The pressure on that service is continuing, with annual increases of between 7 and 9 per cent. in each of those categories. At the same time, district nursing personnel have been increased to cope with the 1·5 million elderly people treated by nurses in the community. There has been a vast expansion within the Health Service. The average length of stay for geriatric patients has continued to fall. The average stay is now 57 days compared with 100 days in 1973 and 62 days in 1982. That is a significant and welcome improvement.

It is better for most patients to remain in their homes as long as possible and to spend as little time in the hospital as possible. Adequate community facilities must be available. Bed turnover cannot be the only criterion of success. There is a genuine concern in a minority of cases about elderly people being sent home too soon. I hope that consultants will be encouraged to maintain a flexible attitude, taking full account of individual circumstances. I hope that there will be ever closer liaison between hospitals and social services to ensure that there is adequate home care, including an extension of hospital care in terms of hospital staff visiting geriatric patients in their homes for some weeks after those patients have been in hospital. My constituency and many other parts of the country provide such care.

Community services are vital. It is especially noteworthy that since 1979 community facilities for the elderly have expanded rapidly. A record number of home helps — more than 30,000 — a record number of day centre places and a record number of meals—more than 42 million — have been provided for the elderly. Expenditure on services for the elderly is at a record level. In 1983-84 such expenditure increased by between 4 and 5 per cent. All this has been achieved within the context of increasing real expenditure on personal social services of between 12 and 14 per cent. during the past six years. That is an improvement of about 2 per cent. per annum.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Has the hon. Gentleman noticed that it has been shown recently in several cases that expenditure on social services has been increasing because many Labour councillors have refused to obey the request by the Secretary of State for the Environment to cut those services? If one removes from the analysis the expenditure of those rate-breaking councils, the figures are appalling.

Mr. Galley: The hon. Lady is quite off beat. That is not true. Rate capping is happening this year for the first time. Every time the subject is raised, the Opposition try to blame every conceivable difficulty in local government on the Government's rate capping proposals. Consistently since 1979 expenditure and provision of care in personal social services have increased. The Opposition seek to mislead the public with a plethora of inaccuracies, misinformation, selected statistics, isolated cases of error and scare tactics. They are Meacherisms. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) used the term "scurrilous misrepresentation". That is what we have seen from the Opposition today. We have had scare tactics and false information from them.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): There are not so many of them—only four.

Mr. Galley: There are not so many of them.

As more resources and better equipment are being provided for the NHS, as there are considerably more staff now than before and as more patients are being treated, all the evidence is that the NHS is sound. Over the past five or six years we have increased expenditure by nearly 20 per cent. in real terms and there has been better management, which means that an effective response is being made to the growing challenge represented by more people asking for services. On any objective criterion there has been no dismantling of the welfare state. The figures for the number of people being treated and the expenditure incurred show that.

Rising expenditure and the provision of more care facilities in the personal social services mean that those services are sound. Despite the Opposition's attempts to mislead us into believing that we are spending less on social security, it can be shown that, if one leaves aside the effect of increased unemployment, the amount spent on social security is still rising. The Labour party accuses us of a lack of compassion, but over the past five years about 200,000 more people have received attendance allowance, about 200,000 more have received invalidity benefit and about 200,000 more people have received mobility allowance. That is not a dismantling of the welfare state.

Any fool can run a national sickness service which judges its success by the number of sick people in its beds. Any fool can damn a service by quoting isolated cases and figures. Any fool can demand more if he does not know how he is to pay for it. The hon. Member for Oldham, West constantly demands more. We have spent more and more on the Health Service, on social services and on social security and we have spent it more effectively, yet the hon. Gentleman still demands more and more. Now we are beginning to see the price that we will be asked to pay. The demand for more comes with a price tag.

It is well-known Opposition policy to abandon our independent nuclear deterrent, and the Trident programme. Every Opposition spokesman claims that the savings made by abandoning Trident will fund their extravagant programmes. The hon. Member for Oldham, West now claims that the savings from Trident will go towards his expanded Health Service programme. He is, of course, putting aside the Healey speech of 1977 which argued — and there are many Labour party supporters who secretly hold this view — that unless we defend ourselves properly, there will be no hospitals, schools, health centres or doctors, but only a heap of cinders.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West wishes to scrap mortgage tax relief in order to fund his profligate proposals. The Labour leadership may disown him, but as long as the hon. Gentleman is on the Labour Front Bench no home owner can rest easy. It must not escape the attention of hon. Members that the hon. Gentleman wishes to put a tax on sugar in order to fund more NHS expenditure. That would mean the loss of a considerable number of jobs in my constituency and elsewhere. Now we know that he will have to increase income tax, too, in order to fund his extravagant plans.

The fact is that the welfare state is being enhanced. But the facts do not seem to play much of a part in the Opposition's thinking. It would seem that the Labour party and the alliance are off their corporate rockers.

5.43 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) will perhaps forgive me—and I think that the rest of the House will be grateful to me — if I do not pursue his line of argument. At least, I think that there was a discernible line of argument, at any rate at the end of his speech.

Mr. Galley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kennedy: No. The discernible thread made itself known when the hon. Gentleman seemed to say that the plan of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) to tax sugar would somehow reduce Halifax to cinders. However, I shall concentrate on some of the areas covered in the constructive speech of the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) and on the social security review in particular.

The Secretary of State's speech will have done little to quell the anxiety doubtless building up about the reviews and the way in which they have been structured and conducted. For example, last summer I was invited to give oral evidence, as I believe the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) was, to one of the reviews on young people.

Mr. Frank Field: I was invited, but the meeting was not held.

Mr. Kennedy: That may illustrate the very problem that I have in mind. The committee to which I gave evidence was chaired by the then Minister for Social Security, who has now moved to the Northern Ireland Office. Such a far-ranging and profound review — apparently the most fundamental for 40 years—is not well served by changing the personnel halfway through. However much we may disagree with the political views of the personnel involved, I should have thought that consistency was to be welcomed. I mean no disrespect to the present Minister for Social Security. Thus, the hon. Member for Birkenhead made a good point.

Moreover, the revenue neutral basis on which the reviews must be conducted also gives cause for concern. No proper examination is being made of the hidden welfare state benefits which fall under various tax concessions. That is neither even-handed nor consistent. Indeed, it is particularly curious, given that in the Budget the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised us a Green Paper on the possible integration of tax and benefits. Apparently the possibility has already been precluded of any searching examination being made of the status of pension funds and of other allowances which at present give the better off substantial benefits. In any proper review, all of those things should be considered.

In conducting these reviews, the Government have made much of simplification. We would all welcome such simplification, and the Secretary of State is right to acknowledge the consensus that exists on that issue. We would particularly welcome simplification if it led to a higher level of take up for some of the very necessary benefits, such as family income supplement. I think that the last set of figures that I saw showed that the take up of FIS was barely 50 per cent. However, I appreciate that the figures involved are sometimes small for the amounts concerned. We would welcome greater simplification if it were aimed at pumping more resources towards those who need them.

The Secretary of State's speech was significant in revealing that the reviews were clearly a device by which the DHSS could buy some time from the Treasury. The latter has clearly been insisting on major cuts in the social security system. It is bogus to argue, as Ministers do, about the proportion of gross national product currently occupied by social security expenditure, when one reason for the increase in expenditure has been the rise in poverty due to mass unemployment. That is the result of the Government's economic policies. Those on benefits are now to suffer a further cruel blow, because the Government say that as far as possible we must reduce that very dependence which the Government have engendered by their policies.

The short-term relief, or stay of execution, which the Secretary of State was apparently able to buy from the Chancellor of the Exchequer by initiating this series of wide-ranging reviews will turn into long-term losses for the welfare state. There has clearly been a lack of consultation and co-operation throughout between the Treasury and the DHSS. That was shown, for example, in the deliberations of what I might call the Meacher committee into the question of the poverty and unemployment traps.

The Inland Revenue, when giving evidence, said that the type of computerisation which could be introduced to integrate tax and benefits, which we on this Bench wish to see, would have to be of a certain type when in place in a few years' time, or it would not be possible to alter it, radically or in the direction in which a future Government might wish to alter it. The evidence that we are getting shows that the Government are not pursuing that line. That is a clear example of that lack of consultation and co-operation between the two Departments involved, and that is greatly to be regretted.

The state earnings related pension scheme is referred to in the official Opposition motion. I said that there was little in the remarks of the Secretary of State to quell the anxieties. There is no doubt that a legitimate debate could be undertaken into the whole question of SERPS. I listened with interest this morning to some remarks made on the radio by Professor David Donnison, who used to chair the Supplementary Benefits Commission. It cannot be fair — if this is what the Government are intending — to move towards a system by which, for example, the better off, such as retired civil servants, will be guaranteed 50 per cent. pensions, whereas the worse off — those who are poorer because they are at the lower end of the earnings scale even when employed prior to retirement — will remain in a state of poverty compared with others through the abolition of SERPS.

Not only did Professor Donnison make that point, but he quoted the Social Security Advisory Committee in his support, and the Minister may wish to comment on the remarks of that committee on this score. Does he think that SERPS will run into severe problems of funding in future, although that problem need not arise for another half century? His view on that must have an impact on the political decision which will have to be made.

Other points can be made in the opposite direction. In other words, these issues go across the political spectrum and are not common to one political ideology. For example, a case could be made for saying that, in its operation, SERPS has regressive features. Arguments could be made pointing to the need — which we on this Bench would support — for further restructuring of national insurance contributions.

What must be a source of anxiety — I am thinking particularly of last week's Report stage of the Social Security Bill — is that the private sector, in terms of portable pensions, is not in a position adequately to take the slack which would inevitably result from a straightforward abolition of SERPS without its place being taken by what would need to constitute almost a bridging mechanism between the more private and portable pension society towards which the Government wish to aim and what we have at present, which is a reliance by about 10 million people at the poorer end of the income scale on some form of state earnings-related pension.

The Secretary of State acknowledged, when responding in his opening remarks to an intervention from me, the importance of the all-party consensus which surrounded SERPS. I appreciate the caveat which the Secretary of State gave about final decisions not yet having been taken. However, if there is to be change, whatever the direction of that change it is crucial that the Government, so far as humanly and politically possible, maintain that all-party consensus.

In any change affecting pensions in the longer term, the Government should take with them not just the House but the country and, in particular, those who will be ever more dependent upon pensions provided by the state. It is difficult to form a conclusion this afternoon, given the fact that the Secretary of State went to some lengths to say that no conclusion had been reached within the Department to finalise the issue. My hon. Friends and I must therefore reserve judgment on that subject.

We are told that the hon. Member for Oldham, West has been much maligned and misrepresented. Despite the fierceness of the exchanges earlier across the Dispatch Box, it must be worrying for the hon. Gentleman to find on this occasion, despite the ferocity of his attack on the Government—I say this from press reports, and I base my analysis on the writings of reputable journalists, and not the scurrilous ones—that he probably got a warmer reception from the Secretary of State today than he got from his leader and fellow colleagues in the shadow Cabinet when he floated his ideas last week.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman is wrong.

Mr. Kennedy: It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to say that I am wrong——.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman should not believe everything that he reads in the newspapers.

Mr. Kennedy: If the hon. Gentleman is arguing that we should not believe what we read, he is giving the Secretary of State a handy weapon for defending the Government's position over the welfare state.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman must be more selective.

Mr. Kennedy: That is an interesting analysis indeed of this debate.

I have more than a suspicion that the hon. Member for Oldham, West was, as it were, cut loose by some of his senior colleagues to wallow at the Dispatch Box in the uncosted nightmare of his welfare state. I suspect that we shall have severe disagreements with the Government when they come forward with their review of social security. In the meantime, to try to pre-empt what is being done by the Government and come forward with wild and uncosted alternatives is pointless.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West said that his suggestions had been carefully costed. That was a remarkable statement for him to make, given that the leader of his party spoke in Bristol last week about care in the community, but resolutely refused to make any spending commitments. That is at the heart of what the official Opposition are up to just now, but they are playing into the hands of the Government. In the absence of constructive suggestions, the Government will find it easier to sustain whatever policy they finally decide on for fundamentally restructuring the welfare state. I fear—I hope that I shall be proved wrong—that the Government will damage irreparably the principles and practices of the welfare state. Therefore, the way in which some Labour Members are behaving over this entire matter is at best politically naive and at worst politically cynical.

Grave concern must be expressed over the way in which the reviews have been established, the manner in which they have been conducted and the apparent loggerhead situation that exists between the DHSS and Treasury Ministers. I have grave doubt whether the result of all that can be the sincere, far-reaching and radical re-examination which the Secretary of State wants to achieve.

A radical review is necessary if the system is to be made more simple, if more people are to be helped and if we are to remove some of the complexities of the current nightmare of means-tested benefits. Those aims must be achieved if we are to alleviate poverty in Britain. However, I cannot see that being the outcome, and my hon. Friends and I will vote against the Government tonight in view of their record thus far and their approach to the welfare state.

We need to distance ourselves from the reaction and criticism of the Labour party. I do not believe that a mediocre, Maginot line of defence necessarily provides the best means of defence for the poor people of this country. Therefore, my right hon. and hon. Friends and I will continue to advance these arguments throughout the course of the wide-ranging debate which will follow the Government's announcements on SERPS, the welfare state and social security generally.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): Although this is not a very well attended debate, it is an extremely important one, because it provides the last opportunity for the House to deal with the issues relating to the fundamental reform of the welfare state that are to be discussed in the forthcoming Green Paper. It is therefore particularly appropriate to deal with general principles.

If I may comment in particular on the place of the welfare state in the functioning of the economy, we have to deal with the redistribution of income in such a way as not to damage the creation of wealth overall. As a society, we need to make the best of our economic opportunities. We must not devise a scheme for the redistribution of income which inhibits wealth creation either by taking too much from earnings, thereby breaking the back of the system, or by distributing too much and undermining the natural personal efforts of the individual to work and his will to save.

It is a fallacy to suggest that in some way the redistribution of income costs the Exchequer money. If redistribution has genuinely taken place, it does not cost the Treasury anything: the Treasury, or the national insurance scheme, has merely acted as an agent. Those who receive the benefits spend the money. It is the side effects of redistributing income which can damage the economy. Many hon. Members believe that the way in which we are redistributing income now is having a damaging effect upon the will to work and the will to save. If we weaken the functioning of the economy as a whole, we shall, in time, undermine the social services and lower the general standards of living of the population, because we shall all go down together and improverish the whole community.

I believe that there is a maximum that can be allocated to the functions which can be supported through the redistribution of income. Income tax and national insurance contributions combined should not exceed 40 per cent. of an individual's income. However, because of the expectations of a modern European society it would be difficult to operate an acceptable system if the combined rate of income tax and national insurance contributions were very much less than 40 per cent. If we try to force down the figure, we shall encounter disappointment and resentment.

On top of the 40 per cent. that it is reasonable to expect the individual to contribute at the margin, I believe that an employer's contribution of 10 per cent. is appropriate as deferred pay and as a means of building up savings to provide for workers in their retirement. If we are to make the best use of the resources available for redistribution —I am referring to resources in cash, not to services supplied in kind—the redistribution must be planned on the basis of a thorough and factual analysis of household needs, or, as was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle), on the basis of a re-analysis. We are dealing with out-of-date ideas.

Many of us are aware of the fact that there is real poverty, not only in large families but in many smaller families. We need to do more for families and to examine whether too much help is being given in other areas where opportunities are being exploited which the system ought to abolish. We do not know what it costs to raise children in families of different sizes. We ought to be provided with that data, and I hope that the Government will make a special effort to carry out the necessary research. The family expenditure survey is not sufficient.

We also need to analyse the real costs of pensioners living at home, or in institutions, or on their own. We want old people to be independent, but I do not believe that a sufficiently serious comparison has been made of the household costs of pensioners or of the cost to their families if they are unable to be independent and live on their own.

The system for the redistribution of income should also encourage the full take-up of entitlement. We cannot say that a satisfactory system exists if half of those who are entitled to benefit decline to draw their entitlement because of resentment, lack of comprehension, or for reasons of pride or fear of disclosure. A system must be introduced which encourages the full take-up of entitlement. It is worth reflecting that family allowancesand now child benefit have a high rate of take-up, whereas selective benefits invariably lag far behind. This provides a lesson which must not be forgotten. As I have often said, the redistribution of income must be comprehensible, easily administered and not humiliating to the claimant; and it must not discourage people from saving.

I believe that entitlement should be based upon citizenship or it should be derived from the record of contributions. We should aim to reduce to the barest minimum the number of people who are obliged to claim on grounds of need. I should like therefore to spend a little time upon the contributory principle. Many people believe that it is important to rely upon this principle. The reason why the dreadful old national insurance system has lasted so long is that it is felt that there is value in the contributory principle. Although national insurance has become obsolete and incomprehensible, people nevertheless want to hold on to the contributory principle. Therefore, national insurance has not been allowed to die. However, we know that it is a sham. A sham is not a good thing in public life. We ought, therefore, to get rid of national insurance and put something else in its place.

Let us examine the contributory principle in so far as it affects the current account and separate it from the contributory principle in so far as it affects the capital account. Contributions which enable us to run a system in which total destitution does not exist are one thing, whereas contributions which allow personal nest eggs or retirement benefits to be built up are quite different. The current account and the capital account ought to be kept strictly separate when we are dealing with the contributory principle.

As for the revenue account, it is some years since we accepted that the national insurance fund cannot cope on the basis of flat rate contributions. We switched to earnings related contributions for flat rate benefits. I believe that that principle is here to stay, so we must make the most of it. We should recognise that we have blundered into a system which will remain in existence. We should, therefore, ensure that it is comprehensible and seen to be right.

In so far as we are obliged to pay for flat rate benefits by earnings related taxation, we have to recognise that we are relying upon a deeper concept of the obligations and entitlements of citizens than can be founded on actuarial principles. Earnings related contributions and flat rate benefits have no direct relationship with each other; yet somehow we feel that this is the right foundation for the redistribution of income. In effect, income tax is not just one more source of revenue for general purposes for the Exchequer; it has become a personal contribution by which each citizen clears his debt to a generous civilised society, which gives him a basic income guarantee, and establishes his claim to benefit from his membership in the same way as every other citizen.

I believe that we should not abolish national insurance contributions, but, rather, abolish the income tax and call it a contribution. I believe that that should be the foundation of a new self-balancing and self-contained national insurance fund which would draw its revenue from earnings related contributions and pay flat rate benefits in exchange.

On the capital account, the contributory principle should be funded on strictly actuarial and comprehensible principles. This is a topical subject because it has been so confidently predicted that the Government will abolish the state earnings related pension scheme. I have already said in the House that that scheme should go. Retirement benefits and personal savings plans should be founded on arithmetical calculations and the state earnings related pension scheme is not. There should be no built-in transfer of resources such as is inherent in final salary schemes which all too often have the effect of transferring money from the low to the better paid, as I have said before.

In the state earnings related pension scheme, which is funded not on lifetime contributions but on a selection of the best 20 years we are adrift from arithmetic and have, unfortunately, also committed ourselves to paying pensions which our children will undoubtedly be unwilling to fund. It is only a matter of time before the House has to abandon the state earnings related pension scheme in its present form because the resources will not be available to meet the commitment. If we do not recognise that this year in five or 10 years' time, we shall recognise it in the end. The longer we leave the reform of the system, the more difficult it will be in the end to extricate ourselves from promises that ought not to have been made. Therefore the system should be abolished.

Mrs. Beckett: We have, on occasions, debated this matter before with the hon. Gentleman, but I want to draw to his attention the correspondence between his words on the cost and direction of the state earnings related pension scheme and those uttered in 1954 by the Phillips committee, looking ahead 30 years. It said that the retirement age for men should be raised to 68 and for women to 63 and that there should be no increase in the real value of pensions because the country could not afford it. If that committee had been listened to then, as the hon. Gentleman is hoping to be listened to now, the pension today would be £15.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I recognise that in making forecasts about population, unemployment, the growth of the national product and other economic circumstances over long spans of time, it is easy to be wrong. I should love to think that I am wrong in predicting that the growth of the British economy over the next 40 or 80 years will be such that we shall not be able to handle the commitments that we are making to ourselves in this particular pension scheme. But it is wrong to make forecasts based on nothing except hope. If we build our pension expectations on hope rather than the reality of the economy, there is a likelihood that we shall be disappointed. A state scheme should not be founded on estimates which could all too easily be proved to be wrong.

If we abolish the scheme, we must look at the gaps that might be left when it has gone. The Government should encourage savings by all legitimate means. Therefore, I was extremely relieved when the Chancellor committed himself in the Budget to the principle of "save now, pay tax later." All occupational pension schemes in Britain have been built up on the expectation of that tax background and it ought not to be changed for individual personal pension entitlements. Moreover, it should be made available not just to occupational pension funds on an approved list but to every citizen for all classes of saving, including personal pension schemes, nest egg schemes, life insurance and house purchase finance.

I know that what I am saying is radical, but I believe the options should be offered as an alternative which people embarking on long-term financial undertakings such as house purchase or life insurance should be able to consider. They might not want to use that basis, but I can see no good reason why the principle of "save now, pay tax later" should be confined to approved occupational pension schemes. It should be made available to everyone, subject to some safeguards. It should be used as the incentive to encourage the build up of personal capital along the lines suggested by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when she makes it a target that every man should be a capitalist. I hasten to say, because I know that the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) would not like it if I did not, that I want every woman to be a capitalist, too.

Mr. McCrindle: I am following my hon. Friend's arguments closely and I agree that there should be maximum encouragement through tax concessions to persuade people to prepare for their retirement, but if we follow through my hon. Friend's suggestion—that the state earnings related pension scheme should be wound up for the reasons that he has stated—does he agree that there would then be maximum encouragement but no compulsion in attracting the people at present covered by the state earnings related pension scheme to a private pension scheme? Is my hon. Friend about to tell us how he would take care of the situation to which I made reference in my speech of the substantial number of people who, no matter what encouragement they are given, decide for one reason or another not to prepare for their retirement, thereby building up a responsibility on the part of society under our present supplementary benefit system?

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, because it enables me to tread safely on the ground that I have prepared for myself. We should encourage people to build up nest eggs for family or business needs which are not necessarily available for use only in retirement. How then do we ensure that people's retirement is properly catered for and that they do not fall into the temptation of using their nest egg for some other purpose before they reach the time when they desperately need it, when they are no longer able to work? We should not allow the nest egg to be used before retirement age if it is derived from the employer's contributions. The employer's contributions should become a money-purchase fund, put into trust for retirement as a form of deferred pay. I have already suggested in the House that the employer's contribution should be set at 10 per cent. on top of all wages, so that the entire employed population should receive 10 per cent. on top of their wages from their employers in the form of deferred pay. It is really the national insurance contribution which the employer is already making, but instead of letting it lapse by going straight into the fund and being lost it should be retained as an individual entitlement built up on proper money-purchase principles and indexed in an appropriate way. I hope that I shall have time to deal with that. The employer's contribution should usually be available only for retirement and the trustees of the schemes should release the money earlier only in exceptional circumstances, such as invalidity and so on.

The private occupational schemes must be run on lines which conform with public opinion. If we are to abandon the idea of a state minimum scheme, the private schemes must operate on a unisex basis and give fair treatment to the early leaver, including his existing accrued entitlements. I do not want to go over suggestions that I have made before, except to say that by differential tax treatment of the income from the fund in the occupational pension trust so as to favour that part of the fund which is allocated to individuals rather than the unallocated account, we can put the occupational pension schemes in a position, without any element of retrospection, where they would wish to give his full accrued entitlements to the early leaver.

There must also be adequate recognition of the claims of mothers—or, indeed, of parents of either sex—who withdraw from work to be remunerated in cash in order to raise their family. I recognise that the 20-year rule in the existing state earnings related pension scheme was introduced to help women who did not have a full record of contributions; but it was the wrong way to approach it. It might be worth exploring the idea that the parent who is able to draw child benefit should also be entitled to establish a claim to pension rights on that account—in other words, a motherhood pension credit.

The House has argued for many years the difference between indexation related to the retail prices index and the alternative based on wage rates. At one time we gave pensioners the option of whichever was the best system for them. Neither was right. In future the pensioner's entitlement must be based on the real development of the economy — the actual capital market. I should like savings which are allocated to individuals to fructify in real terms in line with the general development of the wealth of the community. In other words, pensions should be funded on a spread of real assets. In that way, if there is growth in the economy, the pensioners will participate in it. If we go through bad times economically, the pensioners will be on the same footing as the rest of society.

Many employers cannot afford to run their own pension schemes. If we abolish the present state scheme, there will also still be a need to cope with casual and part-time workers and others who need to belong to an earnings related scheme just like everyone else, even if they have low incomes, but which can cater for their particular working habits. There should therefore be a Post Office scheme which gives indexation by reference to the yield, from time to time, of Government indexed stocks. Employers who take on casual workers even for short periods at low wages should still be obliged to make a 10 per cent. contribution to a Post Office fund on behalf of each worker. The money can then build up on the basis that it has been invested, perhaps notionally, in Government indexed stocks. Private schemes should guarantee at least to do the same.

I want to deal briefly with householders' costs, household subsidies, mortgage interest relief, which has been made topical by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), and the reform of local authority finance. Local authority finance is all part of the scene and should not be regarded as a separate matter. In seeking for a reform of the rates, we have considered local income taxes, local VAT, a poll tax or lightening the burdens on local authorities by taking them back on to the central Government budget. None of those has proved to be satisfactory. We have talked about rates for years without coming to any conclusion. Rates are an intolerable burden in my constituency, and something must be done as a matter of urgency.

Mortgage interest relief is a random benefit. I am glad that it was the hon. Member for Oldham, West who put his foot on the mine and exploded a volume of abuse and public reaction. If it had not been him, it might have been me who made the recommendation, because the way in which we help householders is in some respects wasteful and in others insufficiently helpful.

There is certainly room for reform of the system for the support for house purchase.

Mr. Winnick rose——

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I have spoken for so long that, unless the hon. Gentleman is determined to press me, I should like to finish my remarks.

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman has raised a point that I should like him to clarify.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: When I have finished, the hon. Gentleman may think that I have dealt with it.

Housing subsidies have a low take-up, and that is most unsatisfactory. Supplementary benefit rent allowances are also unsatisfactory and uneven. I am sure that in some parts of the country they tend to increase rents for low-grade accommodation. Rate support grant is the most uneven and unpredictable of all the forms of subsidy that we pay to householders. Let us be under no illusion: rate support grant is a form of household benefit which reaches householders by indirect and incomprehensible means. The key to the reform of local authority finance is to put householders in a better position to meet their essential outgoings.

We look forward to the Green Paper proposals. I am confident that my right hon. Friend will approach them in a generous, sensible and responsible spirit.

Mr. Winnick rose——

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: As I shall not be detaining the House for much longer, perhaps the hon. Gentleman and I can meet afterwards to discuss these points.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will take account of the effects of taxation as well as the benefit system. My only fear is that his proposals will not be sufficiently radical, comprehensible and firmly based on moral principles. If he listens to what has been said on both sides of the House today, he will be helped in the preparation of his Green Paper, which will be widely read, and with great interest.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): It is usually a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). I am sure that he will understand if I do not pick up all the themes that he illustrated. I disagree with one of the main thrusts of his argument—what should be done about the state earnings related pension scheme. I think it is the first time that there has been such a disagreement when I have followed him.

What linked the hon. Gentleman's contributions to those of both Front Benches was that he applied a broad brush to a large canvas. I wish to paint a much smaller picture, but first let me make a couple of introductory remarks. The proposals that my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) outlined to the press recently have come in for what some people have taken as an attack. I should like to use the opportunity to put my views on record. If there is any criticism of his proposals, it must be that they are not sufficiently radical and not that they are too radical. Conservative Members will be misreading the feeling on the Opposition Benches if they do not grasp the fact that Labour Members wish a future Labour Government to have an attack on poverty as their number one priority. If we are serious about that, and about delivering money to those at the bottom of our society, the programme will be costly. We must study those costs carefully and set out how they will be met.

My hon. Friend's proposals were modest. He supported them by limiting the amount of relief going to those buying their own homes. I am one of those Members who wish to see an extension of home ownership on a scale which is not perhaps supported by all Opposition Members. But it is crucial that we consider not only mortgage interest tax relief but the other 100 or so major tax benefits which cramp any Government's style when they try to achieve their objectives.

One of the main reasons why the Government failed this year, as they did last year and the year before, to deliver on their central election pledge—to cut taxation—is that before the Chancellor rises to deliver his Budget statement he has already forfeited the right to levy taxation on over 50 per cent. of personal income. That income has been exempted by one or other of what should be called "tax benefits."

If there is to be scope for the proposals that I should like to see brought into operation—taking people out of tax and cutting the rates of tax, as well as building a welfare state which acts as a floor upon which people can build by their own efforts rather than a ceiling which traps them into poverty—the crucial issue of tax benefits must be faced squarely.

If the Labour party is to become an alternative, radical Government, it must consider applying a policy of cash ceilings on these tax benefits. Only this policy will give the Government room to manoeuvre. It would enable them to raise some benefits, take some people out of tax and cut tax rates. I agree that that would be an approach different from that of previous Labour Governments. It would be a libertarian approach. It would be one which wishes to see people have more money in their wage packets and for them to choose what they do with it, rather than today's paternalistic state whose people receive relief and support only if they spend their taxed income in a way in which the Government approve and support by way of tax benefits.

Mr. Winnick: My hon. Friend and I may agree or disagree, but I believe that the bulk of tax relief on mortgage interest is justified. Every help should be given to people who are buying their own homes. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is interesting to note that time and again, as they did tonight, Tory Members speak against subsidising the better off, but they are not critical of giving tax relief, without any qualification, to those earning £30,000 or more a year? Is there not an inconsistency and deep hypocrisy in that attitude?

Mr. Field: There is inconsistency and hypocrisy. One of the good things in the debate has been the efforts—if I can use the phrase in the House — which has been made to rubbish the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West. I hope that the exercise continues, because I want my constituents to hear what may be on offer to them if we are successful in achieving the election of a future Labour Government. The electoral mine of which the hon. Member for Kensington spoke might be one upon which the Government step rather than my hon. Friend. One of our problems in the past has been to convince voters that we have a programme which will work and will deliver resources and cash to those at the bottom of the scale.

Again, with reference to my hon. Friend's intervention, I, too, am not in favour of abolishing mortgage interest relief. My proposal is that the cash ceilings, which we have seen applied so ruthlessly to the traditional welfare state, should be applied to those who, in the welfare state, gain tax benefits.

The Library very kindly did some work for me on four of the major non-personal tax benefits and looked at the extra revenue we would have gained if a cash ceiling to those benefits had been applied at the beginning of the previous Labour Government. Had it been applied, we would have had an additional £17·5 billion to distribute in ways that this Chamber may wish to debate.

On the one hand, we lament the failure of this House to control Government expenditure; yet, on the other hand, many of us seem unwilling to come to grips with controlling the Government's tax expenditure. If we are serious, we need to begin a debate about those tax benefits which, as I said earlier, exempt over 50 per cent. of all personal income from tax.

At the beginning of his contribution, the Secretary of State was rightly asked whether he intended to stand by the very clear commitment that he gave to the House not to disrupt current pensions proposals. We learnt from the Secretary of State's reply that there is a new definition of a political commitment. One gives a political commitment and holds to it until one has established reviews. Should those reviews produce proposals — which one has engineered anyway—to abolish a commitment, one has to allow that commitment to be sidestepped.

I wish to concentrate on my concern over what is to happen to the state earnings related pension scheme. In doing so, I disagree with the hon. Member for Kensington but agree with the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle), because one of the aims of the reviews is supposed to be to give us a more simplified welfare state. There appears to be a possibility that the Government, to save some revenue at some time in the next century, may be prepared to cave in to pressure to abolish the state earnings related pension scheme. The advantages of the scheme are important, and I shall remind the House of them.

If the scheme comes to fruition it will be the first scheme to be put on the statute book since Beveridge which offers the hope of breaking the link between poverty and old age. It may not do it as successfully as was hoped by some of those who promoted the scheme in 1975, but it will certainly do it on a scale the like of which has not been seen before. If the Government's aim is to simplify the welfare state and to cut down the numbers claiming means-tested assistance, whether by means of supplementary benefit or, if they have been floated off it, housing benefit, it will be a major error of judgment to overturn the all-party agreement on pensions proposals for the sake of a very small gain in terms of public expenditure in the distant future.

The second advantage of the scheme — I was so surprised that the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar did not make the point that I now wonder whether I fully understand the scheme — is that it sets a minimum standard for the private schemes. In other words, an employer can contract out his employees into private arrangements only if he is offering proposals which are better and more generous than the state minimum scheme. Therefore, one is losing, without any extra civil servants or any bureaucracy whatever, that regulation of the private schemes which has been so beneficial up to now. It has set a minimum floor, and the private schemes, to attract customers, have had to offer something better. I always thought that Conservatives, as a matter of philosophy, were willing to undertake that sort of competition with the state scheme. Now that perhaps competition appears to be tough the only way to compete is to abolish the state scheme.

The third big advantage of the state scheme is that it offers the best deal to the lowest paid. That aspect was touched on in a number of contributions by Conservative Members. It offers a deal to the low-paid that they are unlikely to get in the private sector, for the very simple reason that much of the private sector is not interested in those on low earnings.

Because the scheme is so advantageous to the low-paid, and because most women are low paid, it offers the best prospects that women have ever had from any pension scheme, whether private or public. Therefore, if the Government abolish the scheme, they will not simply be taking away the potential pension from the lowest paid; they will be seen to be making a major attack on the future living standards of women.

The fourth reason why the scheme should be supported is the one that I touched on at the beginning—that it allows us to simplify the welfare state. It guarantees people basic pensions which will take them above the eligibility level for means-tested assistance. How much simpler it would be to float people off poverty by this scheme than by the proposals hinted at by the Government. If the Government's proposals go through, we shall see the first moves towards dismantling the welfare state.

Some of my hon. Friends, in their eagerness to defend the interests of their constituents and to promote our cause, have sometimes talked about the Government dismantling the social security system. I do not honestly believe that one can make that charge stick at present. There have been cuts, and I shall deal with them in a moment. Those individual cuts have been catastrophic for individual claimants but Opposition Members cannot claim with any seriousness that we have yet seen the dismantling of our social security welfare state. But the leaks of the past 10 days or so concern proposals which, if put into practice, would make that charge stick.

It is because I want to warn the Government about the moves which may be made, but also to support them when they have managed to resist Treasury attacks, that I say how pleased I am to read that it appears that the Government have been successful in defending the child benefit scheme. If that is correct, they are to be congratulated. I suppose that it is a sign of the times in which we live that Opposition Members can stand up and say that the Government's defence of a basic measure, such as child benefit, calls for congratulations. Be that as it may, it is important to list the advantages. It is the most effective benefit that we have for tackling family poverty. It is the only benefit that we have for maintaining tax equity between those with children and those without children. It is the most effective way of giving people an incentive to work. It is, as we know—thanks largely to the campaign led by the hon. Member for Kensington—a benefit which is paid to women, and it is a crucial benefit to them.

I should like to underline one of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West concerning the charge that we are beginning to stick on the Government. I want to play my part in getting that charge to stick, because I believe it will have an effect on the result of the next general election.

In his opening remarks, my hon. Friend looked, on the one hand, at the tax cuts that have benefited those at the top end of the incomes scale and, on the other hand, at the cuts that have been made in social security so far in this Parliament and in previous Parliaments. As the Minister of State knows, the major cuts have been in breaking the link between earnings and pensions and what are called the long-term benefits.

I ask the House to recall the 1979 Budget. The surtax payers, as they used to be called, gained £1·6 billion in that Budget. They constituted less than 6 per cent. of all taxpayers. They will go on gaining those tax concessions until we elect a Government who will reverse that 1979 Budget. We are now in the sixth year of tax cuts to the rich, and that gives a total of almost £8 billion. The Library note, prepared some time ago for my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West, refers to the cuts in social security since 1979, which equal a little over £8 billion. Therefore, one sees the direction of redistribution under the Government. There have been cuts in the benefits to which many of our constituents were entitled under the previous Labour Government to finance the tax cuts to the richest in our society.

The Minister of State may not like it when the main Opposition spokesman, in opening a debate, never fails to mention those tax cuts to the rich. I reassure him that many of us in the Opposition are doing our best to make the charge stick that there have been cuts in benefit and that those cuts have almost exclusively financed the tax cuts to the very rich.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman explain how he can talk about cuts when in fact there has been an increase of £8·5 billion in expenditure on social security under this Government, which is a 28 per cent. real increase?

Mr. Field: I am happy to do so. The hon. Gentleman should ask the Library for a copy of the note that it prepared for my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West, published on 6 February this year. In that note, the cuts are set out in detail. It is as well to remember that there are now many more old people claiming old-age pensions, and the Government have done their part to increase the number of unemployed. This is why it is not impossible for the total social security budget to increase. Yet at the same time, and in the way I explained earlier, the Government have made cuts in provisions such as the earnings-related supplement. It is a paradox that the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) seemed unable to explain.

If we look at the figures, we see that the amount spent on health has increased under the Government, yet when I and other Opposition Members and, I guess, many Conservative Members go to our constituencies and see what has happened, we are faced with a catalogue of cuts. It is a paradox that Conservative Members have to explain not only to us but more importantly to the electorate. At the same time they need to try to explain away how they have benefits in order to ensure that the very rich in our society, those who are most privileged, can pick up a cool £8 billion since the Government were returned to power in 1979.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I shall talk about the retirement pension, but one remark by the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) should not be allowed to go without comment.

The right hon. Gentleman was comparing at length the deficiences, as he saw them, in the health services provided in various European countries with the way in which he thought they were being provided in this country. One can make a simplistic point that one never spends enough on the Health Service. I doubt that there is anyone in the House who would disagree with the proposition that one can always spend more on the NHS, and spend it usefully, wisely and correctly.

The reason for that is that there has been a complete transformation—a revolution even—in the various types of medical aid that one can usefully give. The founding fathers of the NHS did not have to consider the sort of things on which we can now usefully spend money, such as transplant surgery and open heart surgery—a whole range of techniques which, when the NHS was founded, would have appeared to be out of science fiction. Unless one does one's forebears the courtesy of looking at the facts as they must have seemed to them, it is incredible that it was thought that once the NHS was established there would be a reduction in cost through the years. It was thought that once the health of the nation was placed on a sensible and positive footing, the costs would decrease. Of course, that has not happened because the more one spends on medical research, the more things there are that can be genuinely done for the citizen, and so more money should be spent.

The right hon. Member for Western Isles did not address himself to that possibility. However, he quoted highly selectively the statistics that he had managed to get hold of. If he had really wanted to help the House on how our NHS compares with the provision in European countries, he might have drawn to our attention a publication called "Cost and Containment in Health Care", which was produced last year by Professor Abel-Smith. Unless I am doing him an injustice, I would guess that the professor is no particular friend of the Conservative party. Certainly in the past he has been an adviser to two Secretaries of State for Social Services, both Labour. Yet his conclusion, perhaps sorrowful, in that publication was that if one ignores the rhetoric that we hear about increased waiting lists, cuts in NHS, savage reductions and so on, looks at the reality and compares the provision that we make with that on the Continent, in so far as there has been any reining in on the increases made, the Government's record is a great deal better than that of any of our competitors. That is why, when one starts comparing our Health Service with that on the Continent, one must go beyond the rhetoric and look at what has actually been done.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Like the hon. Gentleman, I am a devotee of Abel-Smith. While the hon. Gentleman is referring to that document, will he quote the per capita index that Abel-Smith gave, starting with 580 in the United States, going down through the industrialised countries of Europe and finishing with the British contribution of 230?

Mr. Nicholls: If we were both armed with the text, I am sure that we could have a medieval debate in which we would go through each point in our respective cases. What the hon. Gentleman says is true, but we cannot follow that line and still conclude the debate at 10 o'clock. We must consider other matters as well such as the expectations and standard of living of any given country. Such things have to go into the equation as well.

I was picking up the point made by the right hon. Member for Western Isles. He said that it was true, as if it were written in tablets of stone, that our services did not compare well with those on the Continent. The only point that I was making was that when one talks about cuts and reductions, the fact is that a left of Centre academic with impeccable credentials has said, whatever else one might say about the Conservative Government and how frightful they might be, that that specific point was not true.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I do not wish to enter into any individual medieval joust with my hon. Friend, but does he not agree that if the figures were for state spending in the United States as opposed to the vast amounts spent privately there we would come out a great deal better?

Mr. Nicholls: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. No one would deny that. Usually, when I have spoken in a debate that has not been as elegant and well mannered as this, and have mentioned those figures and the fact that there was a publication called "Cost and Containment in Health Care" and when I have made that central proposition and said that that was the conclusion that the author reached, I have been howled at and there have been shouts of "Adam Smith group" and so on. When it is then found that that was the conclusion of a Left-wing academic, some people have looked puzzled. I shall finish on a point that I had not intended to make. Sometimes one can be rather too simplistic. I say with great deference to the right hon. Member for Western Isles, with all his experience, that his speech was an example of how simplistic one can get.

It is not surprising that I wish to talk about retirement pensions as a greater than average number of my constituents live on retirement pensions. I wish to consider the effect on retirement pensioners of what the Conservative party has done and has on offer and of the alternative offered by the Labour party.

I always find distasteful and ridiculous any claim that one party or the other lacks compassion for retirement pensioners. I do not believe that that is true of the Conservative party and I would never make the mistake of suggesting that the Opposition are lacking in care or compassion for the elderly. It is in no way inconsistent or pejorative to say that, although the Labour Government cared desperately and genuinely about proper services for the elderly—there was no doubt as to their aspirations and the genuineness of their compassion—the record shows that their efforts to provide care for those sections of society who desperately needed it proved in the end to be inept. There is no need to dwell on the fact that for two years running the Labour Government were so strapped for cash that they could not even afford the Christmas bonus or the fact that people who had put something by during their working lives to provide a little jam in their twilight years found their savings wrecked by inflation.

The tragedy of the Labour Government's attempts to care for the elderly was summed up in their attempt to link pensions with earnings. No one would deny that that was a noble aspiration, but for three of the five years in which the link was in operation the Labour Government had to fiddle the figures to provide pension increases below those required by their legislation. With the charity of hindsight, and given that we are now in government, one can sympathise with the dilemma in which the Labour Government found themselves. That dilemma was most graphically illustrated when the then Secretary of State, Mr. David Ennals, was chided for fiddling around looking for ways to get out of implementing the Labour Government's legislation and commented in relation to earnings figures:

> "There is a statutory obligation to take these figures . . . into account, which was done, but no statutory obligation to get it right".

Mr. Frank Field: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that many Opposition Members would not seek to defend all the actions of the Labour Government, especially the manoeuvrings on pensions? Will he also accept, however, that pension levels were higher as a result of the formula laid down by the Labour Government—so much so that the Conservatives have found it necessary to abolish the formula and especially the link between pensions and earnings?

Mr. Nicholls: I in no way wish to attack any Opposition Member for the difficulties that the Labour Government encountered in this area. I do not know whether I am in a minority on this, but I have never found it necessary to attack Socialism, which I abhor, by suggesting that there is a lack of compassion in that system. I would say many other things with which the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) would no doubt disagree, but I would not go so far as that. I was merely pointing out that the dilemma arose because the Labour Government's economic policies made the care that they sought to provide an impossibility.

The present Government made a pledge to keep retirement pensions in line with inflation. I shall be commenting on that as a mean level of achievement, but at least that promise, which did not raise great expectations, was kept. In the end, one cannot divorce compassion from the social and economic policies which make it possible in practice. Even if we can show that our fiscal policies have allowed us to make better provisions for care than those that the Labour Government achieved, we still need to go further. Just because we are better in one sense does not mean that that is the final word.

I am concerned about the way in which we sometimes present what we have been able to do for pensioners. The undertaking that we gave was relatively modest, but we stood by it and we have managed to keep pensions just ahead of inflation. In short, we have kept faith with the pensioners. That is true in as much as we said what we intended to do and we carried out our promise to the letter. My postbag, however, which is my most valuable instrument in assessing what is going on out there, shows that a significant minority of pensioners do not believe that the Government have kept faith with them. Why do they make that judgment?

Mr. Winnick: Because it is right.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman made no attempt to intervene when I was pointing out as compassionately as possible that the Labour Government's record on care for the elderly, however good its aims and motives, did not stand up in practice—so it ill behoves him to make that comment now.

Why do some pensioners believe that we have not kept faith with them? Answering that question may have unhappy consequences for some Opposition Members in marginal seats, but it is worth examining for a moment why, although we have carried out our promise to the letter, pensioners are still unhappy. I suspect that it is partly because many of today's pensioners do not know what it was like to be a pensioner under the Labour Government. People now in their early sixties and some even in their early seventies did not experience the wrecking effect on pensions of inflation of 20 per cent. and above, nor did they experience the disillusion of being promised that pensions would rise with earnings only to find the Government who made that promise using devious tactics to get around their own legislation. Most people who are still working and earning are not seized of the realities of living on a retirement pension. It is only when they find themselves living on a pension that they appreciate those realities.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman mentions manoeuvring and wonders why the pensioners in his constituency are discontented. He may have forgotten or perhaps not even noticed that the Government have twice changed the method of calculation, at a cost to the pensioners on each occasion, as well as delaying payment, sometimes for one week and sometimes for two, which on at least one occasion cost pensioner couples £12·30. Perhaps the pensioners in the hon. Gentleman's constituency remember that.

Mr. Nicholls: I am not sure that that is the best argument for the hon. Lady to advance. If she wishes to compare the historic and the forecasting methods of calculation she must bear in mind that the basis was originally changed because the Labour Government were strapped for cash. If she does not wish to take my word for it, Barbara Castle's diaries may refresh her memory. The motive for the change on that occasion was scarcely an honourable one. If the hon. Lady is suggesting that there has been chicanery, she should be looking in the mirror of her own party rather than accusing us of devious behaviour.

If I am right on the first point—and the support that I am receiving from my hon. Friends suggests that I am—a second point follows. We talk about keeping pensions in line with the cost of living, but what is important is the ingredients in the cost of living index. An elderly person may find that the price of biscuits at the local supermarket has risen from 22p to 30p. He will not be consoled by being told that if he had bought a Japanese video recorder instead he would have found that the price had fallen. The things that pensioners of necessity buy are very often the items on the up side of the index, not the down side.

If we cannot find the answer to that problem, what consolation will there be? If we continue to say that we have kept faith with the pensioners and intend to carry on without any change, it is conceivable that we shall lose office. The mere fact that we were right and that the pensioner's assumptions were wrong will be small consolation; and if the pensioners are misled by the blandishments to which they will be subjected at the next election about all the treats in store for them—free television licences or perhaps even free televisions, massive increases in pensions, and so on—they will subsequently suffer, too.

As the hon. Member for Oldham, West has been told time and again, it is no good promising those on benefit marvellous treats and goodies if no attempt is made to cost the treats. I often read Tribune for light relief. On 16 July 1982, the author of an article said:

"A major concern . . . must be the failure to cost adequately or to make a priority of the social programme."

Those words may strike a chord in the mind of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. They were written by his wife.

Something must be done. What is the essence of the problem? The retirement pension for a single person is £35·80 a week. For a married couple it is £57·30. We have kept faith. We have run the nation's finances in such a way as to make decent pensions a reality. Even so, no one can say that £35·80 for a single person or £57·30 for a married couple is a princely sum. I doubt whether any of my hon. Friends would be satisfied for ever and a day if their parents were living on £57·30 a week. It ill behoves the Opposition to criticise us on that score. The pensions may be modest but they are genuine pensions, in that they can be afforded. However, we cannot be complacent about them. We must face the fact that, for our parents and for others, living on that amount of money is not an attractive prospect.

If something must be done, where is the inspiration to come from? Clearly, it will not come from the Opposition. We saw their track record in office, although I acknowledge that their aspirations were admirable. However, with perhaps the single exception of the hon. Member for Birkenhead, the Opposition are doing no constructive thinking. They are suggesting the old remedies that failed before.

A long time ago, the hon. Member for Birkenhead gave me a valuable lesson when we were both addressing a grammar school in Dorset. Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, and I hope that I learnt something on that occasion. But when even the hon. Gentleman—with all his moderation and independence of mind—talks about making cuts so that money can be given to the rich, one begins to despair about what may be in store for the Labour party. It has never realised or acknowledged that there is no question of money being given to the rich. It is the rich, or those who pass for rich, who earn the money in the first place and can pay the taxes that make pensions and benefits a living reality.

We have heard the hon. Member for Birkenhead musing on the possiblity that mortgage interest relief might have to be cut, even though the Opposition believe in it. Let us consider the reality. One can have interest relief on a maximum mortgage of £30,000. In London, many couples, earning less than hon. Members earn, have to scrape together the money to buy a house costing perhaps £50,000, and £50,000 will not purchase an especially desirable residence in London. That couple will get no income tax relief on £20,000 of the £50,000. The hon. Gentleman does not use the same apocalyptic terms as his hon. Friends would use, but he muses about putting the squeeze on such couples. He must face the fact that, if he did so, couples whose ability to afford private occupation is marginal would decide that it was not worth it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) was wrong to beckon the hon. Gentleman to come and join us. For all his moderation, he makes the fundamental error of not realising that every benefit he wishes to pay, and every good deed he wishes to do, will in the end have to be financed by someone else. If the Opposition cannot provide the answers, where shall we find them? Perhaps because it is a Monday and the dinner hour is approaching, none of my hon. Friends of what one might call the corpulent tendency is present. No one has waddled into the Chamber in order to tell us that the charter for jobs, if extended, will provide the answer to all our ills.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh) rose——

Mr. Nicholls: Those remarks were not intended to apply to my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt).

The former grandees of our party can give us no help in this area. However, something can be done. We need to recognise that we cannot for ever repeat that we have kept faith with the pensioners and that we intend to keep benefits in line with inflation, and assume that that is enough. We must at least recognise that something else is called for.

The Government believe, and I share their belief, that their economic policies will in the end bring about a real increase in national wealth. That will bring down unemployment in real terms, so that more people will pay more tax. Money, having fructified in the pockets of the people, will then be available in taxation. The time is bound to come when national resources will be more plentiful. The Government should assure us that, when that happens, the improvement of retirement pensions in real terms will be a high priority. That could be done—taking an analogy from tax thresholds—by increasing the old-age pension progressively beyond the rate of inflation. Alternatively, we could study the ingredients of the cost of living index and include in it some recognition of what retired people have to spend their money on.

Tonight I ask only for a recognition of the fact that, while the Government are quite right to call attention to what they have achieved for the retired and to the ineptness of the Opposition's attempts to do something similar, something more still needs to be done. The retirement pensioner needs to be assured that at some time in the future, when the resources are available, he will be a priority. That is a realistic demand. It is well within the ambits of Government policy. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to give me some assurance on that point tonight.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Most of the debate has concentrated on social security and social benefits, and it will not surprise the House if I consider what the Opposition regard as the jewel in the crown of the welfare state—the National Health Service.

The fluency of the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) and his comments on the NHS tempt me to follow him. I thought that I was the only hon. Member to have read Brian Abel-Smith's excellent dissertation comparing health care in Europe. I find that the hon. Gentleman shares the honour with me, and I hope that many more of his hon. Friends have read it. I shall resist the temptation to talk on that subject because of his warning that if we were to enter into such a debate we should be here until midnight and the debate might be like those medieval ones on how many angels dance on the head of a pin. Health provision in the United States is private, but 10·5 per cent. of gross national product is spent on it. The comparable figures are 8·5 per cent. for Canada and 6 per cent. for the United Kingdom.

I charge the Government with dismantling the NHS by degrees. A fundamental principle has been ignored since 1977. Between 1953 and 1977 there was consensus under such people as Iain Macleod, who was the most intelligent Tory Health Minister that we have ever had. The most basic principle was that health care should be free at the time of need and paid for at the time of health. That basic concept has been eroded. Whereas 85 per cent. of the Health Service's resources come from taxation and the average family man with two children pays £1·40 each week for prescriptions, irrespective of whether he has them, now only the sick pay twice.

[Mr. Laurie Pavitt]

I accuse the Prime Minister of giving an insincere performance on television at the Tory party conference in 1983. Cancer cases face the impact of financial stringency because of the great advances in chemotherapy. At the 1983 Tory party conference the Prime Minister showed a great deal of sympathy for a widow who had to pay large prescription charges, but prescription charges for women who have had mastectomies are diabolical. The loss of a breast is a traumatic experience, but, with chemotherapy, a young woman who has had a mastectomy pays £2 every three weeks for medicines. That is not the worst thing that the Government have done. From 1971 to 1979, prescription charges were 20p—they are now £2. Worst affected are the chronically sick on permanent medication. On 1 April the annual season ticket was increased to £30·50. People such as those who have had a coronary thrombosis must take tablets for the rest of their lives and pay the £1·40 which they pay as taxpayers, and for the rest of their lives the price of the season ticket too.

There are eight scheduled diseases which the British Medical Association accepts as chronic diseases meriting exemption from prescription charges. There are only 21,000 cases of breast cancer requiring chemotherapy. Exempting women who have had a breast removed from paying £2 every three weeks or £30·50 for a season ticket will not make a large inroad into resources. The Minister knows, as he recently gave me the relevant figures in an Adjournment debate, that it is quite possible to persuade the BMA to accept breast cancer as the ninth scheduled disease.

When discussing the NHS, the House tends to think of hospitalisation. The Secretary of State and the Minister for Health spend most of their time talking about hospitals. Hospitals absorb the greater part of NHS expenditure, but eyes, teeth and medicines are also important. We have gone back to 1950 in our treatment of the loss of sight and back to Woolworths to buy spectacles. The Government are right to ensure that an ophthalmic prescription must be provided, but that is only half of the story, as there is much skill in fitting the right glasses.

The Royal National Institute for the Blind and the National League of the Blind and Disabled have campaigned for people with low visual acuity. People with cataracts, who need four or five changes of glasses, face swingeing increases. The price of a complicated lens has increased from £20 to £60 as from 1 April. The Government's recent legislation on ophthalmic services is part of the dismantling process. Old-age pensioners will have to pay for optical services unless they are on supplementary benefit. Such people and the under-16s are to return to a system which I thought we had got rid of with the Geddes axe in the 1930s, as they will get their spectacles on vouchers. It is insulting to people's dignity to have vouchers. Nobody else has such a system—France and Germany have a reimbursement system.

The increase in dental charges has made nonsense of the principle of free care at the time of use. Because dentists are paid by item of service, people in some parts of the country are told that if work is done on the NHS the dentist cannot do a good job. A constituent came to my surgery on Saturday morning and asked me what to do because he had been told that he required a complicated set of dentures which would cost £56 on the NHS, but that if the dentist did the work privately the job would be done well and cost £190. There are areas such as Leicester where people cannot get NHS dentistry. When talking of the dismantling of the NHS, that is it.

The Government are implementing the Griffiths report too quickly and without sufficient consultation. It is a major reorganisation. We had the 1974 reorganisation, which was such a disaster that the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) had to reorganise it again in 1982.

Morale throughout the hospital service was shattered. For example, senior nursing officers did not know whether they had a job. Just as morale is being restored, the Griffiths report is being implemented, under which managers will be appointed. Many of them know nothing about the Health Service. When the great supremo himself was appointed, he gave a press conference at which he said, "Everyone belongs to BUPA anyway." He was nudged by a civil servant and then said, "I meant that only my friends belong to BUPA," or words to that effect. In fact, only 3 per cent. of the population contribute to private medicine insurance schemes. He also said, "I know nothing about the NHS, but I am a good learner." I wish someone would appoint me to a £70,000 a year job, because I am also a good learner and would be only too willing to accept the challenge.

In 55 AD, Petronius Arbiter said:

"it seemed that every time we were beginning to form into teams we would be reorganised. I was to learn later in life that we tend to meet any new situation by reorganising; and a wonderful method it can be for creating the illusion of progress while producing confusion, inefficiency and demoralisation."

Review boards can do precisely that. It can seem as though they are doing something, when in fact they are creating even more confusion.

The NHS is now being undermined as a result of closure by amputation. I pay credit to the Secretary of State and the Minister for Health, who have fought a good battle for the Health Service against all the monetarist pressures within the Cabinet. If only housing had done so well. However, they failed, because in a monetarist economy there is never enough money, but at least they held their corner.

No Prime Minister will enter a general election without saying, "The Health Service is safe in our hands and we will do more for it." By the same token, no Government will ever say, "We are closing hospitals." I am convinced that, if asked, every hon. Member will say, "But many wards and hospitals have been closed in my constituency. While there may not have been complete closures, there have been effective closures by hiving off bits and pieces, and eventually nothing will be left."

In my own constituency, the district general hospital in Willesden which once had 130 beds now has only 38 geriatric beds. The Wembley district hospital contained a number of specialties, but about three months ago all the acute beds were closed.

Mr. Holt: I have far more knowledge of Wembley hospital than has the hon. Gentleman. Does he accept that the building of Northwick park hospital, with all its modern facilities and excellence, has made Wembley hospital obsolete? The two ladies, who are long since dead, who provided the money for Wembley hospital—the Misses Copland—would have been delighted to know that their hospital had become redundant and unnecessary.

Mr. Pavitt: The hon. Gentleman used to serve on the borough council in my area, which he knows well.

Mr. Holt: The hospital to which the hon. Gentleman referred was in the ward that I represented for 10 years.

Mr. Pavitt: Exactly, and the hon. Gentleman will know that the general practitioners of Wembley tried to get together to save the parts that were to be hived off and that their request was refused by the Brent district health authority. He will also be aware that the doctors wanted to meet at Wembley, but that the district health authority forbade them to hold their meeting on NHS premises.

For many years, the Central Middlesex has been one of the prime district hospitals in the country. When I served on the board, many overseas deputations came to see what a wonderful hospital it was. It then had 750 beds, but that figure has now declined to 450. That hospital pioneered neuro-scientific services. It was the only such service in that part of the country. Those services have now been transferred to Charing Cross, and consequently services which were pioneered in my area have been lost and a department closed.

I have had extensive discussions with the North-West Thames regional health authority about its plans to close acute beds. It is to be done entirely on a statistical basis, with no regard for the needs of the area or the demographic considerations of inner city areas. The decisions are being based purely on the number of beds and specialties required for a given population. I am fighting for Central Middlesex hospital because at this rate there will be no district general hospital in the London borough of Brent come the next decade. The area has 250,000 inhabitants, yet the number of beds in that hospital has been reduced from 750 to 450. Many inhabitants must therefore attend Northwick park or Hammersmith to get the services they require.

The Royal Throat, Nose and Ear hospital is pre-eminent for the services that it offers to the deaf. The Golden Square hospital is part of that complex, yet the Bloomsbury health district has decided that it should close. I am glad that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security is present. When this proposal comes before the Ministry, I hope that it will be realised that demographic change means that there is a greater need than ever for services for the deaf. The elderly and others who suffer from deafness should not be forced to stay at home and be lonely, simply because they cannot hear others. The closure of Golden Square will be a calamity. As well as serving the Bloomsbury area, it is part of the Throat, Nose and Ear hospital and its beds, consultancy services and outpatients clinic are of vital importance to that part of London.

It is often said that Westminster hospital is the House of Commons hospital. Dozens of hon. Members must owe their lives, or the lives of their wives and families, to the services provided at Westminster hospital. The cardiac surgery department is due to close, and Lord only knows why. There are 10,000 people on the waiting list for bypass cardiac surgery, yet at Guy's hospital that department was scheduled for closure for four months until a millionaire came along and rescued it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I apologise to the hon. Gentleman, but I entered the Chamber about a third of the way through his speech. When I saw his name on the annunciator, I knew that it was more than likely that he would be talking about health matters and felt that it was important for a Health Minister to be present.

If the hon. Gentleman is so concerned about the welfare of patients treated at Guy's hospital, I hope that he will encourage the local district health authority to put out its services to competitive tender, because by refusing to do so it is throwing away the chance of saving more than £1 million a year.

Mr. Pavitt: I shall reply to that point in my own fashion and in my own time, but privatisation is another way in which the Health Service is being undermined and dismantled.

As well as being a teaching hospital, Guy's at present offers a comprehensive service. However, other specialties are threatened, because the only way to increase the number of scanners and other items which such a hospital requires is to take the money from another department.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman mentioned cardiac surgery. Will he accept that what he describes as cuts under the Government is an increase in the number of operations by over 300 per cent. during the lifetime of this Government? He may call that cuts, but I do not.

Mr. Pavitt: I have discussed that point with the Secretary of State. I cannot understand how productivity related to the number of people who are ill and have to be served and the increase in the number of operations that have to be performed shows that there is a good Health Service. There is a good illness service. The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that there has been an increase in the number of operations, but there are a number of good reasons for that, not least the new ways in which operations such as hip operations can be done. An increasing number of hip operations are performed, for which I am grateful, but there is still a long waiting list. That is unnecessary, because putting only a little more money into the orthopaedic departments would help solve the problem.

I predict that services will continue to be amputated from Westminster. There used to be a Professor Trevor-Roper, who was a world expert in ophthalmics, working at Westminster hospital, but when he retired the ophthalmics department ended. When the consultant in cardiac operations retired three years ago, he was not replaced, and the department was run down. It is what in housing we would call blight.

The greatest oncology surgeon in the world is Professor Harold Ellis. When he goes in about four years' time, I wonder whether that department at Westminster will close. In five or six years' time we may have a geriatric hospital down the road, with all services concentrated at Charing Cross, the Royal Marsden, and Guy's.

On a number of occasions I have had to listen to the Secretary of State making great claims and saying that we have never had it so good and that there is now £17 million more available than there was under the Labour Government. I find these figures difficult to follow because at the same time as more resources are being spent about 3,000 doctors and 10,000 nurses are on the dole. The last figure that I had from the Secretary of State for Employment showed that 8,900 nurses were unemployed. That was two years ago, but unfortunately I cannot get an accurate figure now. I used to ask for the figure every six months, but on the last occasion on which I asked I was told that the means of collecting the statistics had been changed, so that the figure was no longer available. At the rate at which the figure was rising, I estimate that more than 10,000 nurses are now unemployed.

When I was a child, which was a long time ago, there used to be a magic show in London called Maskalyne and Devants. At one moment one saw it, at the next one did not. The statistics put out by the Government Front Bench on the NHS are somewhat similar. The Government juggle the selective figures so quickly that I cannot pin down any Minister. I feel that I am back again in the theatre of magic.

About five factors show that the amount which the Government claim they are putting into the Health Service is unreal. They are the inflation allowance, demographic change, technological change, redistribution and different services. I have a complete brief with which I could weary the House, but I shall not do so. It shows that the Conservative claims of more and more resources being provided are not revealing the truth.

When all those factors are taken into account, Government expenditure on the NHS looks different from ministerial claims. Out of the 17 per cent. increase claimed by the Government in the five years since 1979, resources have had to increase by 6 to 6·5 per cent. to maintain the level of services. Thus, health authority budgets were cut by 2 to 2·5 per cent. over the five-year period. The real growth in resources in family practitioner services was only 9 per cent., not 17 per cent. I know that the Minister is a student of these matters, and if he wants me to give him the facts and figures, I shall be happy to do so.

The Royal College of Nursing is not the most Left-wing and Socialist of bodies in the National Health Service, and it has agreed to monitor what is happening through privatisation in the National Health Service. Nurses find that when cleaning is not done, they have to do it. Therefore, the Royal College of Nursing is doing what the Government should be doing and ensuring that sanitary arrangements are correct. When there are incontinent elderly people in hospitals, the laundry cannot just be put out. In renal failure, let us compare the figures for patient care. For every 1 million of population in France, 272 people are under treatment, in Greece 269, in Spain 242, in Italy 227 and in Britain 127.

In spite of the disastrous impact of the Government, the NHS remains the greatest part of the welfare state, and it needs to be preserved. There has been destruction of staff morale and erosion, although there has not been a frontal attack. The NHS will be safe only in the hands of the Labour Government when they are elected after the next general election.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Although I accept the sincerity of Labour Members who talk about the need to maintain the state earnings related pension, we are doing something amoral by maintaining such a scheme when it is not actuarily funded. We are asking future generations of our children and grandchildren to pick up the bill for the pensions that this generation will receive. That is something that no hon. Member would do to his family. He would not expect his children to look after him and to hand to them a mortgaged future. However, we are asking future generations to guarantee that this generation will have complete protection, to be paid for by them. That is why I call it amoral, and I believe it to be amoral.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Does the hon. Gentleman mean immoral?

Mr. Butterfill: No, I mean amoral. There is a difference. Immorality is quite different, and perhaps the hon. Lady would care to go the Library afterwards to pursue the point.

Mr. Winnick: I do not understand the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument that it is a sin for one generation to protect the interests of the previous generation. Will not the present generation be protected? Is not that the hallmark of a civilised state? We pay our contributions with the knowledge that not only our parents but ourselves when we retire will not have to live in the poverty in which so many now live. Is that not an important factor to be borne in mind?

Mr. Butterfill: I did not expect the hon. Gentleman to understand my argument. Perhaps it was a little difficult for him to follow. I shall state it again. We are asking future generations to maintain us. We are imposing a limitless charge on their future earnings. That is amoral.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Butterfill: I should like to continue.

Ms. Short: On the question of amorality.

Mr. Butterfill: I should be fascinated to hear what the hon. Lady has to say. I shall give way.

Ms. Short: My understanding is that to be moral is to do something that we would all argue is right and decent; to be immoral is the opposite—to behave wrongly and harmfully—and to be amoral is to be neither moral nor immoral. To be amoral is to be neutral morally. Why does the hon. Gentleman use the word "amoral" about something that he clearly thinks is deplorable? The hon. Gentleman is using words wrongly.

Mr. Butterfill: My understanding differs from that of the hon. Lady. My understanding is that immorality relates to amoral sexual behaviour and amorality relates to something that is not moral. No doubt we can satisfy our curiousity on this point later in the Library. We are digressing from the main subject.

It was interesting to note the wording of the Opposition motion in referring to the "dismantling of the welfare state".

That is a somewhat extravagant turn of phrase, but we have become used to extravagant turns of phrase from the Opposition when we deal with the welfare state and the NHS. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) manages to take extravagance almost to an art form.

I understand the reluctance of the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) to become involved with figures, because he is confused by figures. He suggests that we confuse figures. It might be of advantage to cite a few figures, because there are absolute figures and there can be no argument about what they are. Since the Conservative party came to power, expenditure on social services has increased by a gross figure of £9·5 billion, and a net figure of £8·5 billion. I shall explain later how this difference arises. In real terms, after allowing for inflation, that is an increase of 28 per cent. I do not understand how there can be any dispute about that or how it can be fudged. It is an increase in numbers and in percentage terms.

Many Opposition Members say, "All of that expenditure is to pay for the unemployed." That argument does not stand up to the facts. About £3·25 billion of that sum is spent on the unemployed—about one third of the total increase. I do not believe that any hon. Member would not wish that money to be spent on the unemployed. It means that the overwhelming majority of the increase has been spent on real improvements in social services brought about by this Government.

Mrs. Beckett: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would bear in mind also the vastly increased numbers of pensioners. The majority of the increase to which he referred has not gone on improved benefits.

Mr. Butterfill: I should like to correct the hon. Lady. About £1 billion of the increase has gone on pensions, £2·5 billion on benefits, £1 billion on sickness and disability benefits in the long term, £500 million on single parents and, regrettably, £250 million on administration. Only £1 billion of the increase has gone on pensioners.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman said that the majority had gone on improvements.

Mr. Butterfill: The majority has; it has not all gone on the increased number of pensioners. We have increased pensions above the level of inflation by more than 6 per cent. There has been not just a money increase but a real increase. That goes beyond the guarantee that we gave as a manifesto commitment to maintain pensions in line with inflation. Once again, the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has not cited statistics correctly. Total expenditure on social services amounts to more than £100 million a day and 77,500 staff are employed. [Interruption.] I am glad that it is recognised that the statistics are accurate.

Mr. Winnick: I think that the hon. Gentleman has been conscripted by the Whips.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. It was a personal decision to speak today. The hon. Gentleman flatters me by suggesting that I was conscripted by the Whips. I am delighted to think that that could be so in the future.

The Government have instituted a large number of inquiries into the structure of the enormous machine of state that is the welfare service. There were inquiries in November 1983 on targets; in February 1984 on housing benefits; and in April 1984 on supplementary benefits and families with children—inquiries on a scale not seen previously. It is disgraceful that such inquiries had not been conducted previously in view of the overwhelming part played by social security benefits in the total expenditure. I am delighted that the Government are conducting these reviews. I look forward with great interest to reading the Green Paper.

I am not completely satisfied about what will happen in certain respects. As the hon. Member for Brent, South knows, I am not entirely happy with what happens with regard to some disabled people, especially the blind. I believe that the review that is being conducted should examine disability in a broad way, because some people with specific disabilities—notably the blind—do not seem to benefit from our system. The majority of blind people do not qualify for mobility or attendance allowances. They do not qualify for most of the allowances that are available under our present system, unless they suffer from a second disability. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should consider those anomalies during his review and ensure that, in future, the criteria for benefit do not leave out certain groups who, on any criteria, should qualify for benefit.

Hon. Members listened with great interest to what the hon. Member for Oldham, West said about the Labour party's proposals. I do not wish to detain the House by going through each proposal in detail because that has already been done by many hon. Members. In every case the hon. Gentleman's proposed "improvements" would be made completely without a means test. Labour Members seem to have a pathological antipathy to the words "means test" and suffer a gut reaction every time those words are used. I can understand the historical reasons behind that gut reaction, but they should not prevail today. I do not believe that the circumstances that provoked the initial reaction are applicable in a modern society.

Mr. Winnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Butterfill: If I may develop the argument a little further, the hon. Gentleman will perhaps understand my point. I have given way to him once already. I shall give way later if the hon. Gentleman is not satisfied with what I have to say.

This nation spends an enormous amount on social security and on the welfare services. Indeed, it spends an unprecedented amount in actual money and in real terms. But we do not always tackle certain areas of poverty and deprivation. Despite all the money that we raise and distribute, there are some people who we apparently cannot reach and who remain deprived. Areas with which I have been associated in London have substantial pockets of deprivation of which I, and all hon. Members, should be ashamed.

Why are those people not getting the money that they need? One reason is that we spend a lot of time raising large sums of money in taxation and then redistributing that money to the very people who paid the taxes. Not enough of the money reaches those in need. The whole principle of universal benefits, regardless of need, is extraordinary, and I am surprised that Opposition Members should advocate it. It means that they would give benefits to the rich as well as to the poor. As I said some weeks ago, it is extraordinary that Members of Parliament, or their wives, should expect to receive child benefit. It is patently clear that no Member of Parliament needs to receive child benefit, given the sort of income that he or she receives. Therefore, it is extraordinary that we should continue to pay universal benefits to millions of people who do not need them, at great adiministrative cost. We should be able to devise some way of arranging the benefits system so that the money goes to those most in need, not indiscriminately to everyone.

Mr. Winnick: Surely the logic of the hon. Gentleman's position is clear. He must be arguing that tax relief on mortgage interest should be given only to those in need, although that would not be quite my position. Does he argue that those in receipt of more than, say, £25,000 a year should not get tax relief?

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman is being illogical. In the case of mortgage interest tax relief, we are talking not about giving someone money but about taking less of his own money from him. However, in the case of the benefits system, we are talking about giving some people money and giving others, who do not need it, money, too. That is much less logical. The man who receives mortgage interest tax relief, about whom the hon. Gentleman complains, will also receive all the universal payments that the Labour party and the hon. Member for Oldham, West have been advocating. In the Labour party's terms, that must be adding insult to injury.

Ms. Clare Short: Perhaps I should tell the hon. Gentleman that I have been to the Library and looked up "amoral" in "Chambers Twentieth Century Dictionary." Amoral means

"non-moral outside the domain of morality."

I think that the hon. Gentleman meant to use the word "immoral" earlier.

One facet of means testing that we find objectionable is that people are put through the humiliation of having to declare their income and of having to appeal for something because they are poor. We also question its efficiency. It is enormously inefficient to have a system that requires people to apply time and again, as their circumstances change, and to give all the details of their family's income in order to claim a benefit. It is more administratively efficient to have a tax system that applies across the board, with benefits such as child benefit going to every child in the country. Such a system saves money.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Holt: Perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to intervene on that point.

Mr. Butterfill: Well——

Mr. Holt: Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We cannot have interventions on interventions.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Holt: Will my hon. Friend——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) should deal first with the intervention that is before the House.

Mr. Butterfill: I am obliged to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) for consulting "Chambers Twentieth Century Dictionary." If "amoral" mean "non-moral," it has the sense that I thought it had. But perhaps the hon. Lady and I would differ about what we mean by "non-moral." However, I profoundly disagree with the substance of her intervention. I do not believe that it is necessary to have a system of degrading inquisitions in order to decide who should receive benefits. It should not be beyond our wit to devise a system that does not involve such inquisitions but which nevertheless directs benefits to those who need them most and which does not give them to the rich. I think, for example, of those who obtain substantial tax relief on their mortgage interest, or indeed of Members of Parliament.

Benefits should be directed towards those who need them. But all the proposals of the hon. Member for Oldham, West specifically rule out the possibility of any form of means test. They all suggested that there should be another grand round of universal benefits. That is where the Labour party has got things totally wrong. Although Labour Members are well meaning, and although no one doubts their sincerity, they would create the conditions that would always doom their policies to failure.

Mr. Holt: The harps always come out when people talk about means testing, but no one seems to quarrel about the means testing of those with children in higher and further education. Those children's grants are severely truncated if their parents have earned money. Young people are subjected to the results of means testing. There is apparently nothing amoral or immoral about asking someone how high his earnings are but only about asking how low they are.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, but I think that I have already made my position clear.

Once again the Opposition seem to have spun an enormous web of mystique around the NHS. They have tried to claim that we have cut expenditure on it. To support that, they talk about a hospital or ward that has closed here or there, but they do not consider the entire picture. Indeed, it was pointed out to the hon. Member for Brent, South that in his constituency a massive new hospital has been built. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) for pointing that out. The building of that hospital far outweighs the closure of the hospital that the hon. Gentleman complained about.

We should consider what is being spent on the NHS. Indeed, the figures are well known to Opposition Members and some have even quoted them. Expenditure has increased from £7·75 billion when the Conservative party came into office to £17·5 billion in the current year. By no stretch of the imagination—and Labour Members have certainly stretched theirs this afternoon—can that be called a cut. Of course, one can fiddle about at the edges and find the odd instance of a ward or hospital being closed whilst at the same time forgetting that something has opened in its place. But that increase in expenditure is massive.

I know that Opposition Members do not like statistics, but I should point out that the number of inpatients has increased by 650,000 since the Conservative party came to office. The number of outpatients has increased, too, by 2·5 million. I do not believe that more people have suddenly become ill in the past five or six years. The point is that we are providing a much higher level of service. In one year, 1982-83, the number of outpatients increased by 300,000 — more than the previous Labour Administration managed to achieve in their entire period in office. Thus, I find the attack by Labour Members on the Government's record in relation to the National Health Service extraordinary.

The hon. Member for Brent, South said that the number of heart operations was being reduced. In fact, the number of operations for bypass surgery since the Conservative party came to power has increased by 300 per cent. The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that a substantial increase had taken place in the number of hip transplants. Many new techniques have been developed in recent years, and therefore it is difficult to make a comparison between figures in relation to those developments and what occurred previously.

The hon. Member for Brent, South also complained about the length of waiting lists. In fact, under Conservative rule waiting lists have fallen substantially. There were 752,000 people waiting for operations when the previous Labour Government left power, compared with 508,000 when they came to office, showing that waiting lists increased under them.

Waiting lists are at their present levels because of disruptions by NHS employees. Those disruptions have interrupted the downward trend of waiting lists. That downward trend has been the pattern under Conservative rule, in marked contrast to the way in which waiting lists increased by 50 per cent. under the Labour Government.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): Does my hon. Friend recall how Labour Members and some of the trade unionists whom they claim to represent supported steps which prevented patients from reaching hospitals to be treated, particularly during the winter of discontent? That shows the contempt that Opposition Members have for the treatment of patients and the degree of concern that they say they have for the NHS.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding the House of that.

Ms. Clare Short: Why is the hon. Gentleman grateful for being reminded of that?

Mr. Butterfill: Because it needs to be pointed out. When Labour Members accuse us of not caring about waiting lists, an accusation which they regularly make, they neglect to point out that a major cause of the length of waiting lists has been industrial action which the Labour party supports. They also neglect to point out that waiting lists increased by 50 per cent. under the Labour Government, whereas they have fallen under Conservative rule.

Ms. Short: I do not believe that.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Lady may not believe what I say, but I have given the facts. She may care to check them in the Library.

Ms. Short: I shall, in the way that I checked the hon. Gentleman's definition of "amoral."

Mr. Butterfill: I am sure, when she is checking, the hon. Lady will find——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are having too many sedentary interventions. Sedentary interventions are to be deprecated at any time.

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) has been addressing the House for half an hour. He is, of course, entitled to do so. Perhaps he will make it clear whether it is his intention to speak for another half an hour, in which case those of us who are waiting to take part in the debate will not bother to continue to wait in the hope of being called to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Butterfill: It was not my original intention to speak for this length of time. Regrettably, I have been asked to give way on so many occasions that my speech has taken longer than I had anticipated. I shall, in deference to other hon. Members, conclude my remarks shortly.

Developments have taken place in many complex treatments, such as laser eye surgery, which is extremely expensive, and did not exist previously. Improvements have taken place in almost every sphere of health. The number of infant deaths, for example, has come down by a third since we came to power. All these developments reflect entirely new standards of health care.

Other hon. Members have already referred to increases in manpower in the NHS while we have been in office. The number of doctors has increased by 11 per cent. and dentists by 15 per cent. Such statistics can hardly be called cuts. I do not know what warped imaginations Opposition Members have if they can describe such developments as cuts.

I see improvements occurring in my constituency. We in Bournemouth have waited a long time—longer than my constituents would have wished — for a new hospital. However, we are now getting a major extension of hospital services in the town, with the construction of an enormous new general hospital costing millions of pounds.

That reflects the restoration of the capital investment programme in the NHS — a programme that was severely slashed by the Labour Government. That is the most significant element in Conservative policies, because, without capital expenditure, none of the other services can be operated. As the hon. Member for Ladywood is interested in statistics, she will be pleased to hear that there has been a 23·5 per cent. increase in real terms in capital expenditure under the Conservative Government. I am sure that she will enjoy checking that fact when the debate is over.

We have nothing to be ashamed of in relation to the NHS. Indeed, the Conservative Government have the most impressive record of any post-war Administration, and they are to be congratulated.

8.7 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill). I was particularly interested in his opening remarks, when he went at length into what the Government had done for social security benefits and then went on to make his own special case. I do not complain about that because he is well known for his concern for the needs of the blind, but we can all argue special cases.

I agree with the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) that the Government cannot be accused at this stage of the game of decimating the social security system. However, for those who are in desperate need and have experienced some of the damaging cuts that have individually been implemented by the Government, it is a tragedy, and I include the blind within that number.

That is why I say that the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West cannot have it both ways. He cannot, on the one hand, say that all is well when, on the other, as he knows—my constituency postbag certainly proves it—many people are suffering a very deprived standard of living.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Kirkwood: I shall not give way because I intend to complete my remarks within about 10 minutes.

This is a useful debate. When, initially, I learnt of the subject matter of the debate, I thought that it was somewhat barmy because we would not be able to achieve much. After all, we are looking forward to the Green Paper that is to be published at the end of May or the beginning of June.

I have changed my mind, however, because the debate has probably taken place in a calmer atmosphere than will be the case when we debate that Green Paper. If our worst suspicions, resulting from leaks that have appeared in the press, are fulfilled hon. Members' tempers on that occasion will be difficult to contain.

I agree with hon. Members who have said that the system of social security benefits is not perfect. For that reason I welcome the Government decision to examine the system again root and branch. However, I am suspicious of the Government's motivation. The impetus for this reform has, I believe, come not from any need to minister to the deprivations experienced by the poor but, rather, to control the amount of money spent on social security.

Social security spending must increase because of the demographic changes that are facing the nation. It also has to increase as an inevitable consequence of the Government's policy which has driven more and more people into the hands of the social security system. It is very misleading to treat transfer payments as though they were public expenditure. We have referred to the £40 billion in the social security budget. However, transfer payments are not the same as expenditure on goods and services. They should be regarded as reducing the net yield of tax line tax expenditures — allowances, mortgage interest relief, and so on.

I believe that personal taxation, employers' national insurance contributions and the benefit system need to be integrated. We on these Benches have advanced that argument for a very long time. It is a great shame that while considering housing benefit, earnings related pensions and family income supplement the Government have not taken the opportunity to consider the tax benefits that accrue to the pension system, mortgages and the married man's allowance. The success of an integrated, fundamental review would have been greater if all of these options had been considered simultaneously.

The Green Paper that is to be published later this year could have been a valuable addition to the review system. If the four reviews were to report in advance of the Green Paper on the integration of the tax system, it would not necessarily be the most constructive way to proceed. I am desperately worried that the Fowler inquiries will not propose the wide-ranging reforms that are necessary but, according to the leaks in the newspapers, will promise only piecemeal and cost-cutting changes. The Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, which was chaired by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and published its report in 1983, came to the conclusion that adjustments to the present system would achieve little and that fundamental reform was absolutely necessary.

Every hon. Member has commented on the proposals of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. Although interesting, I believe that they are idealistic and have not been adequately costed, and they contradict the findings of the Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. He advocates a progressive income tax rate within the main range of earnings around average earnings. That proposal would need to be carefully examined.

The biggest shortcoming is that there is to be no increase in the basic retirement pension, apart from a universal heating allowance. Therefore, the elderly would be worse off if supplementary pension as well as supplementary benefit were to be abolished. We on these Benches believe that the whole panoply of the state earnings related pension scheme faces problems. The most worrying is that it provides an insufficient answer.

For decades to come many old people will have little or no state earnings related pension entitlement. An increase of about 25 per cent. is needed on the basic pension. Supplementary pension and housing benefit costs would fall if the basic pension were to be increased by 25 per cent. However, most of the costs would be met by the abolition of contracting out and by halting state earnings related pensions at the present level of entitlement. The Liberal party gave evidence to the Fowler commission along those lines and set out possible alternatives to the state earnings related pension. However, something along those lines could be considered only if all the money saved were used to increase basic pensions. We also believe that legislation would be required to oblige employers to contribute up to a certain level to the personal pension plans for their employees who do not have occupational schemes or who opt not to join them. That has to be considered in the context of a first step towards a complete reform of the tax benefits system.

I support what was said by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) about child benefit. This would be a useful first step towards a tax credits scheme. We believe that child benefit must be left intact and that it should be increased at a faster rate than inflation. Our objective is a tax credit for every individual, with more credits for the elderly and fewer for children, with an intermediate level of claim for young people between the ages of 16 and 18. I support the proposal to establish an educational allowance as a step towards this. This was one of the proposals of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. Within the tax credits scheme there would be an additional credit for sickness and invalidity and there would be extra credits to meet the cost of disablement.

We believe that universal credits would be too expensive if they were high enough to cover all housing costs. Therefore, it would be essential to be able to withdraw credits. Interim measures would be needed before moving into a fully fledged system in order to reform existing benefits such as family income supplement. In the alliance budget proposals of this spring a courageous and properly costed system was outlined which would increase family income supplement in what we consider to be a sensible way. It would provide much needed relief for low-paid families. We must ameliorate the worst effects of the poverty trap. I accept that marginal rates of 70 per cent. to sometimes as high as 85 per cent. on increased earnings for the low paid would be inevitable under any system at acceptable levels of income tax. Ultimately housing finance will have to be reformed and the inflated price of property will have to be reduced. However, mortgage interest tax relief must be retained, but could be restricted to those who are taxed at 30 per cent. and not given to those who pay at the higher rates.

The introduction of these benefits leaves a great deal to be desired. The four reviews are at an advanced stage. If there is to be a tax benefit review later in the year, I believe that the evidence should be published. The Green Paper should not be published at this stage. The evidence should be summarised. There ought to be a proper national debate and a thorough-going reform of the taxation system should then be brought forward. Without this, the possibility of creating a new Beveridge, which I believe to be absolutely necessary, will be very remote.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): There has been some discussion during the debate about the meaning of the words "amoral" and "immoral". I do not wish to become involved in that debate, although I believe that one or other of those words could be applied to the Opposition motion. I was shocked by its blatant propaganda, and I continue to be shocked by the blatant presentation of that propaganda. I was surprised, too, by the brass neck of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) in wishing to draw attention to himself when it was quite obvious from the response of his hon. Friends this afternoon that they are not very pleased with some of his ideas about the welfare state and the policy of the Labour party.

Frankly, we know what the Opposition are up to. Not too long ago I read a statement by one of the leading lights of the Labour party which said that probably one of the finest things that the party could concentrate on before the next general election was the NHS and the welfare state. It was felt that the most capital could be made out of that. It is clear that there has been a cynical manipulation of statistics in an attempt to smear the Government. That is a callous campaign, which inspires unnecessary fears, particularly among old people about the sort of treatment they will get from doctors and hospitals in an emergency. We have heard it all this afternoon — the fevered imagination, the fairy tales and the grossly inflated local examples, all of which when looked at in a national context are complete nonsense. I have come to recognise the Labour party's propaganda about the NHS as the big lie strategy.

It has been well rehearsed this afternoon that in 1985-86 the Government are proposing to spend £17,500 million on the NHS. That is an increase in real terms of 20 per cent. on what the previous Labour Government were spending when they left office. The statistics are there to be read. The Labour Government were spending £7,750 million. There is no question about that, just as there is no question, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) pointed out, that in one year alone the Government have brought about a situation in which the NHS has treated 300,000 more inpatients than during the Labour Government's whole term in office. I cannot see how such statistics, and the many others which are on the record, can be questioned by the Labour party in its cynical campaigns.

In the same way, the Labour party from time to time homes in on waiting lists. It tells us that waiting lists have grown under this Government. But again, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West pointed out, it does not admit that during its period in office from 1974 to 1979 the waiting lists grew. I suspect that that was the Labour Government's own fault, not the result of industrial action. Up to 750,000 people were awaiting treatment in hospital. Those are just a few of the examples that have been well rehearsed during the debate.

What particularly bothers me, apart from that callous disregard of the feelings of old people and those who may become sick, is that that sort of thing is picked up by some people in the media and used because it is sensational copy. Let me single out one BBC television programme which has been mentioned once or twice in the House over the past two weeks. BBC2 made a programme on the children's heart unit at Guy's hospital. I was appalled to see that at the beginning of that programme a caption was put on the screen saying that the problems had been brought about by Government cuts in specialised nursing services. No attempt was made by the producer of that programme to ask the district health authority what it had been doing about its budgets or what kind of contribution it might have been able to make by greater efficiency to improve the services of that hospital to prevent the problems that were being outlined on our television screens for 40 minutes. That is the sort of thing which causes alarm and great worry among our people.

I am well aware that other hon. Members wish to build on the case that my hon. Friends have been making this afternoon. We have heard these inflated statistics from the hon. Member for Oldham, West and from his hon. Friends. Let me remind them of something which the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said after the catastrophic results which his party suffered at the election. He said that the public could not be entirely conned in the way that the Labour party had hoped. He said that the public could not grasp the enormity of the programme which the Labour party claimed would be put before them if it won the election. In the first year alone it would have cost £45,000 million extra. From where was that to be found? Was it to be found from taxation or national insurance? The British public will not be conned by such nonsense. Nor indeed will they be conned by the sort of talk that we have been hearing today about the Government dismantling the NHS and the welfare state.

It is easy to build up expectations, as the Labour party is obviously trying to do, but it is far more difficult to deliver those expectations. I can say with complete confidence that the hon. Member for Oldham, West has delivered the next general election victory to the Conservative party, which we would have won anyway. His statements last week, from which the Leader of the Labour party has so assiduously tried to dissociate himself, are some of the most damaging things that have been said during this Parliament. When I worked as a commentator in broadcasting, we would try to spot the moment when a politician would so grievously put his foot in it that he would lose the next election for his party. Last week was that moment for the hon. Member for Oldham, West and the Labour party.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I think that I can say with confidence that the House is not likely to be conned by the nonsensical remarks of the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey). If he thinks that the campaign of innuendoes, lies and McCarthyism will win the Tory party the next election, he will be proved wrong.

There is no love, and never has been, by the Conservative party, especially among what could now be described as the "drys", for the welfare state. It is interesting that in today's Daily Telegraph, which presumably reflects the views of the drys more than the wets in the Conservative party, we are told:

"However, ministerial nerves seem stronger on the question of the State Earnings Related Pension."

It goes on to say:

"The provision of an income for retirement is best dealt with through the private sector".

[Mr. David Winnick]

There is no doubt in the mind of the Daily Telegraph that the state earnings related pensions scheme should be abolished.

The Prime Minister has repeatedly referred to the United States as the ideal place where there is no Socialism. What she really means is that there is no welfare state there with anywhere near the same provisions as Britain. That is why she holds up the United States in such glowing light. Can there be the slightest doubt in the House of the right hon. Lady's distaste, perhaps even contempt, for state provision except for the very poorest? If ever there was a Tory Member with very little sympathy for state provision, it is the Prime Minister. Every Conservative knows that to be the case.

Between the Labour and Conservative parties there is what can only be described as a philosophical difference in attitude and ideas on state provision in welfare and pension entitlement. The Labour party's attitude was illustrated during 1945-50 and when it was last in office. The Labour party believes that the state has a duty to try to provide benefits and that people should not have to rely on the private sector.

Today, the Secretary of State argued a poor case. He knew that it was when he referred to the large sums being spent on social security. As he knows well—who better — that is due largely to the return of mass unemployment. I have always argued that, however important the social and welfare reforms carried out in the immediate post-war years, the most important was the maintenance of full employment in peacetime. It helped to ensure that the kind of poverty and destitution known before the war were not repeated after 1945.

All the evidence that we now have from our constituencies shows that poverty has returned with a vengeance. I receive—I am sure that I am not the only Member — many letters from constituents on matters affecting social security. I have received more during the past two or three years from people who have to try to manage with their families on the lowest possible income. Of course, some of my constituents come to see me at my surgeries over their problems.

It is interesting to remember that the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) spent a week in front of the television cameras trying to live on supplementary benefit. I watched the programme with interest. At the end of the week the hon. Gentleman was honest enough to admit that he could not manage. He tried to live for a week on the lowest income provided by the state. There are occasions when it seems that the hon. Gentleman is still trying to recover from the experience.

Millions of people, however, have to go through that experience not for one week, one month or even one year. They have to live on such levels year in and year out. They have to live in such poverty because they are unemployed or disabled or both, or because they have to rely upon the present state basic pension and supplementary benefit. If it were difficult for the hon. Gentleman to try to live that type of life for one week, how much more difficult is it for our fellow citizens who have to endure such hardship and acute poverty for years? If they are of employment age, they can look forward only to retiring on the basic pension. We have a Government who have no intention of reversing the tide of mass unemployment. Ministers no longer refer to the concept of full employment. They do not even pretend that they intend to see the end of mass unemployment.

We are debating the dismantling of the welfare state. No Government, not even this one, would try to abolish it in one go. They have too much electoral sense. That is why, for example, they refer to maintaining the National Health Service. The Government, and the Secretary of State—I am not being personal—as a member of the Cabinet, are trying to undermine as much of the National Health Service and the welfare provision as possible.

This month, for example, we have seen substantial increases in dental charges. That is of course in addition to the other dental increases which have occurred between 1979 and 1984. New regulations restrict the supply of National Health Service glasses to children under 16 and families in receipt of supplementary benefit or family income supplement. Everyone else has to obtain his glasses in the private sector. That includes many pensioners who do not receive supplementary benefit.

The cost of prescriptions when the Conservative party took office was 20p. Since then, they have increased continually, and a prescription now costs £2 per item. The increase has been 1,000 per cent. since 1979. That is what I mean by saying that welfare provisions have been eroded by a Government who have never believed in the welfare state.

The reviews which have been set up by the Secretary of State are meant only to find ways of pushing through what the Treasury wants—large social security savings. I refer again to the leader in today's Daily Telegraph which states

> "The Social Security Secretary Mr. Norman Fowler has argued that reform must ensure that money goes to those who need it but that there must be no reduction in the amount spent. The Treasury is insisting on savings."

I am not sure though that the right hon. Gentleman has defended welfare and social services in the Cabinet as much as he should. We often gain the impression that, although he may have put up an initial fight against the Treasury, at the end, perhaps because he does not want to find himself on the Back Benches, he is willing to go ahead with what the Treasury wants. Perhaps he is right from the point of view of his career.

Mr. Fowler: That is cheap.

Mr. Winnick: I do not believe that it is cheap. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that he has a leader who has no sympathy for the welfare state. If he makes a stand on all those issues against the Treasury he is unlikely to advance his career. I believe that my points are valid.

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): Is it not absurd that there is an overlap of several hundred thousand families in the welfare state at the moment who pay tax and receive benefits? Does the hon. Gentleman not think that it is high time that we had reviews to resolve some of the present anomalies?

Mr. Winnick: As I have argued in interventions, it is remarkable that those who argue constantly the same point that the hon. Gentleman has made defend the present arrangements for tax relief on mortgages. I take the view — I have made my position clear elsewhere and in interventions today — that it is right that those people who are buying a house should receive assistance. I am in favour of home ownership, as are all my right hon. and

hon. Friends. We always have been, or otherwise we should not have introduced the option mortgage scheme in the 1960s which undoubtedly made it much easier for people on lower incomes to buy their own homes. If we were against owner occupation, why would we have introduced the option mortgage scheme?

I do not find it easy to understand the hon. Gentleman arguing for means testing and the rest. The same hon. Gentleman would argue that it is right for someone earning £30,000 or more—perhaps himself—to receive benefit by way of mortgage tax relief. A Conservative Member said today that that was not so. It only meant that someone was paying less tax. That argument does not stand up, because if that person did not receive tax relief on his mortgage, or did not have a mortgage, he would have to pay his full share of tax. He is clearly being subsidised because he pays less tax. It is odd that Conservative Members—including the Government Front Bench—who are always on about means-tested benefits consider it right that those with the highest incomes should receive open-ended assistance from the state to buy their own houses.

The reviews have led to various leaks. It would be interesting to know whether any of them are correct. Will basic unemployment benefit be reduced? Will it be paid for six months only and not 12 months? Will heating additions be abolished? We have been arguing throughout the winter that there should be an increase in heating additions, and that it is wrong that so many people on low incomes should receive no assistance with their heating bills, or, if they do, that it is small and inadequate. Will housing benefit be reduced? That would mean a large number of people paying far more in rents and rates. We are worried by one of the leaks which suggests that it will be recommended that unemployed house owners receiving supplementary benefits will no longer receive assistance in paying their mortgages or the interest on those mortgage payments. As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said in opening the debate, in that event they would be thrown out on the streets. These are matters of great concern.

I am convinced that the state earnings related pension scheme provides a means of ensuring that if one retires having made no private provision, one will not live in the kind of poverty in which so many pensioners are now having to live.

When the Secretary of State was speaking, I drew attention to an answer that I received from one of his junior Ministers. It was to the effect that if someone has been in the scheme from the beginning, in 10 years' time, in 1995, such a person, on average earnings, will receive an additional £31; someone on three quarters average earnings will receive an additional £21; and someone on half average earnings will receive an additional £11·90. At the beginning of the next century, the people in the three categories that I have mentioned will receive £36·50, £25·20 and £14 respectively in addition to the basic pension. Those are significant sums.

The people to whom we are referring in the state scheme will know that when they retire, although they will not be living in luxury or anything near it, they will not have to live on the same pittance that retired people now have. That is why we must be concerned about the constant rumours and leaks to the effect that there will be a recommendation that the state earnings related pension scheme should be abolished. If our fears are proved correct and that is to be the recommendation, and if the Cabinet agrees to it, how many Conservative Members will defend the scheme? One or two hon. Members who have spoken in the debate have said that they do not believe in the scheme. We know the views of the Daily Telegraph, or of the person who writes that newspaper's leader. Will Conservative Members betray their constituents who are in the scheme and who have paid into it over a considerable period by taking away the pension entitlements that many people of working age look forward to receiving in due course?

Since the Government have been in office, very large sums have been given to the richest and the most prosperous. Such people have done very well out of the Government and have every reason to be grateful to the right hon. Lady's Administration. But for many others the Government have been a curse. Large numbers of people, including my constituents, have been denied their right to earn their living. Large numbers of people, including my constituents, and many others throughout the country, are living in poverty and near poverty because of measures taken by the Government.

When Conservatives ask what the Labour party has done for pensioners, I wonder how many pensioners today would be only too pleased to have the same progress that was made when the Labour party was in office? They will remember that the Labour Government tied the state pension to earnings or prices, whichever were the greater.

It is understandable that there is such a feeling of bitter resentment on the part of so many people who have been the victims of the Government's policies and of the contempt that the Government have shown for them. It has been a Government for the rich and the most prosperous. It has been a Government that has shown utter contempt and indifference for the people who are most in need, the people who need the welfare state and for whom it was first established. When the Labour party is returned to office it will make good the damage that has been done by the Conservative Government. We shall return to the provisions established in the 1945 Parliament.

8.45 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): The debate started by being entertaining, when we had the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) behaving like a little boy hurt, with a look on his face which Conservative Members will cherish for a long time. He was having a go at the press and accusing all and sundry of malice aforethought and so on, as if any of the things that he said in The Guardian in recent weeks mattered. It would have been nice to hear from him and his hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench whether he and they still agree with his comments in what he calls his "New Income Protection Plan", and whether he still stands by any of the things that he said to the newspapers. His role as a sacrificial lamb has been highly entertaining—novel, but, I suspect, highly misleading.

If the Labour party really thinks that those on £15,000 a year are rich, or think themselves as rich, it is totally out of touch with the way in which this country has been changing in recent years. If it thinks that the country would vote for Labour housing policies such as the abolition of mortgage tax relief for owner-occupiers, or for such housing policies as building acres more of windswept council estates of which we see only too many in our cities, or of tower blocks which are never repaired because

[Mrs. Edwina Currie]

Labour councillors are too busy spending the money on women's committees and sending people to Greenham Common, it has another think coming.

Ninety per cent. of those of working age have said that they want to own their own homes. That is exactly what Conservative policy has been, and it has helped us to win two elections. People do not wish to be dependent upon the welfare state for the provision of their accommodation, and that is the way that they will continue to vote in future.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Currie: I do not have time to do so.

The Labour motion seeks to identify an attack on the welfare state by the Government. It is interesting that the motion does not mention the National Health Service.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Currie: Hon. Members who are seeking to intervene have not been here for most of the debate. As time is now short, and other hon. Members wish to be called, I think that it is inappropriate to allow interventions.

It is interesting that the Opposition motion does not mention the National Health Service, because there has been a substantial increase in resources and a substantial improvement in results, to which several of my hon. Friends have drawn attention. I should like to mention the capital schemes, the building of new hospitals and new units which have proceded apace under the Conservative Government. In England alone, 50 major hospital schemes have been started on site since 1979. They are schemes costing over £5 million each. At present there are 152 hospital schemes of more than £2 million each being planned, designed or constructed in England alone, costing more than £1 billion. The buildings for 23 schemes are expected to be completed in 1985. I say to Labour Members who represent London seats—for example, the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt)—that much of that building is going on in other parts of the country, such as the Trent region, which covers my own constituency. Indeed, in Trent and in the Southern Derbyshire health authority there has been a substantial increase in the number of people on the payroll, and we have vacancies for nurses. Anyone in the south of England looking for a nursing job is very welcome in my constituency, where we have a substantial number of vacancies. The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), whose constituency is in the same district health authority, can confirm that. Indeed, she is nodding her head in confirmation. In my area there has been a rapid drop in waiting lists—at last, I have to say, because our waiting lists have been among the worst in the country.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West said that the welfare state was near the bottom of the Government's priorities. That does not accord with the facts. Social security is the largest single Government programme. It accounts for 30 per cent. of all public expenditure, with total cost of £40 billion, and rising. It is the only Government Department in that position. The rate of growth has doubled inside five years and that makes the Labour motion absolute nonsense. [Interruption.] It is not just a matter of unemployment; it is also a matter of increasing benefits to pensioners, the sick and the disabled and a large number of other people. It also, to a substantial degree, makes nonsense of any priorities, such as defence and overseas aid which other Departments may wish to claim, as well as all the other things on which we should like to spend our money.

I have sat through many social security debates since I came into this House and I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) in his place, because I should like to suggest that we could do with some new scientific laws. Sir Isaac Newton was a Member of this House many years ago, and my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree is by no means a lesser Newton. We should propose a new set of Newton's laws. I suggest that they be called Newton's four laws of action and reaction for social security.

Law No. 1 should be: "Whatever the social problem, a benefit will be devised"—even when it might be much better to leave well alone.

Law No. 2 should be: "Whatever the benefit, somebody will abuse it". If we need any evidence, look at the debates that we have had on board and lodging allowance, on housing benefit, and even at the rapid increase in the number of people claiming invalidity benefit, even though there seems to be no evidence that morbidity in that age group has increased.

The third law should be: "The cost of the benefit will escalate". The escalation will be in direct proportion to the surprise of the Ministers concerned.

The fourth law should be: "No benefit can be cut, ever". That is not what we want, but in practice it is exactly what happens. Perhaps one can have a corollary —that whatever the Minister does to try to improve matters, somebody will not like it.

The motion mentions the state earnings related pension scheme. It is probably as good an example as any. The hon. Member for Derby, South mentioned the Phillips committee, but in 1954 there were fewer than 7 million pensioners. Now there are 9·25 million, and by the time I am touching 80, which is the point at which SERPS becomes fully operational, there will be 12·5 million pensioners, and the number of contributors, in comparison to the number of claimants, will be 1.8:1. At that stage the social security budget for SERPS alone will have to be increased by approximately one third. On the best assumptions, the contribution rate will have to rise to 20 per cent., and on the worst assumptions it could be 26 per cent. or more. In other words, our grandchildren will be paying at least a quarter of their income on top of income tax to pay for our pensions. The question that we have to answer is this: do we really want to commit the state to that level of investment on one item alone, pensions? What about investment in industry? What about investment in education? What about training?

I am deeply worried, not just at the effects of encouraging people to rely entirely on the state instead of planning for their own future. We should be concerned not just at the sheer expense of providing all and sundry with whatever benefits they ask for and increases above inflation to boot. We should be concerned at the damaging effects on our future growth and strength of diverting such a large percentage of our resources into that activity. There are always more ways, and better ways frequently, of spending the money. Some of the thrust of Government policy has to be the continuing and steady encouragement of industrial and commercial development so that somebody will generate the surplus income in future to pay for all the benefits, for the Health Service and for the public services which we all so glibly want and for which we all seem so deeply reluctant to work and pay.

One man's priority is another man's extravagance. If we too readily invent benefits, add to them and increase them, the day will come when we beggar the nation, and then it will be too late.

8.52 pm

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): For a moment, I should like to follow the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) into physics. She quoted to us the four laws of Newton. I am afraid that when she speaks she reminds me of Charles's law, in that a given mass of gas increases directly with the absolute temperature.

The hon. Lady mentioned nurses in her constituency.I should like to tell her about nurses in my constituency. Eight nurses qualified at the local district general hospital. Not one of those eight could be offered a permanent post, yet we all know that when nurses qualify they are expected to serve a so-called six-month probationary period. Without having served that probationary period, those nurses cannot hope to get a permanent job elsewhere until they satisfy the nursing authorities that they are proficient at their work.

For about 31 years, the welfare state has been in the hands of Governments who respected it. From 1948 to 1979, those Governments adhered to the principles of the welfare state, and through those Governments it commanded a great deal of cross-party support. The people were particularly proud of it.

Tonight, we have heard statistics about waiting lists and the increase in inpatients over the past five or six years. I remind the House that one can cook inpatient waiting lists and outpatient lists as well as unemployment figures. Let us consider an ear, nose and throat waiting list in any hospital. For example, 350 children might be waiting for tonsil and adenoid operations. One may search down that list and decide to write to the parents. By the time the letters arrive so many of the children have been totally cured of the condition for which they were originally to have the operation that, at a stroke, the number can be reduced to well below 350.

There are long waiting lists of patients for cataract operations. But some of those patients waiting for operations will never be contacted, because they are not on this earth to be contacted. Thus, again, one can eliminate or reduce waiting lists as one wishes.

We know that there are practically no domiciliary midwifery cases. All infants are now born in hospital. That is another reason why, over the past few years, there has been a steady increase in the number of cases receiving inpatient treatment.

I can assure the House that the morale of the medical profession has never been so low for a considerable number of years. It is low not only among ancillary staff who were badgered into submission when they tried to strike for better conditions in 1982, but among nursing staff, consultants and general practitioners.

The general practitioners, first hit by the deputising service fiasco, then by the limited list fiasco, are now in an uncertain position. Since the visit of the Minister for Health to the Harrow private clinic, we do not know what to expect with regard to general practice. We are now keenly waiting for the so-called Green Paper on primary medical care, although so many things in that Green Paper have already been leaked.

Apparently, it is being considered down at the Elephant and Castle whether we shall have a salaried service within the NHS. Alternatives that are being considered are that doctors will no longer be paid for items of service. And so it goes on. At the moment, there is a gradual demoralisation among general practitioners. Who knows what they will get in return for the apparent bonus of being able to advertise their services. I should have thought that it went very much against the Hippocratic oath. If doctors were allowed to advertise their services, it would lead to utter chaos in the GP service and primary medical care.

Among consultants, too, morale is at a low ebb. Consultants will confirm that the increase in administration means that they spend less and less time in the operating theatre or on surgical rounds and more and more time attending committees which do not achieve any improvement at the sharp end of the service. The Government said that the limited list would save £75 million per year, which could then be used at the sharp end of the National Health Service, but there is no more reason for us to believe Ministers now than there was to believe that the National Health Service was safe in the hands of the Prime Minister, as she claimed at the general election.

I recently asked the Secretary of State how many geriatric beds are available in this country now compared with 1979. There has been an increase of 0·002 per cent. in England and 0·005 per cent. in Wales, but demographic changes mean that there are now far more people over the age of 65 and hundreds of thousands over the age of 75 who need to go into hospitals of that kind when they are ill. Medical practitioners cannot get patients into hospitals because the hospitals are full of chronically sick people, often chronic orthopaedic patients who cannot be taken out into the community.

We heard a great deal from the Government about community care, but it was just another gimmick—just another way of getting care on the cheap—and it has not worked. Nursing staff and community nurses are now discovering that it is impossible to provide in the home the nursing services that were previously provided in the hospitals.

The catalogue goes on and on. If this is not demolition of the Health Service, it is certainly utter demoralisation. Ministers complacently tell us that more is being spent here, there and everywhere. Anyone who wants to know how much more is really being spent should visit the hospitals and talk to the staff who care for the sick and for those unable to fend for themselves. That is where the truth is to be found, not in statistics from the Elephant and Castle. Thirty-five years after the inception of the National Health Service there is discontent, misery and demoralisation, and it is time that that was put right.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): For too long, in my view, we have distributed social benefits without proper thought not just for the taxpayer, who has to provide them and who is often no better off than the recipient, but for the long-term effect on the recipients themselves. I was therefore delighted to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State say today that the review would ensure that social security was not divorced from the rest of Government policy, especially employment policy. The reduction of unemployment is the major task facing the Government, but I believe that in some ways the present social security system exacerbates the problem. Indeed, I believe that in some respects it positively harms the long-term employment prospects of the recipient. I shall give just two examples.

A 16-year-old leaving school in July is entitled to £17·30 per week supplementary benefit in September if he has not found work, and even if he has not tried to find work and is not prepared to undertake youth training. That cannot possibly be in the long-term interests of the school leaver. We must do everything in our power to encourage school leavers to take training. We all appreciate the value of education because we have the knowledge and experience to realise how well our education and training has served us, but young people of 16 often do not appreciate the importance of education and training, and I believe that offering supplementary benefit to them as soon as they leave school discourages them from taking the training that is so vital in the job market today.

It is true that many of the young unemployed live in areas of high unemployment, but nothing is for ever. History repeats itself. The unemployment of the 1920s and 1930s went away. Last week the Prime Minister told us that 300,000 new jobs had been created in the past 18 months. The 16 to 18-year-olds will not stay the same age for ever. They may lose their chance of education and training. By not encouraging them now to take the training that is so necessary we shall condemn them, in the long term, to the scrap heap. I urge my right hon. Friend seriously to consider giving every possible encouragement to those young people to train now.

Rate rebates offer another example of how social security works to discourage employment. One household in three in Britain now receives rate rebates through the housing benefit system. The proportion is even higher in parts of the country where unemployment is highest. In Liverpool, half the ratepayers now receive rate rebates. In Sheffield and Manchester the percentage is about 42 or 43 per cent. Only about a quarter of the electors in Liverpool, Manchester or Sheffield pay full rates. In those areas there are no longer any votes in saving money. Votes are to be gained only by spending money. Votes are attracted by vastly increased and expensive services in areas that are ravaged by unemployment.

What is the effect of high spending in such cities? High spending results in fewer jobs. Those who are in employment and pay full rates leave for less highly rated areas. Stockport is fortunate. In Manchester the rates are 50 per cent. higher than in Stockport. There is in consequence a massive exodus from Manchester to Stockport, not only of domestic ratepayers, but of commerce and industry. Businesses are driven away from Manchester and investment discouraged. Housing benefit and high rates exacerbate the problem of unemployment. Our once-great northern industrial cities are in a downward spiral.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Favell: I do not have time. Unless local authorities are encouraged to reduce rate levels, that spiral will become an uncontrollable spin. I urge my right hon. Friend to take advantage of the reviews to deal with the problem.

9.8 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I wish to begin by quoting some words of the hon. Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson), written before he became a Minister in the Department of Health and Social Security. The hon. Gentleman was, of course, in the Department when the decision to institute the reviews was taken. In 1978—no doubt the Prime Minister read these words—he wrote:

"Conservatives must actively work for the welfare state to wither away as personal freedom and independent provision take its place."

That work is what we are debating tonight. We are talking not about certainties or the matters on which the Prime Minister loves to tell us that there is no alternative, but about choices. The record shows us what choices the Government have made. Their social security budget, and the way in which they have changed it in recent years, casts a light on the choices that we may expect them to make through the social security reviews, and the reasons for those choices.

In his pertinent speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) made clear the extent and nature of the choices that the Government have had, and he contrasted the savings that have been made in every Social Security Bill that the Government have presented to the House since 1979—they now total £11 billion—with tax handouts to the wealthiest, which have been given in every Budget—and now total £13 billion.

One of the most frightening features of these debates for the prospect of peace and harmony is the gulf of understanding and experience which opens between the two sides of the House. I sometimes wonder whether Conservative Members know what their Government's record is, or whether they understand the reality of life for those on pensions or benefits. They will not know if they listen to the Secretary of State. It has been a feature of several recent Question Times that Conservative Members have risen, one after the other, to say that, although they do not question the Government's wonderful record as they have done great things for the NHS, could the Secretary of State explain why a ward or hospital in their constituency is closing and could he tell them how to reassure their pensioners. Our clear message to them and the country is that the Government's arguments and figures on the whole of the welfare state are as phoney as their arguments and figures on the NHS, which even Tory Back Benchers are beginning to see through.

Tory Back Benchers are beginning to see through the arguments and figures partly because of the many benefits that the Government have abolished, such as industrial injury benefit, the earnings related supplements to unemployment and sickness benefits and the child addition to benefits, and partly because of the many benefits that the Government have reduced—for example, the 5 per cent. abatement of unemployment, sickness and invalidity benefits. Recently, the invalidity benefit abatement has been restored, only to be offset by other changes in invalidity benefit which mean that, once again, the Government are making a net saving in social security expenditure at the expense of some of the most vulnerable in our society.

Once again there is late payment of pensions and of invalidity benefits this year so that the Government can save money at the expense of those groups. Lest hon. Members still doubt—there seems to be some lack of understanding of the Government's cuts in social security spending—I shall quote what the Secretary of State said on 13 October 1983. He said, with approval:

"We should remember we have already done a great deal to contain expenditure by abolishing earnings related supplement, by making unemployment benefit taxable and by withdrawing it from better off occupational pensioners."

When it suits them, the Government claim credit for their social security reductions.

The decision in 1980 to cut the link between pensions and benefits and earnings as opposed to the link between pensions and benefits and prices—that vital principle established by the Labour Government which increases the value of pensions and benefits as earnings increase—has most eroded the provision of the welfare state. It means that pensions and benefits at best stand still against prices but are frozen so that people dependent on them are less and less well off compared with those in work. For the benefit of Conservative Members who seem to have a different experience of the scheme, I should like to highlight a few of the facts about it as many of them seem to imagine that it is over-generous. That misunderstanding appears to fuel the pressure on and from the Government to cut social security still further through their reviews.

A survey carried out in 1983 showed that 3 million people cannot afford to heat even their living area properly, that at least 5 million regularly left out a major item of food, such as a joint, that 500,000 children do not get three meals a day because they do not have the money, that about 6 million people who depend on benefit lack a major piece of clothing, such as a warm waterproof coat, that more than 3 million lack items such as carpets, fridges or washing machines, that 3 million cannot afford birthday or Christmas celebrations, and that 10 million could not pay for even one week's holiday.

Hon. Members have talked about the social security scheme. I wonder whether the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) is aware that all entitlement to one single penny of housing benefit ceases well below average earnings for those who are on average rents.

The rise in housing benefit has resulted from the rise in rents, which have been forced up by the Government. I wonder how many Conservative Members fully realise that, apart from having his housing costs met, a single householder under 60 gets £28·05 a week to meet the rest of his needs and that a couple get £45·55. All hon. Members will be aware that there is no meals allowance in this House, but I understand that in another place the meals allowance is about £40 a day—over £10 more than a single householder under 60 is expected to live on for a week.

Someone on supplementary benefit is allowed to earn £4 a week or, since the changes the Government made in 1981, to receive £4 a week in cash or kind. Once he receives more, he loses every penny over that value—a 100 per cent. deduction. I referred earlier to a gulf in experience. The contrast between what I have just said and capital transfer tax might be illuminating to Conservative Members. Instead of a 100 per cent. deduction over the threshold, the tax on gifts starts to apply at 15 per cent. In addition, there is a difference between the thresholds. Instead of £4 a week, that tax, even at 15 per cent., begins to bite only when gifts have amounted to £68,000. I calculate that to be about 300 years' worth of supplementary benefit exemption.

The average cost of private health insurance, even as a supplement to the NHS, for a two-child family with a non-working wife is at present about £12 or £15 a week. The average cost of an occupational pension for such a family is about £10 a week. Those who have such supplementary health and pension provision—I suspect that many Conservative Members and their constituents have—might in future try to remember that what they spend on supplementing what the state provides in pension and health care is what people on supplementary benefit must live on.

Those Conservative Members or their constituents with children boarding at public school will be paying an average of £160 per child per week—seven times as much in school fees alone as someone in receipt of supplementary benefit must live on. That is the gulf which exists between the experience of different groups in our society, and that is why the Opposition sometimes get excited when we listen to Conservative Members telling us how over-generous they consider the scheme to be.

Mr. Nicholls: As school fees are not tax deductible, such people will have paid sums in taxation which make benefits a reality. Does the hon. Lady realise that the ability of people to pay after taxation is concomitant with paying the tax which makes those benefits possible?

Mrs. Beckett: This is not the occasion to debate public school provision, although I am quite willing to enter into such a debate. However, most of our senior public schools are charities and receive tax and rate relief because they were founded to educate the poor. I am referring to the difference in levels of expenditure and income. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman knew what the supplementary benefit level was. If he did, he was probably in a minority among his colleagues.

Those who have never wanted and those who never expect to want in future are very quick to talk about the burden of the welfare state, just as those who have never been seriously ill and think that it is because they are virtuous rather than fortunate seem to despise the NHS.

The Government's main charge over recent weeks, and the charge they intend to try to sustain in the reviews, is that the burden of expenditure overall on social security is too great, is rising and must be cut. The Government have already cut it not just by the detailed changes that they have made in benefit, but by the major change in linking pension and benefit increases only to prices. By that change, they have not only withheld benefits from those in need but destroyed the basis of their own case.

It is often quoted that a pensioner couple have had £5 a week withheld from them by this change. It is less often quoted that someone receiving invalidity benefit has lost £7·35 a week by the Government breaking the link between the benefit and prices, and by the other changes. The Social Security Bill will make another net saving at the expense of pensioners.

When we hear claims from the Government about the extravagance of the social security budget and the state earnings related pension scheme, it is hardly ever quoted that benefits linked only to inflation are basically standing still. The Child Poverty Action Group, in its excellent book, "The DHSS in Crisis", which is meant to be read in the context of the Government's reviews, pointed out that although the bill for social security is likely to rise because of demographic changes and changes in prices, as a percentage of GDP, the bill will fall over the next few years.

Similarly, the Government say that they are worried about the cost of SERPS in the next 20 to 30 years. However, because the basic pension is linked only with prices, those who retire this year or in the next 10 years will see the value of their total pension, including the earnings related element, so eroded that in 10 or 20 years —the period of time about which the Government claim to be concerned—it will fall back to the relative value of the pension today. Therefore, if the Government abolish the earnings related element, the total pension will be worth far less than it is today, and the pensioners of 10 or 20 years' time will suffer.

Earlier, the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) referred to a terrible thing—the calculation that total national insurance contributions might rise to about 21·6 per cent. of GDP if we maintained SERPS. He wondered how that could be afforded. I am sorry to have to say in his absence that the hon. Gentleman was clearly not aware that this is compared directly with a value of 17·6 per cent. for the same figures today; and therefore it could be argued that we can cope with such an increase.

Clearly, the hon. Member for Suffolk, South was even less aware — and I sometimes wonder whether the Secretary of State is aware—that if the basic pension remains linked only with prices, in the 10 or 20 years' time about which the Government are having nightmares the national insurance contribution will be not 21·6 per cent. in total, but less than 10·3 per cent. because the value of the total pension is so eroded by the link of the basic pension only with prices. The value of the pension and of the national insurance contribution needed to sustain the pension will significantly fall. That destroys everything that the Government are saying about the need to abandon, abolish or weaken SERPS. The Government have already weakened it so much that their fears are ill-founded.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is not here, because I do not like commenting on his remarks in his absence. Much has been said about the amorality or immorality of SERPS, so I shall leave Conservative Members with a final thought about the comparisons of costs. It is true that we are talking about putting a lot of money into SERPS and the basic state scheme. It is true that we are putting thousands of millions of pounds into state pensions. Indeed, we are putting in as much this year and last year as we spent on alcohol. That puts into context the Government's remarks about the extravagance of our devotion to the state pension scheme.

The Government say that everything has changed since 1975. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) has clearly been taken in by this fiction. The number of pensioners has not changed since 1975. I should have thought that a little simple arithmetic would show any hon. Member that the number of 10 million pensioners was due to increase to 12 million. That was known in 1975 when the state earnings related plan was revised. The prediction about the number of contributions has not changed significantly. There are some marginal differences, but well within any possible margins of error.

What has changed since 1975 is the priority that the Government are prepared to give to ensure dignity and freedom from want in retirement. The Prime Minister likes to talk about people taking more responsibility and providing for themselves in old age. Her lack of understanding of the practicalities involved in people trying to provide for themselves in old age has been evident for at least 10 years. I recall listening to the right hon. Lady during the debate on the Finance Bill 1974 when she was a shadow Treasury Minister, although not shadow Chancellor. The House was debating the level of exemption from capital transfer tax for gifts given to a child on the occasion of his or her marriage. The Labour Government proposed that the exemption level should be set at £2,000, which, I understand, is now worth about £5,300. The right hon. Lady said that that was not enough. There was a certain amount of hilarity among the Labour Members present who asked her how many members of the public she thought could give their children wedding presents to the value of even £2,000. The right hon. Lady said that they could not give such presents, because they did not save.

Such people do not save because they cannot save, because during their lives they never earn sufficient to save enough to think of giving children presents worth thousands of pounds when they marry. Those people certainly never earn enough during their lives to save to cover the cost of their retirement. Any justification for arguing that people should save to cover the costs of their retirement disappears when simultaneously the Government do everything that they can to reduce or hold down wages.

The record of the Government, who have had more money every month from the North sea than the Labour Government had during their five years in office, is one of meanness and mismanagement in social security. The Government's record makes us fear for the future. We wonder what they will do in their social security reviews. The Secretary of State made a great point of telling us that all the anxiety and complaints were misplaced because he had to be prepared to consider any proposal if he wanted to review the pension and benefit system. The right hon. Gentleman did not say that he meant that he was prepared to look at anything, except increased costs in the service, improving the service so that it might give more to claimants and interaction between the pension and benefits system and the taxation system. His colleagues will not permit him to do so.

For the welfare state we pay when and as much as we can so that we can draw on it as of right when we are in need. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West asked why the Labour party was so antagonistic to means-tested benefits. He asked why our hackles rise when means-tested benefits are mentioned. Our hackles rise then for the same reason as they rise when we hear the Prime Minister talk about Victorian values and hear the Secretary of State in various speeches on different occasions pushing voluntary organisations forward, demanding that they play a greater role in social services and education and talking about a greater role for the private sector in health care.

On all those matters our hackles rise for the same reason. By and large, it is among Opposition Members that there are to be found those whose parents and grandparents remember the means test. It is Opposition Members who remember the bitterness that lasted generations from the days of services being provided through charity and of the concept of the deserving and undeserving poor. Those who were prepared to smarm their way round those in authority in a manner that seems to returning to fashion in the Conservative party found themselves better off than those who tried to maintain some independence.

The days when those who were wealthy and who chose to do so provided education and hospitals out of the kindness of their hearts are days that Opposition Members remember perhaps without the generosity that Conservative Members might wish for. We remember charity schools and hospitals, and so we are wedded to the concept of a welfare state that provides services as of right, and for which the community as a whole pays—services that most of us on this side of the House could never hope to provide for ourselves.

The welfare state and the NHS can be summarised very simply by saying that they are Socialism in action. That is, of course, what the Prime Minister so much dislikes about them. The creation of the welfare state is the greatest pride and achievement of the Labour party and the Labour movement—[Interruption.] Conservative Members who sneer and snigger should remember that it is also something in which the British people take great pride. Since the Conservative party came to power in 1979, it has tampered with the welfare state and damaged and weakened it. Before the Government finally make their decisions and publish their reviews, the purpose of this debate is to warn them that if they now seek to destroy the welfare state the British people and not just the Labour party will destroy this Government and their party with them.

9.32 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): The debate has been something of a classic of its kind in that it was widely heralded in the press, and trailed on the radio by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) this morning as a slashing attack and an all-out assault that would save the nation from disaster. When he came to the House early this afternoon, attended by a group of supporters who would have comfortably filled a minibus, he made a speech based on assorted press cuttings while denouncing the press as biased and unreliable. Only two of the official Opposition Members then in the House showed any inclination to speak in the debate and, as far as we could judge, all the other Opposition Members spoke because a panic-stricken Whip had fled from the Chamber and had gone rushing round the House.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman must be able to do better than that.

Mr. Newton: I may well do better than that, but the hon. Gentleman will have to do better than that, too, if he wants to carry his party with him. Of course, we all know that the motive behind the debate was not to illuminate the Government's work or plans but to cast back into the shadows the work of the hon. Member for Oldham, West as shadow Secretary of State. Until last week I had never thought of the Leader of the Opposition as being closely paralleled by the Duke of Wellington. But it suddenly came into my mind that it is said that, when looking at his own soldiers, the Duke of Wellington thought:

"I don't know what effect these men will have upon the enemy, but, by God, they frighten me."

Now I know how the Leader of the Opposition felt last week when he contemplated the hon. Member for Oldham, West and his paper.

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): The Duke of Wellington won and my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) will win, too—and I am referring to the next general election.

Mr. Newton: The monument to the hon. Member for Oldham, West is likely to be a new posting before long.

Taking the debate at its face value, I will deal with at least some of the allegations that have been made about the Government and the welfare state. Although most of the debate, understandably—in view of the way in which the hon. Member for Oldham, West opened it—has concentrated on social security, which was the subject of most of the publicity that surrounded the debate, it is only fair to those who referred to the NHS to place on record some of the facts and figures about what has happened in the service in the last four or five years.

There are now 57,000 more nurses and midwives than there were; over 5,000 more hospital doctors and dentists; 2,500 more family doctors; and over 13,000 more radiologists, laboratory technicians and other professional staff. [Interruption.] Opposition Members may not like listening to these figures, but it is time again to put them firmly on the record.

In 1983, by comparison with 1978, the NHS in England was treating about 650,000 more inpatients and over 2·5 million more outpatients; it was providing almost 3·5 million more courses of dental treatment; and there were over 650,000 more visits by health visitors and home nurses to elderly and sick people at home. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short), who is not in her place, would be interested to know that it had succeeded in reducing the degree of perinatal mortality by about one third in just five years.

That is the record not of a Government who are dismantling anything but of a Government who are steadily building a better health for the nation.

Mr. Pavitt: In regard to the statistics of hospital inpatients and outpatients, does the Minister recall that the present Prime Minister said in 1978 that there were 50,000 unnecessary deaths from emphysema, lung cancer and chronic bronchitis? That figure is now 100,000, mainly because the Government have run away from doing something about cigarette smoking. Will the hon. Gentleman take responsibility for that increase?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman knows that statistics such as those have no validity unless they are related to the overall morbidity and mortality statistics and reflect the extent to which people live longer and reach the stage when they may suffer the consequences of those types of disease. The hon. Gentleman knows that he over-simplifies the point.

My hon. Friends and I do not pretend that there are not still many problems to be overcome in the NHS. It is, however, foolish nonsense for anybody contemplating the statistics to suggest that the Government are dismantling the welfare state. Some of the figures that have been quoted about the NHS have concentrated completely on revenue spending. The Labour record on cutting the NHS hospital capital building programme was appalling. If ever there was a dismantling of the hospital service in the sense of failing to put new capital investment into it, that occurred in response to IMF demands in 1976 and the penalties that were then inflicted on this country and its health service for the profligacy of Labour Members in the previous two years. That was when the future of the National Health Service was being dismantled. It is in the restoration and growth of the capital programme that the foundations are being laid for still more of the improvements of the kind to which I have referred in the last few minutes.

I turn from the National Health Service to the main thrust of the debate on social security. One of my hon. Friends has already referred to the increase of £8·5 billion, or nearly 30 per cent. in real terms, in the social security budget during the years from 1979-80 to 1984-85. This is not mainly or solely due to unemployment. Well over half —nearly £5 billion—is the result of this Government meeting the needs of many hundreds of thousands of additional retirement and invalidity pensioners and of claimants to mobility and attendance allowance. It is also because the Government have kept faith with their promise to protect the value of the retirement pension. While prices have risen by about 77 per cent., the pension has risen by nearly 84 per cent. Pensioners have enjoyed a real increase in their standard of living. This has more than fulfilled the promise made by the Government.

Nor are retirement pensioners alone in their position having been improved. For the sick and disabled, the real value of the mobility allowance has been increased. It has been made tax free. We have ended the so-called invalidity trap which, to the shame of the Opposition, kept so many tens of thousands of the long-term sick and disabled trapped within the lower rate of supplementary benefit instead of enjoying the higher, long-term rate. We have heard nothing about that today. However, that trap was ended by this Government and has benefited 70,000 invalidity pensioners.

Last November, the Government replaced two old benefits by the new severe disablement allowance which, when it is fully built up, is expected to result in 20,000 more people benefiting than benefited under the previous system, and it will end—I am sorry that the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Richardson) is not here, because I am sure that it is a point she would have appreciated —the discrimination against disabled married women which the Labour Government left behind.

For war pensioners the Government have introduced, in parallel with the mobility allowance for civilian pensioners, a generous new mobility supplement to replace the old vehicle scheme. Pensions for war widows have been fully exempted from tax. Last November higher allowances for all war widows over 65 were introduced.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) referred to the Social Security Bill which was debated last week. She mentioned almost everything except that last week the Government invited the House to approve the final removal of the married women's half test—another discriminatory measure. This proposal will bring another £25 million of benefit in the early stages to about 25,000 married women who were previously discriminated against under the social security system.

As with the National Health Service, those are not the facts and figures of a Government whose Ministers do not care or of a Government who are dismantling the welfare state or damaging the social security system. They are welcome, sensible improvements to the social security system. They are made possible by welcome, sensible changes in other ways which have enabled us to concentrate our resources more effectively upon those most in need.

Although I shall try to be fair to every Opposition Member, hard though it is at times to be fair, I shall be especially fair to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). He very frankly said—I think I took down his words accurately and hope that I am not misrepresenting him—that it was not possible for Opposition Members to claim with any seriousness that there has been any dismantling of the welfare state. He is right about that and I am grateful to him for the fair-mindedness with which he put that point.

Mr. Frank Field: The hon. Gentleman's writing must have let him down. I said that we could not claim that there had been a dismantling of the social security system. What worries me is the proposals which have been discussed in the press as likely to come from the social security reviews. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take this opportunity to say, for example, that the state earnings related pensions scheme will not be abolished.

Mr. Newton: I was just about to deal with the reviews. The charge in the motion, as the hon. Gentleman readily recognised, and has fairly recognised again in the past few moments, is that nothing has happened at all. The record clearly does not begin to sustain for a moment the charge of dismantling the welfare state or the social security system in particular. The charge relates to nothing except what the hon. Member for Oldham, West says that he has read in the papers about the proposed outcome of the social security review.

I cannot respond tonight either to the questions posed by the hon. Member for Birkenhead or to some of the points raised by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the outcome of the social security review, for the good reason, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear, that the Government have not yet made their final decision on the outcome of the social security review. [Interruption.] We believe in collective decision-making and consulting our colleagues.

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South): Who was consulted on the employment of the hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer)?

Mr. Newton: Obviously not the Labour Chief Whip; nor, as a matter of fact, was I.

Even if I am not in a position tonight to say anything more about the outcome of the reviews, I can tell the House that the social security review was set up not to dismantle the social security system, but with exactly the opposite purpose—to try to make sure that in a world in which resources will never be as large as any or all of us would like, what the Government, or any Government, can make available for social security spending meets the needs of today and tomorrow instead of being so ruthlessly concentrated, as in the Opposition's minds, on the needs of yesterday.

As my right hon. Friend has emphasised time and again, we are seeking to bring about a use of whatever resources are available for the social security system in a way which is most effectively aimed at the least well-off in our community, and a use of resources, however large they may be, within a system which is simpler and easier for people to understand. In view of the strictures of the hon. Member for Oldham, West on the supplementary benefit system, it is hard to see that he can object to that objective.

We are also seeking to ensure that our social security system is effectively related to wider policies of the Government and wider policies which any sensible Government would need to have to restrain inflation, to generate economic growth and thus to make sure that we have the resources on which any social security system must in the end depend.

As my right hon. Friend made clear, the review has had a significant independent input. It has been based on probably more open public consultation than any comparable exercise in history, including not only the widespread receipt of evidence from those who chose to give it, but public hearings for those who wished to put their views in person. We are now considering the conclusions from all that work and will put them before the House as soon as possible.

I wish that the same could be said for the conclusions, if that is what they are, of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. I say, "if that is what they are" because we repeatedly failed to get any serious answers from him in the course of his speech about precisely what the status of those proposals is or even what they mean. I should like to ask a few questions of the hon. Gentleman. How many people did he consult in drawing up his proposals? No one has yet emerged in the papers who has been consulted in any way, right up to the top of the hon. Gentleman's own party. How much evidence did he receive? How many public hearings did he have? How many members of the public said, "We must have an end to mortgage tax relief"?

Mr. Meacher: How many people came to the hon. Gentleman's reviews and asked for an end to supplementary benefit mortgage payments for the poorest people? If those are removed, as is confidently predicted, how does he justify the fact that unemployed claimants and single-parent families will be left without a house and thrown on to the streets because they will no longer be able to meet their mortgage payments?

Mr. Newton: The only confident predictions that have been made tonight about the outcome of the reviews have been made by the hon. Gentleman on the basis of the odd press cutting that he seems to have seen. i do not propose to comment further on such speculation and rumour.

I should like to know from the hon. Gentleman what he has done to cost his proposals, because that too is a mystery. It is not clear whether they are costed on his authority or that of The Economist, because I rather understood him to say, when he was asked about the cost of his proposals, that we should look at The Economist. He was conveying the impression that a great independent exercise undertaken by that prestigious magazine would illuminate the matter for us. When I looked at The Economist, it was clear that it had used the figures which the hon. Gentleman gave it. They are not even the ones which he got out of his computer, because they have not been in the computer yet. As far as I can see, they are merely his jottings on the back of an envelope.

As my right hon. Friend said, we reckon that the cost of the hon. Gentleman's proposals is at least twice what he suggested. It seems to me that it is at least £15 billion.

Mr. Fowler: At least.

Mr. Newton: At least, as my right hon. Friend emphasises. That is what will be required to pay for what the hon. Gentleman has proposed.

I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman one or two detailed questions about the proposals. As I understand it, he proposes a large increase in child benefit, to be paid for by abolishing the married man's tax allowance. That amounts to a substantial increase in taxation to finance a significant increase in social security benefits. Does the hon. Gentleman intend to have with that a drastic lowering of tax thresholds and the bringing into taxation of another 1 million people who are not currently in taxation? Has he thought about that?

I considered some of the alternative ways of financing the other proposals which the hon. Gentleman has listed in his document. I see the suggestion that we might have a combined rate of national insurance and taxation on "all personal income". I do not know how carefully that has been considered. If it means what it says, it means the ending of personal allowances, the bringing of 12 million more people into taxation, and presumably seeking to collect income tax on every tiny morsel of part-time income. Does the hon. Gentleman mean that? I do not believe that he knows what he means. If it does not mean that, what does it mean? It cannot mean anything else.

It the hon. Gentleman does not know the answer to that, let us return to the proposal about which he seems to have the answer and about which the rest of us are still mystified. I quote from the paragraph on housing allowance in his paper:

> "The level of benefit would relate directly to income, but only those on one and a half times average earnings would receive less assistance from housing allowance than they do now from mortgage interest tax allowance."

That is no slip of the tongue; it is in the roneod version of the document. It can mean only two things. One is that mortgage interest tax relief is to be abolished. The other is that people earning more than one and a half times average earnings — a minimum of nearly 2 million people—will get less help with their housing costs; in other words, they will not only lose their mortgage income tax relief, but will not be compensated in any way for that.

What I and my hon. Friends want to know—and, above all, what at least 2 million people in the country want to know — is whether that is what the hon. Member proposes to do. Will he tell us? There is only one conclusion to be drawn: that there is a clear-cut threat to a large number of people, running to millions, that they will have their housing assistance savagely cut in a form which will make nonsense of all the recent lip service about encouraging owner-occupation.

Mr. Meacher: That is pretty rum, coming from a Government who have produced the highest level of mortgage interest ever in this country and the lowest level of housing starts since the war, and who in the past few months have produced an increase in mortgage interest, as a result of a hike in interest rates, of £57·60 a month for those with a £30,000 mortgage. Perhaps the Minister would like to explain how that is helping owner-occupiers.

Mr. Newton: We now have a little more illumination on the hon. Gentleman's approach.

Mr. Harrison: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thought that this was a National Health Service debate, not a housing debate. We were talking about the destruction of certain services. I did not know that the Department of the Environment was entering into the discussion. I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was dealing with the health services and the social services. I did not know that the Minister spoke for the Department of the Environment——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. It is a very wide-ranging debate.

Mr. Newton: It seems to range wider by the moment. The right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Harrison) has raised another interesting question. Did the hon. Member for Oldham, West consult the shadow spokesman for the Environment? [Interruption.] I said "The right hon. Member for Wakefield," for whom I have the highest regard. If so, the shadow spokesman for the Environment was the luckiest bloke in the House.

We now have some further illumination of the hon. Gentleman's answer to the problem. He is to withdraw mortgage interest tax relief. He is to reduce the housing help to everybody earning above one and a half times average earnings. His apparent answer is to increase expenditure by £15 billion, thus driving up interest rates even further. Then he is to take away the assistance by reason of what he has to pay in interest charges. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] If that is rubbish, it has not been denied. I have given the hon. Gentleman enough opportunities to deny it.

The position is this, and the whole House knows it. If there is a serious threat to the welfare state, it comes not from the Government—either now or in the future. It comes from the policies put forward by the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends in terms of a renewed surge of inflation, which would hit every pensioner and every less-well-off person harder than anything else. It comes from the threat of higher taxation at every level, which the hon. Gentleman has not denied, the consequences of which will be to raise even further the unhappy total of the unemployed. It is a threat to home ownership, and to all the wishes of people to exercise their own choices with their own money. That is the threat that we face. It is the threat of the hon. Gentleman's proposals. There is no threat from the Government's social security proposals.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

'That this House notes the Government's commitment to improving the Social Security and Health care systems in this country as shown by increased spending on the National Health Service and increased benefit levels for pensioners and others; supports the Government's aim of reducing the burden of taxation and National Insurance contributions especially for the lower paid; notes the Opposition's plans to end mortgage tax relief and increase income tax and National Insurance contributions; and congratulates the Government on having set in hand the most thorough review of the Social Security system for 40 years'.

The Planning System

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

10.26 pm

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): This is the second time that I have been called for an Adjournment debate, and on both occasions I have been doubly fortunate. The first occasion was the day after the House had been suspended and the previous day's Adjournment debate had been lost. On this occasion, I nearly lost the notes for my speech on a District line train at six o'clock on Friday morning. The quick wits of Mr. Kingham, the station foreman at South Kensington station, together with the alertness of Mr. McConnachie of Baron's Court station saved the papers that I had inadvertently mislaid. When I read the Government's report "Burdens on Business", I thought that many of our obsolete planning restrictions should be lost.

It is estimated by Barclays bank that unnecessary planning delays and restrictions cost £1,000 million per annum. The Financial Times estimated that perhaps 1 million jobs have been lost in the past five years through restrictions on business. I have received complaints in my constituency about delays to business through planning restrictions, and that is why I have chosen the subject of simplyfying the planning system for my debate tonight.

Furthermore, from my experience in building up a business employing over 500 people, I know the extreme frustration caused by unnecessary legislative restrictions, delays and uncertainties. I shall be pleased to hear what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment has to say about the Government's intentions to act, as I hope that they will, on their "Burdens on Business" report. I am happy to put forward a 10-point action plan to improve employment prospects both in my constituency and elsewhere in the country.

First, I feel that Parliament should remove the beam from its eye. We should rid ourselves of all surplus planning and other legislation. I support the proposals put forward last Wednesday by my noble Friends in the other place to set up a Joint Standing Committee of both Houses to prepare a miscellaneous provisions Bill as an annual springclean of Government legislation to clear away all redundant legislation that causes unemployment. For example, we should not have a law that forces the tiniest limited liability companies to go to the expense of preparing and filing annual statutory audited accounts. We should not put the same expenses on the smallest and on the largest companies.

Secondly, new legislation to streamline existing procedures is needed. For instance, fire regulations should be covered by a general statutory duty enforced with as much freedom of choice and by the same authority as will enforce the new building regulations. The fire insurance companies could act in the same way as garages which issue MOT certificates for vehicles.

Thirdly, we should enact the legislation for simplified planning zones so that councils can use this option to take the initiative in granting planning permission in advance of an application. Governments should be empowered to declare compulsory SPZs in areas where planning authorities are clearly inefficient. I am glad to say that the London boroughs are at the bottom of the efficient list, while northern authorities are the more efficient. The long delays over the London STOLport are an example of how Governments should streamline the appeal process. Mowlem did all its preliminary work and put in its planning application in no more than 12 months, but it has been kept waiting for more than two and a half years for planning permission. Not only Londoners but northerners and other provincial travellers look forward to using this airport sooner rather than later. Mowlem deserves better treatment for its initiative, which is now waiting for the Government's decision.

Fourthly, we should amend the 1971 Act to make it easier for small businesses to make small extensions of up to, say, 15 per cent. and for local authorities to grant changes-of-use planning permission, especially for mixed use and from warehouse to general industrial use as well as from general industrial to warehouse use. From my experience, I know the difficulty of finding premises that are 50 per cent. office and 50 per cent warehouse. Yet these are the sort of premises that are most needed by many of the new technologies.

Fifthly, we should remove the powers of local authorities to prevent council house tenants from starting businesses in their own homes, as long as it does not in any way offend our common laws of nuisance, noise and so on. Millions of tenants are denied the chance to start a business in their spare time or to employ themselves usefully at home if they become unemployed. No wonder there is so much vandalism and hooliganism if people are not allowed to occupy themselves usefully. In my constituency, many empty council houses are boarded up because no wants to live in them. Why not allow these buildings to be usefully occupied by small businesses, instead of being used as targets for vandals with nothing else to do? Council house tenants should not have to worry if some one is using a typewriter or computer next door, so long as there is no noise or nuisance.

Sixthly, we should put more teeth into the planning circulars issued to local authorities. For instance, circular No. 22/80 says that councillors should not make the mistake of > "enforcing the rigid separation of employment and services—especially small scale — from the residential communities which they support".

In practice, the opposite happens. A playgroup run by Mr. and Mrs. Whenlock from their home in Egerton was opposed by Socialists on the council on the grounds that that it was a business in a residential area. Where should a playgroup be but in the community that it serves? It is all very well for councillors to attempt to protect local interests and for officials to protect their structure plans, but it is central Government who have to pick up the bills for the unemployment that results. If unemployment benefit had to be paid out of the local rates, local planners would have a real incentive to encourage small businesses instead of standing in their way.

Seventhly, I should like my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to introduce a timetable for district authorities to produce individual unitary plans to replace the metropolitan structure plans. Bolton council has an opportunity in 1986 to rid itself of the straitjacket of the Greater Manchester council structure plan and provide development opportunities, free of constraints from imagined fears about the effect on other districts.

Eighthly, we should empower the officers of local authorities to issue immediate planning permission, only refusals and appeals going to committee. Eight weeks is too long to delay for most small businesses, which want immediate decisions. Councillors should appoint officers of the right calibre to make quick decisions themselves, and only refer to the committee the refusals and appeals. There is no need for every single application to be delayed for a committee decision. Councillors should be content to see the list of decisions, and bring to committee only those that they oppose.

Ninthly, we should ensure that when decisions go to appeal, the councils bear the costs when the decisions go against them. That would discourage councils from being so restrictive and from forcing small businesses to incur costs which they cannot afford.

Tenthly, councils should not be tempted to act as large-scale developers. They should be compelled to dispose of surplus land holdings and discouraged from acting so as to lay themselves open to allegations of misuse of their powers as planning authorities by attempting to dictate the development of their own sites. A tendency to draw magic lines on the map means that in a town such as Bolton perfectly sensible schemes to redevelop eye-sores such as Prospect Mill are opposed because they do not fit in with the council's preconceived ideas. Tens of millions of pounds of development could get under way immediately in Bolton, with jobs for many hundreds of people, if the council was not so blinded by its excitement over the Bark street project, worthy as that may be.

I shall give some examples of the problems and delays caused by planners. For 10 years the retailer MFI was prevented from coming to Bolton. Recently, the proprietor of another firm, a frozen food business, has been told that he must wait three years before he can have a suitable site in Bolton. An exciting new development such as Dave's Aquarium, the largest retail aquarium in Europe, was held up because the GMC structure plan made no provision for novel opportunities made possible by cheap air freight from the far east. An entrepreneur, Mr. Fred Bridge, is wondering whether it is worth all the hassle to go ahead with his next new project, which would employ 100 people.

I believe that Bolton council is probably better than most councils in wishing to encourage employment, but its answer to these questions is:

> "It is important to have a consistent policy framework to ensure that incompatible uses are avoided."

But what is consistent or compatible about Bolton's 17,000 unemployed people? Where is the plan that encourages the initiative to provide employment? Where is the plan for 17,000 jobs?

In conclusion, we were once thought of as having the finest planning system in the world, but it did not plan for 3 million unemployed. The recent publication, "The Cambridge Phenomenon," helps to explain why. In the 1950s and 1960s Cambridge council had a policy of restricting any individual business in Cambridge from taking on more than five extra employees. Indeed, IBM, the world's leading computer manufacturer, was refused planning permission to establish its European research headquarters in Cambridge. The whole country is now paying the price for such attitudes. But I wonder whether we are any better at planning today. Do we still have two worlds: the world of the planners and the real world?

Next month we have Enterprise Week, and 1986 is designated as Industry Year. I hope that both occasions will see a bonfire made of restrictions. If not, both taxpayers and the unemployed should rise up and demand to be freed from the bonds that tie us all down.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thornham) for the way in which he introduced this important subject, and I congratulate him on his shopping list and on the 10 points that he raised. I shall certainly take note of them.

This subject is very important and highly topical. Simplifying the planning system is a subject of national and local interest. Whether one is a developer, employer, householder or someone who enjoys good countryside and good architecture, it is vital that the development control system is easy to use, effective and efficient.

My hon. Friend mentioned a number of cases in which he suggests local planning authorities have been less than helpful to businesses seeking to expand. I am sure he will understand that it is difficult for me to comment on particular cases, although many of those that he quoted tonight are familiar to me, because he has, as a diligent Member of Parliament, approached me about the background. Obviously many of the details are important, and I shall be glad to look into them separately and write to him about them at a later stage. I should also be glad to write to him more fully about many of the points that he has raised tonight. It might be helpful, in that context, if I emphasised just how much we have already achieved in this field.

The Government have done much to make the planning system more efficient. About 90 per cent. of all applications are now granted and 70 per cent. of decisions are issued within eight weeks. The appeal system, administered by my Department, exists to ensure that over-zealous refusals of permission are promptly remedied. The whole country is now covered by up-to-date development plans which set a coherent context for decisions on individual applications.

The system and its operation can, and will, be further improved. There have, however, already been impressive achievements, and I shall set the background to the situation. Local planning authorities continue to deal with over 400,000 applications every year, and since 1979 the proportion decided within eight weeks has risen by 17 per cent. The number of appeals received by my Department was 25 per cent. higher last year than in 1979, and the number of full-time planning inspectors employed to deal with them was 10 per cent. lower, yet the great majority of appeals were still decided more speedily. These figures represent the cumulative effect of many small decisions and improvements in efficiency, each one in itself perhaps unspectacular, but the whole now reaping sound rewards in terms of speedier decisions and an earlier response to the developer.

Improvements in management have played their part. They have done this within the context of a more flexible framework. In 1979 we introduced the Local Government Planning and Land Bill, which concentrated development control functions at district council level and simplified procedures for the adoption of local plans. In 1980 we issued a new circular revising the basic ground rules for development control and giving special emphasis to the need for a positive approach, for efficient decision-making and for the application of sensible yardsticks in dealing with the sometimes difficult issues of small firms, housing land and the enforcement of control.

Also in 1980, we issued a consultation paper on streamlined appeal procedures, a paper which we followed up with a management consultants' study, with many detailed changes of practice and with the issue of a circular stressing the value of early appeal decisions.

In 1981, we revised the Town and Country Planning General Development Order, increasing the range of home and industrial extensions which can be built without the need to make a planning application, and creating new rights to use small warehouses as industrial buildings and vice versa, a point raised by my hon. Friend, and I shall be happy to develop it in correspondence with him in due course.

Also in 1981 were the new regulations transferring all classes of planning appeal to planning inspectors for decision. Since then only 5 per cent. of cases have had to be recovered for detailed consideration in my Department, which has meant substantially quicker decisions on many appeals.

Within the last couple of years we have put out a new code of practice on the determination of planning applications, which has made a contribution to the progress which planning authorities have made in this area. We have issued a new booklet of guidance for industrial developers, coupled with a hard-hitting circular on industrial development. We have puplished a new memorandum giving detailed guidance on the content and procedures of structure and local plans.

Early this year we gave comprehensive new advice, for the first time in 17 years, on the use of planning conditions, emphasising their crucial role in allowing development to proceed and the importance of ensuring that the restrictions they impose on development are confined to what is strictly necessary.

These measures have been effective and successful, but there can be no complacency in trying to improve the planning system. That system has a complex task. It must preserve our heritage in the towns and in the countryside, it must maintain and improve the amenity of the public , and it must be quickly responsive to the changing needs of society for new developments and new land uses which will contribute to economic growth and the provision of jobs. These objectives are not always easy to reconcile, but we must be alert to every opportunity which will allow us to streamline the system. We have not been backward in trying new approaches.

In the Local Government Planning and Land Act, for example, we took powers to create new enterprise zones, where a scheme could grant a general and broadly-based planning permission so that developers could go straight ahead with their projects without awaiting the determination of an application. The enterprise zone idea has been a great success. An independent report commissioned by my Department and published last year shows that, even then, 10,000 new jobs in just over 1,000 firms had been attracted in the first 11 zones. The house will appreciate that not everywhere can be an Enterprise Zone.

We have now suggested building on the success of the enterprise zones by creating a new type of zone, a simplified planning zone, with a planning scheme which, once adopted by the local authority, will act to grant a similar broadly-based permission tailored to the area involved and in many cases eliminating the need to seek specific permission.

Last year, when we consulted on simplified planning zones, we also sought comments on another idea to reduce the scope of control in line with local circumstances. This proposal would involve, where planning permission could be granted for a number of alternative uses on the same site, an ability to change freely between those uses once the original permission was granted, with no need to go back to the planning authority for a fresh permission on each occasion. A provision of this kind would be particularly useful for some new technology firms, a point mentioned by my hon. Friend as one of his 10 conditions for improvement.

Both of these proposals would enable us to make important advances in reducing unnecessary regulatory controls. Both my hon. Friend and I want this. It can be done in a way which can be carefully tailored to the circumstances of each case and each area. We are still considering responses to consultation on simplified planning zones, and I am certain that my hon. Friend will appreciate that I cannot comment further at this stage on his remarks about them. If, having considered the results of consultation, we proceed with our SPZ proposals, I hope that we shall find an early opportunity in the next Session to translate both of these new ideas into legislation.

I do not intend, however, that we should await that opportunity before taking further steps to reduce unnecessary burdens in the planning field, for although much has already been achieved it is clear that further opportunities for streamlining are now before us.

My hon. Friend laid stress in his remarks on the need for planning control to be particularly responsive to the needs of small businesses. I echo his sentiments 100 per cent. Our principal circular on development control policy, circular 22/80, places great emphasis on small firms and their problems, and I am glad to reaffirm its message this evening. Small businesses are important in themselves, in their economic contribution and in creating jobs. If allowed to grow they can multiply the benefits they provide. Planning control must not stand needlessly in their way. Old-fashioned prejudices against commerce in residential areas or the countryside, or against people working from home, must not be allowed to stand in the way of enterprises. Many small firms are perfectly acceptable in such circumstances, although there will obviously be cases where the impact of a business on amenity is unacceptable. We have made our policy clear on these matters and we will impose it through the appeal system. But there is more that we can and will do.

Let me take the example of telecommunications, a new and burgeoning industry with which I know my hon. Friend is familiar and one which involves many small firms in many different roles.

The liberalisation of telecommunications and the promotion of growth and competition in this field inevitably raise planning issues. It is an area of rapid technological change and we have to respond to innovations such as cellular radio, broadband cable TV and microwave systems. Planning policies must ensure that no unnecessary impediments and obstacles lie in the way of such developments, since development, very prominently in this field, represents economic growth, new jobs and greater prosperity. In 1982 a special development order was made which granted planning permission for the carrying out of development for the Mercury system on British Rail land. This was a most important step within deregulation.

A number of broader charges are currently in hand to ensure that the planning system reflects the needs of today and does not subject minor telecommunications development to otiose procedures and regulatory impediment. Our proposals will mean that all telecommunications operators with a public service obligation under the terms of their telecommunications licence will enjoy freedom from planning control when installing apparatus such as wires, poles, ducts, and smaller masts and antennae, subject to reasonable size and other limits.

This will be achieved by amendments to the Town and Country Planning General Development Order to be introduced in the next few months. The order will also be amended to permit other users of telecommunications, again without the need for a planning application, to install microwave and satellite dish antennae on larger buildings. We intend to take a very close look at any further procedures which may be necessary, because we recognise fully their effects on small firms.

My hon. Friend will be familiar with the report, published last month, of the Government's scrutiny of legislative and administrative burdens on business—he touched upon this in his remarks—and in particular their impact upon small firms. He will know the welcome which that report gave to our proposals to introduce simplified planning zones and greater freedom to change the use of buildings. We will be examining the other proposals in that report very carefully over the coming months and seeing how much we can add to them to create a package which has a real impact on the problems of small firms. But I would like to announce today two specific initiatives which I intend to take to ease the impact of the planning system on small firms.

First, I intend to issue a new circular to local planning authorities giving further guidance on the treatment of small firms. In part this will be a statement of good practice, drawing firmly to the attention of authorities the problems that businesses have in finding out what is expected of them, and by whom. But in part it will be a statement of policy which authorities will be obliged under the planning Acts to take into account in their decisions. It will reaffirm and elaborate on existing advice and make it clear that the planning approach to business development must be positive, not protectionist.

Secondly, I propose to publish a new handbook which will tell small business men, in a clear and down-to-earth way, what to expect of the planning system, when they need permission, and how to go about getting it when they do.

We have already achieved a great deal in making the planning system more prompt, more efficient and more responsive to enterprise. It is becoming clear that one of the major remaining problems is the difficulty which planners have in understanding what it is like to run a small business and that which entrepreneurs have in finding their way around the planning system. This is a real problem. It can lead to firms buying premises which are quite unsuitable in planning terms, failing to present a proper case for permission, believing permission is needed when it is not and suffering enforcement action unnecessarily.

It can lead to firms failing and to jobs being lost. I fully accept the figure given by my hon. Friend in his opening remarks. The Government are making a real effort to improve understanding, and our new circular and handbook will make a real contribution to that effort.

My hon. Friend has often expressed his concern in the past about building regulations both formally and informally. The Government are already engaged on a fundamental review of the building regulations. The object of the review is the simplication of building control procedures and their requirements. The first stage of the review will be completed later this year when new building regulations will be made. The new regulations will be much simpler in form than the current ones. They will give complete exemption to many more kinds of work. They will introduce quicker, less detailed procedures and they will also provide for private certification of building work by approved inspectors as an alternative to local authority control.

The new regulations will be supported by documents giving clear, practical guidance on how to comply with the requirements. All those improvements, making the regulations simpler to understand and quicker to use and exempting some work altogether, will, I hope, be of help to small businesses.

In the first stage of the review we have recast the existing requirements in the way that I have described. The next stage, which is about to start, will be to review the scope and content of the regulations to see that they are the minimum required to ensure reasonable standards of health and safety for people in and around buildings. That part of the review will cover all the requirements in the regulations, including those on fire safety.

There is obviously no intention here of abandoning basic safety standards, but there is scope for making the regulations simpler and less onerous. The scrutiny of administrative burdens on small businesses has pointed the way and highlighted in particular the problems of the conversion of existing buildings for commercial use. That scrutiny recommended that the Department's review should proceed with all speed, and that is the Government's intention.

The simplification of the planning system is the subject of the debate and that is the Government's strategy. I shall develop many of the points that my hon. Friend has raised tonight in correspondence with him, but I am grateful to him for giving the House the opportunity of discussing this important subject. It is our intention to make all haste. Simplifying the planning system is one of the most integral and important means that we have to regenerate the economy at all levels.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Truancy

1. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce the details of his renewed effort to tackle truancy, as promised in the White Paper "Better Schools".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): As my right hon. Friend said in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on 22 March, at column 626, a draft circular on school attendance and education welfare services was sent on 21 March to local authority and teacher associations and to other relevant organisations. Comments on the document have been sought by the end of June and it is hoped that the final version of the circular will be issued soon after that date.

Mr. Hayes: Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem of truancy is particularly worrying in the fourth and fifth years, especially in the light of a recent report that in Salford schools 20 per cent. non-attendance occurs every day? Does my hon. Friend regret the shocking fact that today's truant is very often tomorrow's unemployed, and, worse still, tomorrow's unemployable?

Mr. Dunn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing to my attention and that of the House the report on the school in the city of Salford. I undertake that inquiries will be made. I am sure that the House will accept his other observation as well. There are a number of reasons why young people play truant from school, and we are grappling with the causes in many ways. I hope that, in future, many people who encourage children to play truant, whether parents, employers or others, will think long and wisely about their action in taking young people out of the classroom, which can only be to the detriment of the young people concerned.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not clear that the lack of motivation for many young people in schools, which stems from the knowledge that they will be thrown on the scrapheap as soon as they leave school, with no job to go to, is one of the main causes of truancy? Is it not also clear that a better pupil-teacher ratio, so that children can be better taught, particularly at that age, would be helpful? When the Minister has handled that problem, will he deal with the truancy in this place, which is enormous compared with that in schools?

Mr. Dunn: My responsibilities do not extend to the House. The hon Gentleman's interpretation is, as usual, far too simplistic and therefore unhelpful. There are a variety of reasons why young people play truant, and we should address our minds to those matters rather than make party political points.

Mr. Favell: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the best ways to combat truancy is to improve the quality, and not the quantity, of teachers, as the better the teacher the easier it is to maintain the interest of a pupil?

Mr. Dunn: I agree, and we are attempting to make the curriculum broader and more relevant and attractive to young people who are, to use the vernacular, turned off by what happens in schools today. My hon. Friend is right in his interpretation of what is needed.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that since the end of the war the level of truancy in shire county schools has hardly changed, by and large, taking into account areas such as that covered by the Derbyshire education authority? Will he bear in mind that I agree with my hon. Friend the member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) that it is bordering on hypocrisy for Tory Members to talk about absenteeism when some hon. Members turn up for less than 30 per cent. of the time —[Interruption] like the leader of the SDP, who voted in only 30 per cent. of all the Divisions in the last parliamentary Session?

Mr. Dunn: There was an Opposition debate yesterday on the social services, during which the Opposition Benches were empty. If the proportions had remained the same as they were in 1945, far too many young people would still be playing truant from school.

Universities (Jarratt Report)

2. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the Jarratt report about efficiency in universities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Peter Brooke): Sir Alexander Jarratt's steering committee for efficiency studies in the universities, which was set up by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, has produced recommendations which merit serious and early consideration by those to whom they are addressed. My right hon. Friend will be considering with the CVCP and the University Grants Committee how the report can best be pursued.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Minister not agree that the Jarratt report indicted the Government for the way in which they had imposed the 1981 cuts, which led not to greater efficiency within the universities, but to short-term inefficiency, and took the view that if the Government continue to insist that university resources should be cut by 1 or 2 per cent. each year the situation will become even worse? Was not the strongest recommendation of the report the suggestion that we should return to a quinquennial review system so that the universities could have a continual re-assessment of funding, on level terms at least?

Mr. Brooke: The Government accept that they must give the best possible indication of longer-term policies for higher education. However, the difficulties of providing precise funding indications are the same for higher education as for other public expenditure programmes. Planning requires the management of resources in circumstances of uncertainty. The Green Paper on higher education policy, which the Government hope to publish shortly, and the subsequent discussions, will help to set the scene for the development of higher education policy into the next decade.

Mr. Jim Callaghan: After the publication of the study of efficiency in the universities, is it the Minister's intention to produce a Green Paper on scientific research in the universities? If so, when does he propose to introduce it?

Mr. Brooke: The Green Paper which my right hon. Friend proposes to publish on higher education, which will be issued shortly, will certainly cover that subject.

Mr. Pawsey: How much funding is reaching the universities from industry? Is my hon. Friend aware of what has taken place at Warwick university, especially at the business school and the science park there? Does my hon. Friend appreciate how much funding is reaching our universities from private sources?

Mr. Brooke: I can give my hon. Friend the encouraging news that since 1979 contributions to universities from private sources of one sort or another have risen by 18 per cent. in real terms.

Education Needs (Bradford)

3. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make additional resources available to meet education needs in Bradford.

Mr. Dunn: It is for Bradford to provide for education within the total resources available to the authority.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister appreciate that the education crisis in Bradford does not flow from the parents, from a headmaster who has insulted many of his pupils' parents and caused them to lose confidence in him, or from teachers and pupils who are trying to work together in schools, many of which are old, dilapidated, overcrowded, under-staffed and seriously under-equipped? When will the Government give Bradford the money to combat its education crisis and enable it to give the young people there a decent start in life and provide the education which parents are fully entitled to expect for their children?

Mr. Dunn: I am fully aware of the problems at Bradford, but it is for the authority to balance its judgment of the need to spend on services against the interests of the local ratepayer.

Mr. Galley: My hon. Friend is fully aware of the difficulties of multi-racial education in Bradford and other parts of west Yorkshire, and the issues raised by the disgraceful hounding of Mr. Honeyford. In a number of instances in west Yorkshire and Bradford there are racial minorities within a school with a large ethnic majority. Will my hon. Friend issue guidance to local education authorities to ensure that they adopt an even-handed approach and give the educationally disadvantaged special attention, whether they are brown, black, yellow or white?

Mr. Dunn: We are concerned about disadvantaged children, irrespective of their background. The House ought to know that the Department of Education and Science is currently investigating Mr. Honeyford's case under section 68 of the Education Act 1944. In view of my right hon. Friend's quasi-judicial role in that matter, I cannot comment further.

Mr. Torney: Is the Minister aware that Bradford has many Asian and other immigrant people? Does he agree that the Honeyford case is a red herring, brought up by the Tory representatives on the council to cover up the colossal shortage of the amount of money that is needed to provide the type of pupil-teacher ratio required in Bradford's schools because they have so many immigrant children? Will he take account of the fact that rate capping has an effect on the education of our children? These are the real issues, not the Honeyford case. Will the Minister pay attention to them?

Mr. Dunn: Bradford's primary and secondary school pupil-teacher ratios were at their lowest ever level, at 20 and 17·4 respectively, at January 1984. Both ratios have fallen significantly since 1982, when they were 20·9 and 18·9 respectively. Those figures do not suggest a decline in provision.

Drug Abuse (Teacher Training)

4. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he plans to provide central funding for specialised in-service courses for teachers in the problems of drug abuse.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): Under the Department's programme for supporting regional in-service training courses, regional courses concerned with drug misuse, and arranged in consultation with the Department, will be eligible for central funding.

Mr. Sackville: Does my right hon. Friend feel that to have one key teacher who understands something about drugs in each school is the minimum that we need to tackle the problem? Does he feel that his Department has done enough to achieve that end?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with the purpose of my hon. Friend's question. The Government are now addressing themselves to ensuring that more information is available on which crucial groups such as teachers can rest with self-confidence in their detection of and advice to those concerned.

Mr. Boyes: Is the Secretary of State aware that after only one shot of heroin some youngsters are on a short journey to death? Has he had an opportunity to read in today's Daily Mirror the tragic story of Fiona Marshall, aged only 17? Does he acknowledge the tremendous campaign being run by the Daily Mirror against drug abuse, and does he agree that that campaign, calling for advice, co-ordination and treatment on drug addiction and for drug addicts, is vital? Does he further agree that the Government's suggestion of providing £2 million is insufficient and that there should be a massive injection of cash into schools so that people can be caught early and given treatment?

Sir Keith Joseph: I do not want in any way to minimise the importance which the hon. Gentleman rightly wishes to give the subject or to the efforts of the Daily Mirror, but we are advised that there is a danger of being counter-productive and of glamourising the subject. That is why we are taking care to put together constructive advice for those immediately concerned.

Sir Bernard Braine: Although shock tactics might not always be the right answer for drug misuse by young children, does my right hon. Friend agree that we cannot start too early to warn young children of the dangers involved? Will he take seriously the suggestion of our hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville)? Is he contemplating issuing any directive to local education authorities on the subject? He must surely be aware that the problem is serious, and growing.

Sir Keith Joseph: My right hon. Friend has a fine record in trying to mobilise solutions to a parallel social problem — alcoholism — and I take what he says extremely seriously. He mentioned the key element — the danger of giving the wrong impression and of steering children in the wrong direction. There is also danger in trying to bring the truth to children at too early an age, as is might do more harm than good. Nevertheless, I take the subject extremely seriously.

Teacher Training

5. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the Government's plans for the future number of teacher training places.

Mr. Dunn: Provisional decisions on intakes to initial teacher training in England and Wales from 1986 were announced last month. We propose that intakes to primary training should increase from 8,620 in 1985 to 10,950 by 1989 and that intakes to secondary training over the same period should increase from 9,032 to 9,850.

Mr. Sedgemore: Will the Minister confirm that the number of graduates seeking teacher training places has fallen by 16 per cent.? Does he agree that if we are to raise numbers and standards we must pay teachers adequately?

Mr. Dunn: I undertake to look into the point raised by the hon. Gentleman and to write to him. I think he shares our concern that the quality of the teacher is important in the life of the school and in the educaton that a child receives. When CATE, the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education, has finished its work, we shall be somewhat further forward in that goal.

Mr. Forman: Adequate teacher training numbers are obviously important, but is my hon. Friend satisfied with the efforts of his Department and others to improve the curriculum of teacher training colleges so that the element of teacher training practice is given suitable prominence?

Mr. Dunn: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's supplementary question. As he will know, last September we appointed to CATE a number of people who will have a great deal of work to do in that regard in the assessment of courses. He will share my concern that that work is done as soon as possible so that we may bring the results to bear in the classroom, where they are needed.

Mr. Haynes: Is the hon. Gentleman not ashamed of himself? [Interruption.] I hope that the Minister can hear me. He should be, and the Secretary of State should also be ashamed. They have every reason to be ashamed of the teacher training figures, when many of those with the necessary qualifications are sweeping the streets when they should be teaching the children. When will Ministers wake up and do the job for which they have been elected?

Mr. Dunn: I had some difficulty in hearing the hon. Gentleman. Unemployment among teachers rose early in the 1980s largely as a result of the fall in pupil numbers, which has now ended, in primary schools. The number of vacancies for primary school teachers is expected to rise for a number of years, and training intakes have been adjusted accordingly.

Mr. Radice: Is not the real reason why the number of teacher training applicants is reported to be down this year the fact that the message is getting through that teaching is a badly paid job? Does that not provide a further powerful argument for the Government to respond positively to the call from the management side of Burnham for extra resources from the Government to help solve the teachers' dispute?

Mr. Dunn: That supplementary question would be best directed to a group of questions which will be answered together later. There are still a far greater number of applicants for places at teacher training institutions than there are vacancies at those institutions.

Teachers (Pay)

6. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning the level of teachers' pay.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have received about 1,300 letters, including some 300 from hon. and right hon. Members, about all aspects of the current pay dispute.

Mr. Cohen: Is it not a fact that under the pressure of the county council elections the employers are beginning to see the light and are adopting a new negotiating position? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is time for the Government to be more forthright and to improve the funds which they are making available so that a proper settlement, which recognises the excellent worth of the teachers to the community, can be reached?

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman is not quoting the employers' statement. The employers, in a carefully drafted statement, say that they want to discuss with me "the basis upon which additional resources can be sought." I think they mean by that statement that they want to discuss with me, and with the teachers, the offer that I have made, namely, that if the teachers and employers can make a bargain which I judge to be to the educational benefit of the children and to be affordable, I shall at once take it to my Cabinet colleagues to see whether I can obtain from them — I cannot guarantee the answer — extra finance. That is what the employers were referring to.

7. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current teachers' dispute.

12. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

13. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the effect of the teachers' strike.

17. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

19. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

Sir Keith Joseph: Management's offers of a 4 per cent. increase, arbitration and further discussion of pay structure reform remain on the table. All three have been rejected. The two largest teacher unions are set on a course of intensified industrial action, causing deliberate harm to children's education, in support of their claim for an extra £1,200 for all teachers. That claim is wholly unrealistic and no amount of industrial action will change the fact that increases of that order are not remotely affordable.

Mr. Proctor: Is my right hon. Friend aware that last week the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) advocated the expenditure of £50 million to employ 14,000 more teachers, which works out at £3,500 per teacher? Is that not totally unrealistic? Is not the real solution to the teachers' dispute to be found through negotiations, rather than through disruption or unrealistic claims?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with my hon. Friend that negotiations on one of the three options open to the teachers is the way forward. I think that before the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) says anything about the current teachers' dispute, he should explain to the House how he justifies his view, which seems to emerge from his press statement, that £50 million will buy 14,000 extra teachers; that is to say, £3,500 per teacher.

Mr. Freud: Will the Secretary of State give the House an assurance that appraisal will not be linked to the quality of teaching—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"]—and does he accept that the introduction of merit awards in a low-pay sector would have disastrous consequences?

Sir Keith Joseph: I shall make no such pledge. I ask the hon. Member to bear in mind that promotion, which carries with it higher pay, is, of course, already based on an informal system of assessment or appraisal, and that what the Government seek is that that system of appraisal should be made formal with the agreement and with the help of teachers through discussions. I am saying, not that appraisal has to be connected with merit pay, but that the whole subject should be discussed and tried out in pilot schemes for which money from the taxpayer has been set aside. The one inexcusable thing is to refuse even to discuss it, which is what the teachers' unions are doing.

Mr. Adley: Will my right hon. Friend try to answer a question which was put to me by a constituent at the weekend and which I found difficult? Why, he asked me, did the teachers last year go on strike because they could not get arbitration, and why are they taking strike action this year even though they have been offered arbitration? As my constituent also said, is it not emerging from some of the teachers' leaders that their ambition is to try to embarrass Her Majesty's Government by organising a strike in this way?

Sir Keith Joseph: I think that the apparent contradiction to which my hon. Friend refers must be explained by the fact that last year the teachers obtained from arbitration only 0·6 of 1 per cent. more than they had already been offered. The idea that an arbitrator can, as it were, find free and floating in the air extra resources is part of the Utopian approach of many Opposition Members.

Mr. Flannery: Is the Secretary of State aware that during the conference over Easter of the two major teachers' unions, embracing the vast majority of all teachers, the most determined unity emerged? Does he not realise that it is useless for him to say that he does not decide the wages of teachers, but that the employers do? He knows that he has 15 votes on the Burnham committee and that he decides the teachers' wages. Does he accept that the unity of the teachers is so massive that unless new money is put on the table, separate from the negotiations on reappraisal, this strike and industrial dispute will go on indefinitely and will be the longest teachers' action of all time?

Sir Keith Joseph: I pay tribute to those teachers' unions, and to the members of other teachers' unions, which have decided not to disrupt children's education. I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's view that the teachers' unions are unanimous. In fact, I seem to detect among them a great deal of disagreement about what they should or should not be seeking to do. Indeed, some unions disagree with the whole idea of causing disruption.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the leadership of the National Union of Teachers, in encouraging strike action, thereby disrupting children's education, is doing immense damage to the professional standing of teachers? Does he further agree that the only way to settle their pay claim is either by returning to the restructuring talks on teachers' salaries or by going to arbitration? Will he confirm that any award made by arbitration under section 3 of the Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965 is binding and can be turned down only by a vote of both Houses of Parliament, on the basis that the economic conditions of the country do not allow it to be implemented?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with all that my right hon. and learned Friend says. I believe, in addition, that the leadership of the NUT was guilty of grossly misleading its members in the expectations that it aroused last year—witness the arbitration award—and is doing so again this year.

I should like to take the opportunity of my right hon. and learned Friend's question to say that, while an arbitration award would be binding, except in the circumstances that he described, the Government still stand by their refusal to find any extra money for the honouring of an arbitration award which, over the level of the offer already made by the employers, would have to come out of local authority funds.

Mr. Fatchett: Given the Secretary of State's obstinate refusal to play a constructive part in looking for a solution to the dispute, how far does he personally feel responsible for the disruption of the education of children in his own constituency and in the city of Leeds? Is that not really an indictment of his own period in office as Secretary of State?

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman is guilty of thinking that it is constructive to spend taxpayers' money regardless of the consequences. We have been through that period under both Labour and Conservative Governments, and the result has been rocketing inflation and rocketing unemployment. That would be no service to the teachers, to the children or to their parents.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend join me in saying firmly and fairly that schools are, first and foremost, for children and their education? Further, will he join me in saying that it was excellent that the teachers' conference decided not to disrupt examination invigilation? However, is it not deplorable that some examination teaching may be disrupted? Is it not also important to say that all education, not just examinations, is important and that the teachers should call off their strike straight away?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with my hon. Friend. I think that the Opposition, by accepting the dogma of more spending regardless of the consequences, are espousing a thoroughly perverse set of policies. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), the Opposition spokesman, must explain how he can offer, as he did in his press conference last week, hundreds of millions of pounds—indeed, over £1,000 million—of extra spending. He gave no explanation at the time. The hon. Gentleman has evidently not costed in the £200 million the implications of what he was pleased to pledge—the phasing out of private schools. Presumably he does not take that seriously, as he did not cost it at all.

The hon. Gentleman has also failed to cost the implications in hundreds of millions of pounds of the pledge which he has made, and will reinforce tomorrow, I understand, to provide nursery education for all. He has grossly underestimated the cost and has priced teachers at a salary of £3,500 each. The hon. Gentleman really must explain the cost of what he has left out and how any Labour Government, which I pray are unlikely to be returned, would find the money.

Mr. Radice: I thank the Secretary of State for devoting at least most of his answer to the Labour party programme. I must say that it is a bit rich for him to talk about costs when his own White Paper is not costed at all. He knows perfectly well that his own White Paper would cost £1 billion to implement. He has not come clean with the House. Is he aware that the Conservative Central Office has not understood that £50 million was a net figure? The right hon. Gentleman intends to cut the number of teachers by over 6,000 in the coming year. Finally — [Interruption.]—and let us get back to the teachers' dispute, which he started—is he now saying that he will respond positively—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Questions from the Front Bench should be brief—all questions should be brief—and should be listened to with courtesy and attention.

Mr. Radice: Is the Secretary of State going to respond positively to the request from the management side of Burnham for extra resources — and that is in the statement—to help solve the teachers' dispute?

Sir Keith Joseph: The question is whether the Labour Opposition intend, if given the chance, to phase out independent education. [HON. MEMBERS: "That is not the question."] If so, why did they not include the cost of it in the budget in the Labour party programme?

Adult Education

8. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will convene a conference of organisations concerned with adult and continuing education to discuss the future of this part of the education service.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have no plans to do so. I spoke last week at the annual conference of the National Institute of Adult Continuing Education and, during questions, offered to meet some of those present on specific aspects.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Secretary of State aware of the universal dissatisfaction with Government policies of all interested organisations because of the constant cutting of resources in adult continuing education? I challenge the right hon. Gentleman not only to meet the body, which is not fully representative, as he knows, but to meet all representatives to answer the criticisms which some of us receive virtually every week. In particular, in the case of an adult who is capable of taking and wishes to take a university degree, will he say that there will be no obstacles to that adult doing so, not only for his personal fulfilment, but for the good of the country?

Sir Keith Joseph: I share with the hon. Gentleman a great respect for all those who work in adult education. I will gladly meet, as I have offered, various groups from those concerned. But I think that the hon. Gentleman is doing injustice to Government policy. He is probably accepting the figures contained in the White Paper on public expenditure without taking account of the unallocated margin, and he forgets that the Government, to their credit, have four new initiatives in adult education, for which they have provided extra money.

Mr. Squire: As my right hon. Friend takes direct responsibility for adult education, will he apply his considerable intellect to breaking the cycle of poorly educated parents producing poorly education children, and recognise that one of the most effective ways of doing that is through an expansion of the adult education programme?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree about the importance of breaking that cycle to the extent that that is humanly possible. I also accept that the adult education work done through "Outreach" can do much to help. I respect that, and will try to encourage it.

Mr. Sheerman: The Secretary of State challenged teachers at last week's conference to explain their role in motivating the disadvantaged, but they could tell him that, as professionals, they know how to do that if they are given the resources to carry out the work. Is it not true that this Government do not believe in further and continuing education, as illustrated by the cuts in local authority provision, in extramural departments, and in the Open University, as well as by the savage cuts in aid to the Workers Education Association?

Sir Keith Joseph: I repeat that to the extent that adult education can help to break that cycle, I shall seek to encourage it to do so. The hon. Gentleman's story of cuts is not accurate. The unallocated margin explains that adult education spending by local authorities may not be cut at all.

Teachers (Pay)

9. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation to replace the present negotiating machinery for teachers' pay with a system which directly links pay with performance.

Sir Keith Joseph: The current pay structure for school teachers, as negotiated by the Burnham primary and secondary committee, allows employers some discretion, through scale promotions, to relate pay to performance. I am not persuaded that the replacement of the negotiating machinery is the key to bringing about a structure in which pay is more directly linked to performance.

Mr. Maclean: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that those who take so-called industrial action should abide by the other rules by which those involved in industry have to live, where pay is directly linked to performance? Is it not time that my right hon. Friend introduced legislation to sweep away the present machinery and impose a system of pay related to performance?

Sir Keith Joseph: I do not accept that it is the machinery that prevents a move in the direction that my hon. Friend seeks. The experience before our eyes in Scotland shows that even when the machinery is reformed in the way that he now seeks the results are not as had been hoped for.

Mr. Canavan: Does the Secretary of State accept that the vast majority of teachers are dedicated, overworked and underpaid, and that if a system were introduced to link ministerial pay to performance he would be sent home with an empty pay packet?

Sir Keith Joseph: Underneath the banter, there is a certain amount of common ground between us — [Interruption]—I stress "a certain amount." I accept that most teachers are dedicated and hardworking. I also believe that most of them would welcome a system of appraisal in the preparation of which they had had some say.

Mr. Madel: As the important salary restructuring talks need to proceed, will my right hon. Friend remind those involved in the negotiations that the Government's aim is to reward the effective classroom teacher with improved pay and promotion prospects?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, Sir. The Government have declared their intention to introduce legislation and extra finance to expand in-service training so that an appraisal system can back up improved professional and career prospects, as well as perhaps having an influence on pay.

Engineering and Science (Undergraduates)

10. Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the recently announced increase in places for undergraduates in engineering and science.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend announced on 3 April the 20 institutions which should participate in the first phase of the programme and gave details of the relevant departments and the proposed intakes. The second phase of the engineering and technology programme will be announced later.

Mr. Mills: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Given the increasing shortage of engineering and science graduates and technicians, can he reassure me that this switch is not really a switch, and that the increase in places for engineering and science is not simply a substitution for places in other disciplines?

Mr. Brooke: The Government have been urged frequently by industry in the past year that the number of students in engineering and technology, and particularly in information technology subjects, should be increased. The programme which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced is in response to that.

Dr. Bray: Is the Minister aware that only a very temporary glut in the supply of micro circuits has prevented the demand for electronic engineers going through the roof this year? Is he further aware that the proposed increase in the production of engineers is totally inadequate, given the demands of industry?

Mr. Brooke: We are confident that the industry can certainly absorb more graduates with appropriate qualifications. The hon. Gentleman would not expect me to share his faith in manpower planning, but he will be glad to know that an IMS study is being conducted on demand for and supply of information technology manpower.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. David Marshall asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with President Rene of the Seychelles.

Mr. Marshall: Will the Prime Minister confirm her cynical policy to reform the rating system before the next general election? In view of the disastrous situation now facing Scottish ratepayers, will she immediately authorise an emergency allocation of £100 million—only 1 per cent. of the cost of Trident — to ease their burden? Instead of visiting Singapore and Bali, will she visit Shettleston and Baillieston to see the consequences of her policy, or is she afraid to leave London and visit other parts of Britain?

The Prime Minister: I shall, of course, be going up to Scotland in May, as is customary. I cannot agree to the allocation of £100 million. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, we have made a special allocation to help the domestic ratepayer, who is particularly hard hit. I am aware that a number of commercial ratepayers are also particularly hard hit. If local authorities were to spend less, that would be a great help to ratepayers.

Mr. Steel: As the Secretary of State for Employment has given a cautious welcome to the setting up of the Employment Institute, and the chairman of the Conservative party has sought to belittle it, will the right hon. Lady say which of her colleagues' views she supports?

The Prime Minister: Everyone who can help to solve the problem in practical terms, as distinct from talking about it, is welcome. I hope that some of them will be able to create new businesses which, in practice, will create new jobs. In the meantime, I recognise that two of the suggestions which it has proposed which would help have already been put in hand by this Government. For example, it has proposed a cut in the employers' national insurance contribution, and that has already occurred. It has proposed an increase in the community programme, and that has already occurred. It would seem that we have a number of things in common.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the concern felt by some of us at the remark made by the Prime Minister of Malaysia during her recent visit that the Commonwealth is now just a sentimental attachment? Does she agree that it is a unique grouping of nations which, given the will, have the potential to play a major part in world development and peace?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I believe that the Commonwealth still has a role. It is a unique group of nations which girdle the world. We meet alternate years in conference, and there are regional conferences. I believe that that is valuable both politcally and economically and for technical co-operation. I believe that Malaysia, too, will find it valuable.

Mr. Rooker: Will the Prime Minister tell us why, after seven Conservative Budgets, workers on average earnings and half average earnings are paying a higher proportion of those earnings in tax and national insurance than under the previous Labour Government?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman tells only half the story. Were the rates of income tax and the structure as in 1979 when we took them over, people would be paying £6 billion more in income tax. The Conservative Government put up thresholds—that is, tax-free allowances—in real terms by 16 per cent., whereas the Labour Government put down tax-free allowances in real terms.

Q2. Mr. Adley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 23 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Adley: Following the question from the leader of the Liberal party, will my right hon. Friend make it quite clear that she is prepared to welcome any groups of new people who may have time to spare and be willing to put themselves forward for the study of a possible solution to the problem of unemployment? Will she endorse the statement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment concerning a group which may come up with new ideas and which, even if it does not, certainly at the beginning of its life should be given some sort of welcome?

The Prime Minister: I hope that I have indicated my view. We need new business, and anything that will assist in the formation of new business will be helpful. We are already considering a number of measures, including tax incentives. In particular, we are reducing the considerable number of regulations and examining planning permission. Anything that is conductive to the development of new business will certainly be very helpful.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister is now considering the report and recommendations of the review body on nurses' pay. Will the right hon. Lady give an undertaking that, as a matter of policy, she will support an award that at least will begin the return to the levels of real pay received by nurses in 1980? Will she also give an undertaking that in no circumstances will she finance any part of any award by taking money from the rest of the NHS?

The Prime Minister: Three reports arrived yesterday, including the report on nurses. We shall consider these reports together. I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman undertakings in advance of proper consideration. He will be aware that he will be the first to accuse me of increasing public expenditure if we do so. He knows that the Labour party wants increased public expenditure, but he will be the first to accuse us if it results in increased interest rates or increased taxation. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the levels of real pay received by nurses in 1980. He will therefore be very much aware that this Government have done much better by the nurses than the previous Labour Government.

Mr. Kinnock: The right hon. Lady, the country and the nurses will recall that that level was achieved because of the Clegg award, which the right hon. Lady opposed at the time but which had to be introduced because of the way in which she undertook during the general election campaign to take action. Can the right hon. Lady now tell me, without evasion, whether she agrees that public expenditure should be used to give justice and proper rewards to those who obviously deserve such rewards? Does the right hon. Lady think that the nurses are properly paid in 1985?

The Prime Minister: I noted what the right hon. Gentleman said about Clegg. This Government honoured the Clegg award. The previous Labour Government, not having the resources, made empty promises which they left us to honour. This Government honoured the nurses' award and reduced their working week from 40 hours to 37½ hours. This Government have found the resources for 57,000 extra nurses and midwives. The right hon. Gentleman has a nerve even to ask that question.

Mr. Richard Page: Is my right hon. Friend aware that her visit two weeks ago to the far east has been very much welcomed by British exporters? Would my right hon. Friend care to build on that by examining our overseas aid budget to ensure that it will generate the maximum activity at home, especially to create jobs? In particular, will my right hon. Friend consider increasing the overseas aid and trade provision?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. Exporters very much welcomed the visit. The visit to those regions was necessary. I cannot give an undertaking to increase the overseas aid budget or the overseas aid and trade provision. We must examine carefully the distribution of that aid to maximise the number of jobs that we can secure in this country from the expenditure of that money.

Q3. Mr. Terry Fields asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 23 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fields: Will the Prime Minister admit that, despite her boast during her visit to semi-dictatorships in the far east that she saw off the miners, the miners' magnificent struggle for jobs has been the source of inspiration for those who are prepared to stand up and fight against unemployment, especially the young people and students who, supported by parents and teachers, will take strike action on Thursday against industrial conscription? In view of the fact that the right hon. Lady is prepared to introduce compulsory industrial conscription for 16-year-olds, is she prepared to give youth the vote at 16?

The Prime Minister: Although I tried to follow the hon. Gentleman's meanderings, what is painfully clear is that he supports strikes. In doing so, he defeats the prospects for getting export jobs for this country. Then he will assuredly complain about unemployment. I doubt whether he really wants to solve the unemployment problem. If he did, he would not support strikes; he would support action to prevent strikes.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: In view of the emphasis placed upon education by the Labour party during the current county council elections, will my right hon. Friend take time today to look at that party's recent education proposals? Will she note that the Labour party's commitment to additional resources is equalled by its commitment and pledge to do away with independent schools? Therefore, despite all that the Labour party says about the shortage of resources, it is planning for no increase in expenditure on state education.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for so cogently making that point. As he will be aware, expenditure per pupil and the proportion of teachers to pupils in the state education system is at an all-time record under the Conservative Government. It is we who deliver the goods; it is the Labour party which does the talking.

Mr. Litherland: Does the Prime Minister agree that the increase in inflation, on top of the appalling level of unemployment, confirms that the Government's monetarist policies are not working and are bringing only misery and deprivation to this country, especially in the inner city areas?

The Prime Minister: No. I think that many of us would be quite glad to have had the level of inflation that we now have for a longer period. The hon. Gentleman will recall that under the Labour Government inflation went up to 27 per cent. and that it fundamentally undermined the social as well as the financial fabric of this country.

As for unemployment, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that we have achieved record output, a record standard of living and record investment. We have a very considerable unemployment problem, but the answer to it lies not in the direction which the hon. Gentleman would go, but in the formation of new small businesses, which will grow and create genuine jobs.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Following the question put by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields), does my right hon. Friend agree that the leadership of the National Union of Mineworkers would greatly enhance its reputation if it condemned the intolerable treatment by the miners who went on strike of those who chose not to go on strike? Does she further agree that the treatment of those who did not go on strike is an intolerable blot upon the reputation of the trade union movement?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I wholly agree with my hon. Friend. Unfortunately, the whole world knows that the miners' strike lasted for a year, that it was perpetuated through violence and intimidation, that it was supported by the Labour party, and that it was the Government, the working miners and the mass of the trade union movement that stood out against it and saw it off. I hope that my hon. Friend's advice will be taken in the quarters where it should be taken.

Mr. Home Robertson: May we have a little less humbug from the Prime Minister about rates in Scotland? Is she aware that in a written reply to me last week the Secretary of State for Scotland confirmed that, as a result of revaluation and successive cuts in rate support grant, domestic and commercial ratepayers in Scotland are bearing a 50 per cent. greater share of the burden of the costs of local services than they were when this Government came to power. So let us have a little less humbug. Will the Prime Minister admit that it is the Conservative Government who are responsible for the miseries of Scottish ratepayers?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman refers to proportions. If the total expenditure were less, the burden on the domestic ratepayer would be less. Although comparatively few Scottish electors pay rates, Labour local authorities unfortunately do not hesitate to place an intolerable burden upon them.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Has my right hon. Friend noticed today that Dr. Sidney Gee has been awarded libel damages amounting to £75,000 against the "That's Life" programme? Does she agree that the time has come for the lawyers' profession to be investigated, just as every other profession is investigated, since the actual costs in that case, in order to obtain justice, amounted to £1·2 million? Has not the time come when those who are libelled should at least obtain a fairer share of the costs, instead of £1·2 million going to the lawyers?

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend feels strongly about that matter. I shall draw his remarks to the attention of the appropriate Law Officers.

Mr. O'Brien: Having advised the House that she has now received the report on nurses' pay, will the Prime Minister assure the House and the nurses that she will not sit on the report, as she did last year? Will she implement the decision as quickly as possible, given the full implications?

The Prime Minister: We have still more reports to receive. The one from the Top Salaries Review Body will be some time, and therefore we shall probably not wait for it. It has a number of matters to consider. I hope that we shall be able to consider the rest before that one. There is still, of course, the doctors' and dentists' review body report to come. I am sure the hon. Gentleman understands that we must consider carefully how to find all the money that we decide must be found across the board, bearing in mind that it comes not from the Government but from taxpayers.

Later——

Mr. Heddle: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. During education questions, the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) caught your eye in order to ask a question about truancy. Was it not a gross abuse of Question Time for the hon. Gentleman to raise such a subject when 90 per cent. of the parliamentary Labour party were not in the Chamber, only one member of the Liberal party was present, and the Social Democratic party Member——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If there was an abuse, it is being repeated now. I do not propose to let it continue.

Soviet Diplomats (Expulsion)

3.30 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East) (by private notice) asked the Foreign Secretary if he will make a statement on the expulsion of Soviet diplomats from London and the Soviet response.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): Our policy towards the Soviet Union is consistent and clear, and has been made clear to the Russians on numerous occasions including most recently when informing them of the expulsions. We wish to improve relations with the Soviet Union. We have made considerable efforts in that direction which will be maintained, but they have been hampered by the unacceptable activities of certain Soviet officials in this country. In the circumstances, and in accordance with our long-established policy, we had no choice but to expel the officials concerned.

We deeply regret the retaliatory action taken against three members of the staff of our Moscow embassy. That was wholly unwarranted, and the accusations made against them without substance. We have protested strongly to the Soviet authorities.

There can be no relaxation of our policy where national security is concerned, but we shall continue our policy of seeking improved relations with the Soviet Union, and better relations between East and West.

Mr. Healey: The Foreign Secretary will recognise that the Opposition approve his attempt to improve relations with the Soviet Union and welcome the progress that he has made in recent weeks. That makes it all the more difficult to understand why he mishandled the case of the behaviour of Soviet diplomats. As I understand it, the Foreign Office made it clear last night that it was prepared to ask three of the Soviet diplomats engaged in illegitimate activities to leave without publicity, on condition that the Soviets did not expel British diplomats in retaliation. In that case, why did he not approach all five diplomats in the same way, when he might have received an acceptable response? He must recognise now that the way in which he mishandled the case—the fact that he has made a distinction between two expelled with publicity and three expelled with the promise of no publicity—is difficult not just for the Opposition but for foreign diplomatists in Moscow to understand.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not believe that the right hon. Gentleman can sustain that charge. When the Soviet ambassador was informed last Thursday, he was told that Captain Los, the assistant naval attache, who had been found to have engaged in activities incompatible with his status, should leave the country within seven days. He was further informed that Mr. Grigorov, a member of the staff of the Soviet airline Aeroflot, was also found to have engaged in unacceptable activities and that, if he were still in the country in seven days, measures would be taken against him.

The ambassador was informed at the same time that we wished the Soviet authorities to withdraw a further three officials within one month for activities agair incompatible with their status and presence in this country. The Soviet ambassador was also told that if, in response to the expulsion of Captain Los and Mr. Grigorov, the Soviet authorities expelled any member of the British community in Moscow, we would then publicly expel the three named officials and reduce the Soviet embassy's ceiling accordingly. The Soviet authorities chose to disregard that warning and informed us last night of their requirement that three members of our embassy staff in Moscow should leave. It was in those circumstances that we informed the Soviet chargé d'affaires that three further named officials — Captain Zaikin, assistant naval attache, Colonel Cherkasov, assistant military attache, and Mr. Belaventsev, the third secretary, must also leave this country within seven days and that the appropriate embassy ceiling had been reduced.

In those circumstances, the way in which we handled the matter was consistent with our overall objective of wishing to diminish the impact of this incident on our search to improve East-West relations. We had also to take into account our intention to protect, as far as we could, the position of the British community in Moscow. It was on that basis that we gave the original information. It was as a result of the Soviet response that we found it necessary and right to follow through the original warning.

I must emphasise that this sort of incident arises because of unacceptable conduct by Soviet officials in this country. It is necessary to respond appropriately to such conduct and at the same time to underline the fact that we remain committed to improving relations between East and West. That fact was emphasised in each of the conversations with the Soviet ambassador and Soviet authorities during the past three days.

Mr. Healey: The Foreign Secretary has confirmed my suggestion that he mishandled the affair. He still has not explained why he drew a distinction between announcing the expulsion of two of the offending diplomats and being prepared to keep secret the expulsion of the other three. Is it not the case that his hand was forced by a quite impermissible leak in a British national newspaper of his intention to expel the first two diplomats?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman has failed to understand the position. We made it plain to the Soviet ambassador that we were requiring the withdrawal of five Soviet officials from this country. We intended to publicise the fact that two of them were required to withdraw within seven days, and we said that if the Soviet Union expelled any member of the British community in Moscow we would give publicity to the other three Soviet officials who were also required to withdraw.

It was handled in that way to give the Soviet Union the opportunity to avoid doing damage to the British community in Moscow and to give it the opportunity to withdraw five people, as we required, without publicity. It is because of the Soviet response that it has become undoubtedly necessary and right to give publicity, as we promised, to the three other people involved. The matter was handled throughout in a fashion entirely calculated to do the least damage to Anglo-Soviet relationships. The responsibility for what has happened rests upon the shoulders of those who have committed unacceptable activities in this country.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the years of creeping and crawling by the right hon. Member for Leeds, South-East (Mr. Healey), to the Soviets — when the right hon. Gentleman had influence—were as barren as they were humiliating to this country? Is it not the position that Russia knew the rules, it broke them, it was caught, and it should now stop whining?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend puts the matter very clearly. It is because of the activities of Soviet citizens that these actions have been necessary. They have been carefully judged to make them as consistent as possible with our long-term desire to see a continued improvement in our relations with the Soviet Union.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): If the Foreign Secretary's intention was to safeguard the security of the country, to minimise damage to our relations with the Soviet Union and to protect the British community in Moscow, why did he give any publicity at all to the incident?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Because if one is securing withdrawals in that way, accompanied by a reduction in ceilings, that inevitably leads to speculation about why that has happened. In addition, and in a wider sense, it is necessary in the case of conduct that threatens national security to demonstrate to all concerned, and not only the Soviet Union, that such activities cannot be tolerated.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his action. Is there any truth in the report that at least one of those expelled was trying to obtain information about British laser technology? Are any proceedings likely against a United Kingdom citizen as a result of investigations by the security services?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Action is taken in cases of this kind on the basis of irrefutable evidence, but the House would not expect me to give details about the background of this operation.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Is there any reason why the Secretary of State should not at least give us some idea what these diplomats were doing, which might help the House?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman ignores the necessary, regular and prudent practice. It is not appropriate in places such as this to give any further details than I have given. I can assure him that the actions were based on irrefutable evidence.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that it would be disastrous if these expulsions prevented the continuing improvement in Anglo-Soviet relations? While I recognise the need at all times to protect our national security against any country, would it not be right for the Foreign Secretary to make it clear to the Soviet authorities at the highest level that it is the wish of Her Majesty's Government to see a continued improvement in Anglo-Soviet relations? Should that not be made clear at the first opportunity?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The position is entirely clear. We have to remain serious and vigilant in our protection of national security. We have to remain serious and realistic in our search for improved relations with the Soviet Union, and both those matters have to be considered alongside each other. I have made it plain, through the Soviet ambassador on Thursday, through the Soviet chargé d'affaires last night and through our ambassador to Moscow, that we intend to sustain our policy of searching for improvement in East-West relations, and with the Soviet Union. I shall take an early opportunity, I expect when I meet Mr. Gromyko in Vienna early next month, to make the same point to him.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his handling of the affair. Does he agree that what is required in the handling of East-West relations is consistency? By undertaking this act, he has shown the Soviet Union that, unless it obeys the rules and behaves according to diplomatic circumstances, we shall not be prepared to forward our friendship with it, except on a proper basis?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree. We have always made it clear to the Soviet Union that our search for improved relations would have to be conducted on the basis of realism and proper reconciliation of the interests of both sides, and that includes continuing to take proper account of national security.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Presumably, the alleged offences of the three officials were less serious than those of the first two officials about whom we heard. Why did the Foreign Secretary think that restricting publicity to the first two would influence the Soviet response?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is customary in these cases to make a judgment of how far one publicises the action that one has taken, as has been pointed out. In this case, we judged that it was right to require the withdrawal of two Russians with publicity at the outset, to make it plain that such conduct would not be tolerated, while the withdrawal of the other three would not be accompanied by such publicity. We did so to try to limit the damage to the British community in Moscow. That was the intention and it is a matter of great regret that the Soviet Union chose not to respond to our suggestion in the way that we hoped.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Has my right hon. and learned Friend noticed the interesting contrast between the noisy if unconvincing protest of the Soviet embassy spokesmen in London on this issue on the one hand, and on the other the uncharacteristic silence of the state-controlled media in Moscow on the subject? Does my right hon. and learned Friend conclude from this, as I do, that this may be a case of the Soviet authorities knowing that they are in the wrong and hoping that this incident will not damage our long-term relations?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I certainly hope that the Soviet Union will draw that conclusion, and will recognise that such activities are bound to impair the process of improving relations. I hope that the Soviet Union recognises that we are serious in our intention to secure such an improvement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have to protect the remainder of the day's business. I intend to take only two more questions from each side of the House.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the great majority of hon. Members and of the people of this country appreciate his realistic and determined approach to improved relations with the Soviet Union and the eastern bloc countries, and thank him for it? They also appreciate his determined, even gentle, approach to matters concerning our security, which are of equal importance, and thank him for that, too.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Does this case have further ramifications? Will any British citizens be arrested under the Official Secrets Act? Is it true that, as has been rumoured, a spy network has been uncovered?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am not in a position to add to what I have said about the background to the case. In this as in every other case, the prosecuting authority will investigate the matter fully.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that Soviet diplomats in the United Kingdom are given freedoms that British diplomats in the Soviet Union do not enjoy? If so, are there any plans to advise the Soviet Union that we shall restrict the movement of Soviet diplomats to the level of that of our diplomats in the Soviet Union?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not propose, at this time, in this case, to outline any of the steps that I may have in mind.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has not the Foreign Secretary bungled it? Could not all five Soviet diplomats have been expelled without publicity, in private, as was done in previous cases by Labour Governments? Were not the first two expulsions publicised simply because the Government wanted to do some Commie-bashing?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman's question could not more clearly illustrate how completely he fails to understand the policy of Her Majesty's Government. We are not interested in Commie-bashing, as the hon. Gentleman so crudely puts it. We are interested, and have been engaged on a sustained basis, in improving relations between East and West and between this country and the Soviet Union.

However, we must make it clear that that pursuit cannot be conducted at the expense of national security. In this case, it was necessary to give publicity to the initial expulsions to make it clear to all those who might be concerned in such activities that they will not be tolerated.

Mr. Healey: May I assure the Foreign Secretary that we share his suffering at the pompous congratulations that he has received from Conservative Members whose aim is to make relations between Britain and the Soviet Union more difficult, rather than less?

May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to bear in mind the damage that he has done to his major objective through his mishandling of this issue?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the greater cause for dismay—not suffering—is the patronising inaccuracy of his own question.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By leave of the House, I will put together the motions relating to draft Statutory Instruments.

Ordered,

That the Building (Fourth Amendment) Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 488) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Housing (Limits of Rateable Value for Improvement Grants and Repairs Grants) (Scotland) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 297) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Protected Tenancies and Part VII Contracts (Rateable Value Limits) (Scotland) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 314) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Lancashire

3.48 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision regarding local government services in Lancashire.

In the 1930s, the urban areas of Lancashire were deeply scarred. More than 50 per cent. of the insured population of many towns, including Blackburn, Preston and Burnley were without work. That devastation was wanton and unnecessary. It was caused by blind and doctrinaire policies. The people of Lancashire resolved that it should never happen again. They fought for policies of full employment, they voted for policies of full employment and, for 35 years, they got full employment. [Interruption.] From the end of the second world war until 1980, Lancashire had virtually full employment. Unemployment rarely went above 6 per cent. People could find work—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman, but I am finding it extremely difficult to follow what he is saying because of all the background conversations. I hope that the House will give the hon. Gentleman the courtesy and attention that he deserves.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As I was saying, unemployment rarely went above 6 per cent. and people were able to find work. New towns were created and prosperity was established, not least as a result of the successful policies of regional aid and assistance pioneered by a Labour Government, but broadly maintained by previous Conservative Administrations.

Since 1980, disaster has struck our county. Since then, 60,000 jobs have been lost across the county and one in four young people are without work. Many of them have never had a proper job in their lives. One half of the men in many Asian areas are without jobs, and hundreds of men and women over 50 might never work again.

The despair spreads across the county. From Morecambe and Lancaster in the north, to Blackpool and Fylde in the west, to Skelmersdale and Ormskirk in the south, to Preston, Leyland and Chorley in the centre, to Blackburn, Hyndburn, Darwen, Burnley, Nelson, Colne and the Rossendale valley to the east, the story has been the same—closure and cuts.

Many people remain in work, but there is not one family in the county of Lancashire which is not now affected by the scourge of unemployment. There is not a family which does not have a member without work or in which the parents, even in prosperous areas, are not worried sick about their children's future.

The Government have washed their hands of responsibility for all this and deliberately made a bad situation worse. Regional assistance for the county was all but abolished between 1975 and 1982. Housing investment has been halved during the past six years. It was £95 million in 1979 at today's prices and is now £39 million. Grants to Lancashire county council and district councils have been slashed. Lancashire county council estimates that, since 1980-81, £180 million has been cut from Government assistance to the county—equivalent to £130 per head of population.

In those circumstances, the work of the Labour-controlled Lancashire county council and Labour-controlled district councils has shone like a beacon. They have stepped in to create jobs—1,200 new jobs have been created directly by the county council in the front line, not in bureaucracy. Lancashire Enterprises Limited has been established. It has protected and promoted 2,200 jobs, created 800 training opportunities and made a £300,000 profit for the ratepayers. Its cost per job created, at £4,000, is less than the Government pay to keep people on the dole.

The county has pioneered cheap travel for the elderly, improved rail and bus services, and opened 17 nursery schools and classes—and there are another 12 on the way. It has expanded the number of home helps and services to the elderly, especially in Blackpool, the Fylde and Morecambe—areas to which many people retire. It has done all that with one of the best financial records in the country.

In national terms, ratepayers in Labour shire counties pay 50p a week less than ratepayers in Conservative shires—£5·31 is paid each in week in Conservative shires and £4·83 is paid in Labour shires. In Lancashire, the record is even better. Average rate bills are £3·99 a week. No fewer than 33 counties have higher rate bills than Lancashire.

Despite Lancashire's excellent record, we are still spending £16·6 million less than the Government's assessment of the needs of the area, thanks to the target system. Because of that record, Labour's majority in Lancashire will increase on 2 May. But to meet the massive needs of the area, created by the reckless economic policies of the Conservatives, Lancashire needs assistance from central Government, not the hindrance that we have had from them in the last six years.

The Bill sets out a new framework for a real partnership between Whitehall, Westminster and the county to provide positive assistance to restore prosperity, jobs and services to the county. Clause 1 provides that within three months the Secretary of State for the Environment shall present a report to Parliament estimating the loss of rate support grant that has been suffered by the county in the last six years and the effect that that has had on business and domestic ratepayers. Most rate increases have occurred as a direct result of cuts in rate support grant.

Clause 2 provides for the Secretary of State to make a report to Parliament on the social and economic needs of the county of Lancashire and on plans, drawn up in consultation with the county, as to what the Government propose to meet those social and economic needs.

Clause 3 provides that the Secretary of State shall present proposals to Parliament to meet the pressing housing needs of Lancashire, which have got so much worse in the last six years. Clause 4 provides for extensive consultation with the districts and the county so that plans and proposals are not imposed on the county but are presented in collaboration with the districts.

Because private Members cannot move money Bills, the measure proposes no plans for increases in public expenditure. However, it is the first stage in a new partnership with the county. I hope that it will enjoy support from Conservative as well as Labour Members in the House.

Tory Members know that unemployment in the county of Lancashire would be even higher without the fine work of the county council. They know that many Conservative business men have been knocking on the doors of Lancashire Enterprises Limited seeking help for their firms, which have been ravaged by the present Government. They know of the hundreds of jobs that have been created and of the damage that has been done to the county by the Government. I hope that they also know that if they fail to support the Bill, bearing in mind the hope for the county that it holds out, the people of Lancashire will never forgive them.

3.57 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman seek to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Hind: I do, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I rise to comment on what must be considered one of the most cynical abuses of the House that we have witnessed for a long time. The county council is facing elections on 2 May and it is not without significance—[Interruption.]—that, although this Bill could have been introduced on any day this Session, it has been introduced today, nine days before those elections.

As the only hon. Member whose constituency includes the name "Lancashire", I feel qualified to draw the attention of the House to some of the flaws in the Bill. All hon. Members who represent Lancashire constituencies — there are some on these Benches — want more resources spent on Lancashire as a whole — [Interruption.]—but we must see the whole of the national purse in the context of what the country can afford. We cannot ignore the interests of every other county.

I have no doubt that this measure will be followed by other cynical attempts at campaigning for the county council elections in the days to come, with similar Bills being brought, for example, on behalf of the counties of Avon, Kent and Northumberland. Such Bills will probably be brought only on behalf of counties where Opposition Members feel that they might have a chance of winning on 2 May. We shall not hear from Conservative-held shire counties where they do not stand a chance.

When we consider increasing the resources of local authorities, we must examine the way in which they spend their money. Have the authorities given good value for money? The record of Lancashire, to quote the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), stands out like a beacon; it has an appalling record in abuse and waste of public money. Lancashire Enterprises Limited has been referred to. It was set up by the Labour group on a supplementary rate of 18p about six weeks after Labour got into power, simply as a campaigning tool for the benefit of the Labour party.

Attached to that was Enterprise Associates Limited, a public relations consultancy. I am told that newspaper reporters were paid £15,000 a year and provided with a car to spread the message about what the Labour party was doing in Lancashire. This was nothing more than a publicity campaign for the Labour party in Lancashire at the ratepayers' expense. It is cynical and an abuse, but presumably the Labour party hopes that it will produce results. I am sure the ratepayers of Lancashire will not be convinced.

The rates in Lancashire have been increased because of Lancashire Enterprises Limited. In this electoral year they may not have been increased as much as previously, because the Labour party knew that it was going to the polls. Those high rates since 1981 have done more damage to investment prospects in Lancashire than anything other than the recession itself.

The hon. Member for Blackburn talked about 1,200 jobs that were created. If the money taken by the Labour-controlled Lancashire county council for high rates had been left in the hands of ordinary manufacturers and industrialists, not only would 1,200 jobs have been preserved but more jobs would have been created through the investment of that money. May I say on behalf of my constituents in Lancashire, West that, although in parts of Skelmersdale there is 30 per cent. unemployment, we are still waiting for Lancashire Enterprises Limited to create one job in my constituency?

Another abuse is that £15,000 was given by Lancashire to the miners' welfare fund. The council has just spent £150,000 on attacking the Government's Transport Bill. I have a letter here from the chief executive of Lancashire county council who says, in a nutshell, that the council totally opposes the Bill and is not taking any part in providing advice for Conservative Members of Parliament who are sitting on the Transport Bill Committee. Rather than spend a train fare to come to the Committee, the council has spent £150,000 of ratepayers' money cynically to campaign in Lancashire against the Conservative Government.

We have received through our letter boxes the Lancashire Clarion, produced by Enterprise Associates Limited, it is supposed to be a news sheet for Lancashire county council. I challenge anyone reading that news sheet to hunt the Conservative, or find any mention of Conservatives. It is nothing more than a publicity sheet for the Labour campaign in Lancashire.

I am sure my hon. Friends will join me in supporting the provision of more money for the counties at a favourable opportunity, but it has to be seen within the context of total public expenditure and what the country can afford. Hon. Members should bear in mind the cynical abuse by Lancashire county council when they decide what they will do at the end of the debate. I am sure that they will vote against the Bill for one reason only: that it is a cynical abuse of the House, electioneering and nothing more. I therefore beg the House to reject the motion.

Opposition Day

[SECOND PART]

Trade Unions (Ballots)

4.17 pm

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is clear that there is going to be trouble in the House in that certain Opposition Members are trying to deny the leader of the Social Democratic party, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), his customary seat. In view of that, and in an attempt to be helpful and constructive, would it not be a good idea if the leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) vacated his seat and his expensive microphone so that the leader of the Social Democratic party could speak there? That would avoid the occurrence of any unseemly scenes in the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): There is no point of order.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There seems to be no point of order. What we have heard seems to have caused more trouble than it was suggested we might cure.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will recall that the only provision for securing a seat in the House is if hon. Members come in for prayers, having put in their prayer cards. That is what some of my hon. Friends have done in this case—as they always do. In view of the fact that this matter is about trade unions and ballots, we thought that the leader of the Social Democratic party should sit on the Tory Benches to deliver his speech.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can see plenty of empty seats. I do not see any reason for any hon. Member to be unduly cramped. [Interruption.] Order. Perhaps the leader of the Social Democratic party will take one of the empty seats rather than occupy the Gangway.

Mr. Canavan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an ex-heavyweight politician like the leader of the SDP to be sitting on the floor on my right-hand side and for the Whip of the SDP to be sitting down on my left-hand side? I have noticed that both of them have been throwing threatening glances at my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) because he is occupying the seat that they have their eye on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It might be sensible if hon. Gentlemen made best use of the seating that is available.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Would it be helpful to suggest that, as the leader of the SDP is trying to outflank the Conservative party from the right, he should be offered a seat in the far right-hand corner which is empty?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All the so-called helpful suggestions do not seem to be very helpful at all.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I suggest in a purely neutral sense that the leader of the SDP, in view of his opinions on the political parties on both sides of the House, might take his seat up above the clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to tell the House that I have selected the amendment that stands in the name of the Prime Minister and her right hon. Friends. Dr. Owen.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport) rose——

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East) rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When I am on my feet, hon. Members must sit down.

Mr. Prescott: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It would appear that the Leader of the SDP has decided to speak from this Dispatch Box in order to move the Motion. Such a proposal is not normally dealt with in this way in the House. I wonder whether you would rule that the official Opposition spokesman speaking in the debate has the right to present the Opposition's case from this Dispatch Box.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I refer you to a number of cases in which hon. Members have spoken from the Opposition Dispatch Box when they were not speaking on behalf of the official Opposition? I refer, for example, to an occasion on 4 August 1980 when my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) spoke from the Opposition Front Bench and referred in his speech to the fact that he was speaking from the Opposition Front Bench. He said:

"In speaking from the Opposition Dispatch Box, I am sticking to the long-standing tradition of the House under which any Privy Councillor may speak from the Dispatch Box." — [Official Report, 4 August 1980; Vol. 990, c. 352.]

I refer also the occasion on 22 May 1984——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. At this stage, I do not think that it is necessary for the hon. Gentleman to go through that, because the question to which he is addressing himself has not been raised. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) asked me whether it was in order that the official Opposition spokesman address the House from the Dispatch Box. Of course that is the case. But I do not know—and he has not yet raised with me the question — whether that excludes the right of any other right hon. or hon. Member to address the House from the Dispatch Box — [Interruption.] I know of no responsibility or authority that I have to prevent any hon. Member from so doing.

Dr. Owen rose——

Mr. Canavan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for any hon. Member to be called to speak who is not sitting in his or her place?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to suggest that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) is sitting in his place—it is not a matter for me.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) will be patient a little longer, until we clear these points of order, we might have a more orderly start to the debate.

Mr. Sedgemore: May I draw your attention, Sir, to the provisions of the Mental Health Act 1959, under which you have a reserve power to call a psychiatrist to examine——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman has the wrong day. Dr. Owen.

Mr. Sedgemore: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Leader of the SDP clearly thinks that he is the Leader of the Opposition. In my respectful submission, he should be submitted to the psychiatrist's couch because, if he is mad, he is not allowed to sit in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. We have an important debate before us. All this is taking time out of that debate.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In ruling on the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), you seemed to imply that hon. Members can speak from wherever they like in the House, including from the Dispatch Box. Are you then saying, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that all hon. Members can deliver their speeches from the Prime Minister's Dispatch Box if they so wish? If that is the case and all hon. Members proceeded to do so, I submit that there would be chaos in the House. Therefore, there is a long-established convention that hon. Members of the House do not speak from the Dispatch Box except those who by convention are allowed to do so—those on the Front Benches. As that is the convention of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I think that it is your duty to uphold that convention.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I said earlier that I knew of no authority that I had to prevent any right hon. or hon. Member addressing the House from the Dispatch Boxes, but of course the hon. Gentleman is right to remind us of the long-standing conventions of the House. It is a universally recognised and observed convention that the Dispatch Boxes are used on the one hand for Ministers to address the House and on the other for the leaders and spokesmen of the official Opposition party to address the House. I can only ask the House to observe and sustain the convention, but I have no authority to prevent any hon. Member who decides that he will breach the convention.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South) rose——

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I see the point of order, but can I put it to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that it will be impossible for the Leader of the Social Democratic party to speak from behind the line if he speaks from the Dispatch Box without thrusting the Members who were already sitting on the Front Bench from their places. If right hon. and hon. Members are already occupying their places in front of the Dispatch Box and a right hon. Member comes to try to force them out of the way or speaks from beyond the red line, how can he be in order? It can hardly be in order for a right hon. Gentleman to push other right hon. and hon. Gentlemen out of their seats. It can hardly be in order to speak from beyond the red line.

Mr. Wrigglesworth rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order; it is a purely hypothetical matter.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not also the convention that right hon. and hon. Members should be allowed to speak in the Chamber from the Bench upon which they normally sit — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] — and that there is a deliberate attempt by the bully boys and thugs of the Labour party, as we saw in the miners' dispute, to stop free speech in the House—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When I am on my feet, hon. Members must resume their seats. We have debated the miners' dispute many times, but we are not going to have it re-run this afternoon.

The hon. Member has raised a useful and constructive point of order. If it is suggested that all will be well and tranquillity restored if the leader of the Social Democratic party was allowed to resume his usual seat below the Gangway, then I would address an appeal to the hon. Gentlemen who are occupying that Bench to allow him to do so. [Interruption.] It is only an appeal.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am temporarily occupying the seat of the leader of the Ulster Unionist party, which is, incidentally, in the view of some people just another facet of the Conservative party. I am prepared to move out of this seat in order to allow the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) to address the House from here. I think that that is a very fair proposal.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A joke is a joke, but is there anything in the rule book that says that this loutish and vulgar display by the Labour party should be permitted to prevent free speech in this House?

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like you to advise me. When I came into the House at 2.30 pm to take prayers, there was a card on the Bench where my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) is sitting containing the name of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). Obviously, he managed to come in earlier and put down the card but could not get to the Chamber for 2.30 pm for prayers. Perhaps this incident has been sparked off by the right hon. Gentleman's inability to attend the House regularly. It is now 4.30 pm on a Tuesday afternoon, and all hon. Members know that the right hon. Gentleman attends the House for about half an hour on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons and that normally he would have left by now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The motion that we are supposed to be discussing was, according to the Order Paper, tabled by the Liberal party and the SDP. We were recently told that another microphone had been introduced in the Chamber in order to facilitate the leader of the Liberal party who normally sits in the seat beneath it. As the leader of the SDP is now occupying a seat under the microphone which was provided recently at considerable expense for the Liberal and Social Democratic parties, most reasonable people would see no reason why he should not speak from where he is sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter upon which I can rule. The House is doing itself no credit whatever by proceeding in this way. Hon. Members should realise that there is a very serious debate before us and that the time for it is being spent on largely bogus points of order. Hon. Members should try to get on with the debate.

Mr. Ron Lewis (Carlisle): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have sat in this House for many years and I believe that the attack made by the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) was unwarranted——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is helping neither the House nor himself.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not true that the Social Democratic and Liberal parties drew a place in the ballot, and that we are now seeing a lamentable attempt to destroy their right to free speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no question of ballots. The dispute revolves around the question whether a right hon. or hon. Member should have a particular place from which to speak. I can see many empty places in the House. If there is space, right hon. and hon. Members should try to get on with the debate.

Mr. Leighton: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As the leader of the SDP is sitting, singularly appropriately, on top of the leader of the Liberal party, would it not be fitting to allow him to speak from the seat in which he has been quite comfortable for the past 10 minutes?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that that is neither a point of order for me nor a serious approach to what is becoming a serious matter. The right hon. Member for Devonport should be allowed to——

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I just want to know what your ruling is. Does it mean that any right hon. or hon. Member can speak from the Dispatch Boxes? If so, given the arrogance and political views of the leader of the SDP, would he not be far happier speaking from the Government's Dispatch Box?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My ruling was that I knew of no power that I had to prevent any right hon. or hon. Member from addressing the House from the Dispatch Box. I have reminded hon. Members of the long-standing and deeply held conventions of the House and appealed to the House to uphold them. I have no power to impose them, as is being suggested.

Mr. Prescott: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you will recognise that a serious point is involved concerning the conventions surrounding where right hon. and hon. Members speak from—[Interruption.] The issue involves not freedom of speech but the place from which a right hon. or hon. Member speaks. That is the only point at issue. Questions have been raised about prayer cards on seats as well as about the conventions. Am I to understand from your ruling that it would be entirely proper for any right hon. or hon. Member to speak from either Dispatch Box at any stage during a debate? I understand that you are saying that this convention of the House does not have to be recognised, that it may be taken into account but that right hon. and hon. Members can speak at any time from any part of the House. Is that the point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have said that I have no power to impose that convention. Questions of propriety are a different matter, and I have not said that it would be proper to act in that way. The question is whether I have any authority to prevent any right hon. or hon. Member from addressing the House from the Dispatch Box. I remind hon. Members again of the conventions, and hope that they will be observed.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It should not be allowed to pass into the record that there has been a sudden outbreak of religious fervour on the Benches in front of me. The truth has nothing to do with prayer cards. It is well known to hon. Members that, ever since my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) became leader of the SDP, he has occupied a place on this Front Bench and has always spoken from there. You may not have noticed, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but we noticed that throughout the Division that Bench was deliberately occupied by a movable group of hon. Members to prevent him from taking his seat. What we are seeing is not the Militant Tendency but the yobbish tendency in this House. I believe that there are procedures and conventions in this House, and that one of them is that my right hon. Friend should be able to address the House from the Front Bench without there being a conspiracy to prevent him from doing so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a matter for me and that no right hon. or hon. Member has a seat in the Chamber as of right, other than is provided for in our Standing Orders by the prayer card procedure.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The House is clearly in a difficult position, partly because you cannot rule upon the matter as it is one that involves convention. I wonder whether you would be prepared to accept a motion on this matter from me as to where the right hon. Member for Devonport should speak from.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that the difficulty arises because of the determination of the leader of the SDP to disregard the long-standing convention. I have no power to prevent him from doing that. We should get on with the debate. Dr. Owen.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not a fact that it is the duty of any hon. Member who wants a particular seat in this House to make sure——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has heard me already deal with that point. I do not think that there is any need to go over it again. All these points of order, many of which are bogus, are only detracting from the fulfilment of our serious responsibilities and from the debate that we ought to have embarked upon quite some time ago.

4.41 pm

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): I beg to move, That this House calls upon the Government——

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington) rose——

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central) rose——

Mr. Boyes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must address me from where he is standing. He must not move around the Chamber.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have this kind of nonsense. Hon. Members must address the House and the Chair from the place where they rise.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members must resume their seats when I am on my feet. It seems to me that a very large number of hon. Members are seeking to disregard conventions this afternoon. Will the hon. Gentleman who now wishes to raise a point of order please address it to me from the place which he is now occupying?

Mr. Boyes: In view of the fact that we have been continuously harassed by Social Democratic Party members, did you notice that in order to get from the Front Bench and to speak from that Dispatch Box it was necessary for the leader of the Social Democrats physically to assault members of the Labour party? Did you further notice that the leader of the Social Democrats already had an established place?

You have just insisted, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that when I raised a point of order I had to speak from the place in which I was standing and that I had no right to go to the Dispatch Box. Why is it all right for the leader of the Social Democratic party to leave the place where he was sitting? He is only a Back Bencher, the same as I am, so why is it all right for him to move but not for me to move?

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South) rose——

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I had better deal with one point of order at a time. The difference is that the hon. Gentleman started to address me and raised his point of order from the position which he at present occupies. The leader of the Social Democratic party started to address the House from the Dispatch Box and, to the best of my recollection, had not spoken earlier.

Mr. Williams: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If I understood correctly, you gave a ruling a few moments ago that a Member must address the House from the place at which he is called. Will you confirm that when you called the leader of the Social Democratic party he was sitting in the second row below the Gangway, as we all saw? Should he not, therefore, in keeping with your ruling a moment ago, have to make his statement from that position?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have given my ruling and it seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman is now challenging it. That he must not do. I will read to the House the relevant passage from "Erskine May", which we take as our guide on these matters. We find on page 418, running over to page 419, the following:

> "Upon a Member inquiring whether a private Member was acting within the conventions of the House in speaking from the ministerial despatch box, the Chair declined to intervene and the Member concerned continued his speech from that place."

It then goes on to say:

> "A Member should not move his place while speaking."

To the best of my recollection, the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the Social Democratic party did not commence his speech until he put his notes on the Dispatch Box. The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), having raised a point of order, proceeded to move along the Gangway. It was on the basis of what is in "Erskine May" that I ruled as I did. I have ruled and I do not think that there is any need to go over that ground.

Viscount Cranborne: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If hon. Members care to go along the corridor to another place, they will see an important debate being carried on by non-elected people in this Parliament. Any hon. Member who then returns to this more important Chamber will see that a debate on an important subject upon which many of us on this side of the House feel extremely strongly is being deliberately resisted in an undemocratic manner by democratically elected Members. [Interruption.] May I finish?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman may not, because quite clearly he is delivering a speech which is expressing his opinion. I do not question the strength of feeling or the sincerity with which the hon. Gentleman holds his views, but the matters which he is raising are not matters for me.

Mr. Heffer: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is quite clear that the situation in the House at the moment is reaching an impasse, and it has to be resolved. It can be resolved on the basis of common sense if the right hon. Gentleman who speaks for the Social Democratic party is prepared to occupy another seat. Obviously he is not. Have you no powers at all, as a Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, to make a ruling? It seems to me to be very strange that if you were the chairman of the Labour or Conservative party you would have such powers and could make a ruling, but that the chairman of the House of Commons—that is what the Speaker is—has no power to make a ruling. Surely the time has come for you to make a ruling to resolve this impasse.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The task of Mr. Speaker and his Deputies is to interpret and apply the Standing Orders and to seek to ensure the observance of the courtesies and conventions of the House. It is not for me or any other occupant of the Chair to make the rules, except by way of decisions which create precedents. I think that it would be very unwise for me, in what is for me and for the House a somewhat unprecedented situation, to make an off-the-cuff ruling that might be binding on other occupants of the Chair and their successors and have far-reaching implications for the liberties of the House.

It might be sensible for us to have a cooling-off period and for the House to have an opportunity to reflect on the situation and the impasse into which it seems to have got itself.

Dr. Owen rose——

Mr. Canavan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall not take any further points of order.

Dr. Owen: I beg to move——

Mr. Canavan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) must resume his seat. We have had enough points of order for one afternoon. We ought to get on with the debate.

Dr. Owen: I beg to move——

Mr. Canavan: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Hon. Members: Name him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not prepared to take any further points of order. We have had a good run. I hope that the hon. Member for Falkirk, West will now allow the House to get on with its proper business, which is the motion set down for debate.

Dr. Owen: I beg to move,

That this House calls upon the Government immediately to amend the Trade Union Act 1984 to ensure that, unless absolutely impossible in a particular case, all strike ballots, political fund ballots and elections for trade union executive committees are held on the basis of full secret postal voting conducted by independent returning officers and scrutineers so as to minimise the risk of abuse.

This is an important issue, relating to the role of the trade union movement. First, it needs to be clearly established that in this country there are millions of trade unionists who belong not just to the Labour party, the Conservative party, the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party, but to the nationalist parties and to the Ecology party. It would be a great mistake for this House to debate trade union matters and think that any single party had a pre-emptive right to speak for all trade unionists. Furthermore, I believe that it is in the interests of the trade union movement, of trade unionists and of the prosperity of this country for the trade union movement not to feel itself to be politically bound or institutionally linked to any political party.

It is a reflection of the inadequate financial support for political parties that the political situation is so polarised, and that because of long-standing financial links politics have come very close to the vested interests which financially support particular political parties. That is just as much a problem for the Conservative party, because of its links with big business and its funding by large companies, as it is for the Labour party. I believe that all of us wish that a better system could be devised.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Owen: I should prefer not to do so but instead to develop my argument.

We need to reflect on the fact that at the last general election only 39 per cent. of trade unionists voted for the Labour party and that 61 per cent. voted for the other political parties. Therefore, the Labour party can no longer claim to speak for the majority of trade unionists. For that reason, I think that we would all agree with the views of the Secretary of State for Employment, who said during the Third Reading debate on the Trade Union Bill:

"We believe that the law should protect the whole community—employers, employees, union members and non-union members alike—from the abuse of industrial power."—[Official Report, 25 April 1984; Vol. 58, c. 832.]

I believe that the right hon. Gentleman spoke for everybody when he used those words, but I do not believe that the Trade Union Act 1984 is fulfilling those expectations.

We have before us the sad situation which is facing the Transport and General Workers Union. Most people are glad that there is to be an emergency meeting of the union on Thursday next. We must hope that, as press statements appear to indicate, the request of the general secretary elect, Mr. Ron Todd, for another ballot is agreed to, but I have serious misgivings about such a ballot taking place under the existing procedures. It is not my job to conduct a witch hunt into the procedures of the Transport and General Workers Union, and I do not intend to go into those matters. They have been fairly well discussed and other hon. Members will no doubt refer to them.

Ever since the scandal that affected the Electrical Trades Union, as it then was—it is now the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunication and Plumbing Union—the view held in this country is that trade union balloting arrangements leave a great deal to be desired. It is important to realise that before the Trade Union Act 1980 some of the major trade unions were prepared to make payments out of their own funds in order to establish democracy. They were prepared to pay for postal ballots.

The Secretary of State ought to make it clear that some of his statements in recent weeks about the way in which the old ETU scandal first broke are incorrect. As was stated by its general secretary:

"The postal element in this union's balloting system prior to 1961 was very limited."

It was based upon branch returns. Mr. Eric Hammond, the general secretary, said yesterday:

"We do not wish to intrude into the TGWU's difficulties but we cannot allow the present burst of distortion to go on unchallenged. We regard our system as fiddleproof and we urged the Secretary of State to adopt it if he was intent on legislating. He failed to do so, and it is reprehensible that he and others who have ignored our advice should now misrepresent our position."

The 1961 procedure was not a quasi-postal ballot. The Secretary of State knows that well, and I urge him now to listen, as he did not listen in Committee, on Report, on Third Reading or to the House of Lords, to the criticisms that have come from a substantial body of opinion—not, perhaps, within, the House but outside the House—from shop stewards in union after union who warned him that workplace ballots were open to great abuse.

What happens if on Thursday the TGWU decides to hold a re-ballot? The new Act will not stop what happened. Part 1 does not come into force until October. Even if the re-ballot were not held before then, the Act does not cover non-voting general secretaries. Most general secretaries, including that of the TGWU, are non-voting. We have all realised that that is a gap in the legisation.

Even if non-voting general secretaries were covered, the Act allows unions to have a workplace ballot. The system used for the 1984 TGWU general secretary ballot could be used again. The only changes would be that all ballot boxes, not just most, would have to be at the workplace. Some were at the branches. The boxes would have to be open for longer in some cases. The count would have to be more secure. No doubt arrangements will be made to change the cardboard boxes and a few other issues, but the substantive issue would not change.

Since the Act was passed we have seen how the National Union of Mineworkers has changed its rules. Mr. Arthur Scargill has arranged for his casting vote on the NUM executive to be taken away. [Interruption.] I agree that that has not happened yet.

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong again.

Dr. Owen: Mr. Scargill will not be covered by the Act, as I understand it. If I am incorrect, I withdraw that remark.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): The right hon. Gentleman will not want to mislead the House. He said that the president of the NUM has arranged for his vote to be given away. That is inaccurate. He never had a vote. The chairman of the executive had a vote. Whether the present chairman of the national executive or the president will have a vote will be decided at the national conference. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will correct what he said. A national conference will decide on the new rules.

Dr. Owen: The hon. Gentleman is a better man. I said a "casting vote". As I understand it, the present chairman is Mr. Arthur Scargill. He uses his casting vote. The recommendation may not be followed, but it shows how the Act does not cover all circumstances.

I should like to consider the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union's election for the successor to David Basnett. It will be by branch block vote. A vote, for example, of 10 to 6 in favour of one candidate could cast thousands of votes for that candidate. The Act does not stop that, as the general secretary does not have a vote. The new general secretary, Brenda Dean——

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. Gentleman has got it wrong again.

Dr. Owen: —has just been elected by workplace ballot.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): Wrong again.

Dr. Owen: The right hon. Gentleman will no doubt make it clear whether the GMBATU election is covered. I think he will find that it is not.

We then come to the role of the certification officer under part 1 of the Act, which covers union executive elections. It comes into force on 1 October 1985. Unions can choose workplace instead of postal ballots. The right hon. Gentleman had better realise that there is a good deal of anxiety on his back Benches about that issue. There is a general feeling that if he had listened a little more he would not find himself in the mess that he is in. The right hon. Gentleman did a fiddle. He knew that that point would cause a great deal of trouble and he made an arrangement with the trade unions, which he now regrets.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): The right hon. Gentleman is perhaps being premature when he refers to my right hon. Friend's Back Benches. The relevant part of the Act does not come into force until 1 October this year. Most of us wish to see how it will work.

Dr. Owen: That is a possibility, but it is also possible to anticipate some of the problems that will arise. The first thing that we have to face is that even if we argue about the role of the certification officer under part 1 of the Act we must remember that 47 unions, with 8·5 million members eligible to vote, will have to vote on political funds between April 1985 and March 1986. That will be the largest number of union ballots to take place in one year. They will take place not just under union rules but, nominally, under an arrangement made in the House to provide for true democratic procedures. The ballots must be held by 31 March 1986.

The unions have a choice between postal and workplace ballots on political funds. Three unions only at the moment —I hope that it will be more—are expected to use full postal ballots on the political fund. They are the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunication and Plumbing Union, the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers and the Furniture, Timber and Allied Trades Union.

Mr. Skinner: The National Union of Seamen.

Dr. Owen: I hope that that is the case. I had always understood that there was a strong case for workplace ballots for the NUS. It has often been quoted as a case for special arrangements. The NUS is a special union. Most people recognise that there must be some flexibility. I shall be delighted if it holds a postal ballot. There is likely to be a postal element in most of the other ballots, with 10 per cent. of the members in the categories of being on holiday, sick, retired or applying for a postal vote.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge) rose——

Dr. Owen: Some unions will operate a semi-postal ballot system with ballot papers sent to the workplace for distribution and then returned by post by each member to head office or independent scrutineers. What is wrong with workplace and semi-postal ballots? Why has there been disquiet about them for many years? The points at which workplace ballots can be open to abuse are in the number of ballot papers claimed for distribution at each location, in the unsupervised distribution of ballot papers, in the return of ballot papers, in the improper use of discarded papers, which, in many cases are over 50 per cent. of those issued, and in undue influence exerted on the voter. The variety of the form of pressure is legend. The abuse can be in the local count and in the national return.

Semi-postal ballots usually involve the distribution of ballot papers at the workplace and the posting back of the papers to union head office or the independent scrutineers. They are usually only a variant on the workplace ballot.

Why is there a resistance to postal ballots? The 1980 Act——

Mr. Canavan rose——

Dr. Owen: The hon. Gentleman can make his own speech. There has already been fairly substantial Labour party disruption during the debate.

The House must ask why there is such resistance. In the past one could understand that postal ballots were a costly procedure. For some unions it was not easy. I, like many other people, decided that some of those things had to change. We lived through some of the results of unrepresentative trade union decisions. The Government were right, under the 1980 Act, to make it possible to provide funding for democratic postal ballots, and I support that.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Dr. Owen: If the hon. Gentleman intends to make the obvious point that I did not vote for it, he is right. I voted against it, and I regret that. When we formed the SDP, we made it clear that we regretted it. We decided to back democracy in trade unions. We should like to have democracy in political parties and other organisations. Postal ballots, as the SDP knows, are expensive. We know that the Labour party will not trust its members to vote for its leader. We know that the Labour party will not trust the one-member, one-vote system,. We will not have lectures on democracy from the Labour party. [Interruption.] I have had those arguments. I went to the Labour party conference and urged it to adopt the one-member, one-vote system.

Mr. Canavan: If the right hon. Gentleman is so obsessed with the idea of secret ballots, why, when he set up the SDP, were he and all the other SDP MPs who defected from other political parties afraid to give their constituents the opportunity of an immediate secret ballot? The only one who did, Douglas-Mann, was thrown out on his neck.

Dr. Owen: It is clearly a constitutional issue. Once elected, a Member of Parliament is answerable to the House, not to the general management committee of the Labour party. He is elected to the House to speak for his constituents. When this issue was put the to constituents of Plymouth, Devonport, they well understood it, as did 7·75 million people who voted for the Liberal party/SDP, and of course the 3·5 million who voted for the SDP. It may stick in the gullet of Labour Members to realise that many of those people were trade unionists. Many of them want to see, as do the SDP and the Liberal party, a strong, democratic trade union movement in this country——

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): So does the Conservative party.

Dr. Owen: If the Conservative party really means that, it will carefully consider making amendments to the legislation—and the sooner the better.

The Secretary of State appears to be taking the matter personally, as though we should not make any criticism. The legislation contains substantial achievements and he should not be ashamed of them. He knows that the Government changed their mind during the passage of the Bill. After all, the Paymaster General and chairman of the Conservative party, the hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who was the Minister of State, Department of Employment, during the passage of the legislation, had the grace to say on Report:

"I admitted to him in Committee that I began by believing that postal ballots were the best, and perhaps the only, way of electing the executive committee of a union. I must explain why I moved from that position."—[Official Report, 26 March 1984; Vol. 57, c. 99.]

The hon. Gentleman must be regretting that he moved from that position. It was not until an amendment was carried in the House of Lords that we put back into the Bill any presumption of postal ballots, and that is still only in part 1.

The House must remember that that provision does not cover strike ballot procedures. Why is that important? It could be argued that in electing a general secretary there are many different views among the officials of the union. We know that this is true of the Transport and General Workers Union. A substantial body of people support Ron Todd, with an equally substantial body of officials and others supporting Mr. George Wright. There is a discipline within the union to ensure that there is no fiddling of the ballot—yet there have been serious allegations.

What about a strike ballot, when almost all the officials of a union want a strike? They will supervise the workplace ballot, and there is no provision for a postal ballot. They will have the temptation to take all the shortcuts involved in a workplace ballot.

More than 82 per cent. of the political fund goes effectively to support the Labour party.

Mr. Skinner: Members of Parliament are sponsored.

Dr. Owen: It is for individual Members of Parliament to decide whether they wish to be sponsored. I was never a sponsored Member of Parliament.

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. Gentleman had union money.

Dr. Owen: It is extremely difficult for members of the Labour party to examine the issues objectively, yet it would be in their interest to do so. Mr. Ron Todd appears to understand that if there is doubt about a ballot, there is doubt about the authority of the general secretary. Therefore, Ron Todd would not be in a position to carry credibility——

Mr. Skinner: The right hon. Gentleman had £10,000 over the years.

Dr. Owen: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will never make such an allegation. If he would like to say that standing up, I would be grateful. I was never sponsored, and no money was given to me—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The right hon. Gentleman is entitled to a hearing.

Dr. Owen: I beg the Secretary of State to look at this matter seriously. All the officials in the unions believe that the political fund should be involved, and they supervise the massive elections. Those elections will not simply be under union rules which we can all disown. If we hear reports of incidents, such as those affecting the TGWU, we will all be involved. This House will be involved. The workplace ballot on the political fund to support the Labour party is, in effect, a straight question of a political levy—it is Labour's levy. We are being asked to accept that the supervision of workplace ballots for the levy and for strikes should be undertaken by full-time officials of the union at their place of work.

Whatever the Secretary of State may say about the onus of proof in part 1—the reading of counsel is that the wording leaves it open to any union which so wishes to use a workplace ballot and not a postal ballot—the onus is not on the union to hold a postal ballot. The Government and the Prime Minister have misled their supporters. I do not believe that they did so deliberately, but the fact is that under part 1 any union which so wishes can hold a workplace ballot. If that is then challenged to the Certification Officer by an individual member of the union, it is possible under part 1 for the Certification Officer to reject the workplace procedures and to insist on a tougher procedure or a postal ballot.

The Secretary of State has been on radio and television and given the impression that under part 1 the onus of proof is on someone to show why he should not have a postal ballot. The reverse is the truth. The alliance wanted the onus of proof to be on those who wished not to have a postal ballot to show why that should be so. For those unions with special circumstances, we suggested that they went to the Certification Officer and asked for an exemption. That is the right way. Postal ballots should be the norm, and workplace ballots the exception.

It is not quite an accident that SOGAT '82 has been chosen to be the first trade union in relation to the political fund. It is not an accident that this union has been carrying out its procedures with hardly any examination in the press. If the SOGAT '82 ballot is to become the hallmark of ballots for the political fund over the next year, the stories that we have heard about the TGWU will run on throughout the year.

Mr. Golding: Where is the evidence?

Dr. Owen: We find the evidence if we examine SOGAT '82. Its official journal describes why its members should support the political fund. The Labour party is not mentioned on any page. It is well known that the only way that SOGAT '82 can get its members to support the political fund is to pretend that it has nothing to do with the Labour party; that the funds go nowhere near the Labour party.

Matters are even more serious than that. Members of SOGAT '82 are being asked to vote for a voice in Parliament. They are told that they will not be able effectively to carry out their union activities unless they have a political fund. It has been made clear time and time again that any normal trade union activity, including lobbying, can be provided for from normal funds. I hope that the Secretary of State will confirm that they do not need a political fund to campaign or to lobby.

Mr. Leighton: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that SOGAT '82 has a very good voice in Parliament? Is he further aware that our union wants the unfettered right to campaign on anything that the right hon. Gentleman might call politics? It does not want to be dictated to by him or by anybody else. No other country in western Europe dictates to a union how it will spend its money. When we want advice from renegades and turncoats, we will ask for it.

Dr. Owen: That is diametrically opposite to what the Act states. It states that the members should decide fully, openly and democratically whether they wish to make contributions to the Labour party. If they decide to do so, openly and democratically—[Interruption.] The Act is a bit like the SOGAT Journal. It does not mention the Labour party, but 82 per cent. of the political fund goes to the Labour party, and everybody knows that. It is not for normal, traditional lobbying.

In case anybody is in doubt about what the SOGAT Journal says, I shall read it out. It says:

"'We would like to say on behalf of our members . . .' If we lose our rule which allows unions to be active politically we could soon be banned from campaigning publicly on questions which affect our members. And it would be illegal to lobby Parliament!"

The journal is entitled "Say yes to a voice". That will not lead to a fairly conducted ballot and everybody knows it. The tragedy is that the Secretary of State for Employment will be seen to be putting the veneer of respectability over this process. It is vital that we say no. These political fund ballots must be conducted democratically. They should be contracted in. If a political fund ballot is to take place, it should be postal and the cost should be borne by the country as an investment in democracy.

Any of us who advocate fair elections in trade unions will be traduced up and down the country and will be told that we are anti-union. We are not. It is part of the assumption of a monopoly of conscience that the Labour party believes that only it can speak for trade unions. Many hon. Members of all parties believe in the need for collective action and for unions and members to organise. They believe that there should be some special safeguards in the law, as the present legislation rightly gives trade unionists.

However, these hon. Members desire from trade unionists that if they are given special privileges and protection in the law, they should have within their procedures a fully open and democratic mechanism so that the commonsense judgment of the members can be carried out. We would like to see that more widespread. I urge the Secretary of State and the Government to listen this time. They did not listen to the House of Commons or the House of Lords, and instead partially made an adjustment to the House of Lords amendment.

What has happened in the case of the Transport and General Workers Union is, I fear, the tip of a particularly ugly iceberg. It is giving too much temptation to any person with strong views in a trade union to ask him to supervise an election. We have not yet reached the stage where the Labour party, the Conservative party, or the alliance parties supervise the collection of the ballot boxes in a general election, or are involved in the counting of votes. The supervision of the ballot is completely separated from us as politicians, and rightly so. Supervision should be conducted independently, even if there is a workplace ballot, and even if we allow some unions to go ahead before the full operation of the 1984 Act. It is incumbent upon us to insist that there should be independent supervision at all stages of any workplace ballot. I urge the Secretary of State to think again.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the success of the Government's step-by-step approach to the reform of industrial relations law and to the strengthening of rights of individual trade union members; welcomes the new and stringent provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984 concerning secret ballots before strike action, for trade union elections and for the maintenance of political funds; notes the fundamental change in trade union attitudes and practices now taking place; welcomes in particular the increasing interest and involvement of trade union members in the conduct of their unions' affairs; and congratulates the Government on making the achievement of greater democracy in trade unions a central objective of its industrial relations policy."

I took no exception in any personal sense to what the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said, but on an issue as important as this, he could have done the House the courtesy of being more careful about his facts. He was wrong about the position of the president of the National Union of Mineworkers, about the position of the general secretary of the GMBATU and about the powers of the certification officer in the example that he used. He was also wrong in the letter that he wrote to me, and I sought to set out his inaccuracies. This is an important subject, and the right hon. Gentleman owes it to the House to come better prepared and equipped to deal with the argument.

I assume that the right hon. Gentleman was not wrong in referring, as he does in the motion—I had assumed that this was a mistake—to the need for postal ballots before all strikes and presumably before those to end strikes. If that is what he intended—he referred only briefly to it—this is the first time that it has been mentioned. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) sat through all the proceedings—Committee, Report, Third Reading and the debates on Lords amendments—and said nothing about it. Is this a new policy proposal or merely a mistake in the motion? If the right hon. Gentleman rehearsed his arguments on the merit of compulsory postal ballots before all disputes, he might find it difficult to rally the support for which he is looking.

We welcome this debate, not least because it is an opportunity to correct some of the gross inaccuracies that the right hon. Gentleman has perpetrated, not only in the House but outside. I and my right hon. and hon. Friends are not embarrassed to discuss the cause of trade union reform. I am glad to see my right hon. Friend the Member for Waverney (Mr. Prior) here. He initiated the step-by-step approach that has been such a significant success. I look across at some of the remainder of the participants in the battle on "In Place of Strife" and of the battles on the Industrial Relations Act 1971. Any honest observer will recognise the significant difference in the successes of our step-by-step approach. It is improving the climate of industrial relations, and its measures are here to stay.

The right hon. Member for Devonport was candid enough to admit that he voted against the first step of the step-by-step approach. He does not, however, rush forward to say that, while he supports the use of public funds for postal balloting, he voted against my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney when he introduced that proposal.

Mr. Cyril Smith (Rochdale): I did not vote against it.

Mr. King: It comes as no surprise to find that different Members of the two alliance parties voted in different ways. The real surprise would be if they voted in the same Lobby at the same time. There have been some thoroughly unwelcome scenes in the House, but it is welcome to see the new development of such a good turnout from the alliance parties.

The right hon. Member for Devonport has chosen to lecture the Conservative party on the system of balloting for elections, secret ballots for union elections, a system of ballot before strikes and secret and periodic ballots for trade union funds. However, he would not have had the opportunity to comment on any of those items if we, as the Government, had not carried them through on to the statute book. We see this as a further development in our programme. We have tackled the abuse of the closed shop, have introduced financial support for postal ballots and have outlawed secondary action. We have introduced secret ballots for the union elections to principal executive committees, for strike ballots and for political funds.

Many of our critics, some of them on the Opposition Benches, have said that these measures would never be used and that they would blow back in our face, but the record does not bear that out. The National Graphical Association may have second thoughts when it is £750,000 lighter because of its efforts towards intimidation and mayhem at the Stockport Messenger and have begun to realise that, in the end, the law will have to be observed.

The Transport and General Workers' Union learnt painfully and to its cost, at Austin Rover, that the car park meeting will no longer be tolerated and that the members must be consulted. The south Wales area of the NUM thought that it could black two hauliers with impunity. It found—it was another painful exercise—that unlawful actions will be punished and that the law must be observed. Most recently, in the Post Office at Mount Pleasant and even in the Civil Service, the requirement to consult the members, imposed through injunctions or through the serving of a writ, has ensured that disruption or strike action did not take place.

Our legislation seeks to give rights to union members, not to the Government. That has led to a major change of attitude. I cannot vouch for it, but according to a newspaper report, the TUC has referred to "the apparent wish of many members for ballots in any event, regardless of the provisions of the law".

That underlines the fact that we are right to give members rights, and easier access to remedies when those rights are obstructed.

Our determination has been to improve democracy in trade unions. Unions belong to their members. It is to the members that we must look and to whom the rights must be given. Many politicians jump up and down about ballot rigging and allegations of ballot rigging, but it is the members who are robbed and deprived of their rights by unfairness or injustice.

Mr. Cyril Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: Because of the exceptional circumstances, I owe it to the House to reply. I will give way in a moment.

The worst abuses in union practices took place either at branch meetings or in the car park voting procedures. I do not think that any hon. Member would dispute the fact that the Act will render both those forms of abuse illegal.

Mr. Smith: Is the Minister aware that I was the Liberal party's spokesman on employment while the legislation to which he has referred—apart from the Trade Union Act 1984 — was passing through the House? Both in Committee and on the Floor of the House, I and my Liberal colleagues consistently supported the Government in the passage of those Bills. The right hon. Gentleman's claim that the legislation is the achievement only of the Conservative Government is not based on fact. Furthermore, if the right hon. Gentleman is so concerned that the unions should belong to the members, why is he tonight denying those members the right to vote by post, so ensuring that the results would be unchallengeable?

Mr. King: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that, in order to carry through the legislation, we had to depend solely upon the support of the Liberal party, or that we should equate the Liberal contribution with the effort of the Conservative party? I cannot readily accept those propositions.

We have been at pains to tackle the problems. I note, for instance, the reference to the need to get away from branch voting. The right hon. Member for Devonport knows a great deal about such problems. I believe that he is a member of the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs. The branch voting procedures of ASTMS may be among the most inadequate. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has raised the matter with the president or the general secretary of the union. I understand that, at the last election for their president, some 400 branches of the union either failed to return a vote or returned a nil vote. Some 10,000 members voted in the election — about 2 per cent. of the membership. It is interesting to note for how long the right hon. Gentleman has belonged to that union.

I wish to deal with the innuendos that the right hon. Gentleman introduced into his speech. Immediately after talking about the failure of the operation of the 1984 Act, he referred to the situation in the TGWU. However, the right hon. Gentleman knows that the procedures for secret elections will not come into operation until 1 October. The right hon. Gentleman said that the TGWU situation will give the green light to many other people, showing them the opportunities for rigging. I have come to the opposite conclusion. To the union's credit, the complaints were raised under the existing procedures. A cook in a secondary school in my home city of Bristol found that someone had incorrectly stamped her membership card. She raised the matter, and further procedures led, I believe, to the dismissal of two trade union officials. The message is that we are giving the members rights that they are prepared to use.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North) rose——

Mr. King: I do not wish at the moment to labour the point, but there is another message for us in the situation of the TGWU. Any senior trade union official standing for election and seeing the problems and difficulties that the TGWU is facing in connection with allegations of ballot rigging will not consider that he has been given a green light. The TGWU's problems will reinforce the determination of responsible unions to see that their procedures are properly carried out.

Mr. McNamara: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: I must make progress, so that other hon. Members will have a chance to speak.

We outlawed branch voting and car park proceedings. Under the original provisions in the Bill, either workplace ballot or postal ballot requirements could meet the situation. Allegations have been made that I met Mr. Moss Evans and was completely persuaded by his arguments, and that as a consequence the Bill was weakened. In fact, the Bill, far from being weakened, was significantly strengthened.

There have been so many misleading allegations about the procedures in the Act—in some instances from ill-informed people—that I should like to make it clear what they involve. The Act lays down a whole series of new statutory requirements that will override existing union procedures entirely. For the first time ever, it lays down statutory requirements about the frequency of elections, balloting arrangements, who can vote and who can stand. It lays down that elections must be secret, free from interference or constraint, that votes must be fairly and accurately counted, and that all those entitled to vote must be given an equal chance to do so at no direct cost to themselves.

Those are powerful new safeguards, and they are statutory. They do not depend on which union a member belongs to or what the union rule book happens to say. Any election that meets those standards will be a free and fair election. From 1 October, anyone claiming that a union has failed to meet those standards will be able to apply to the independent certification officer for a declaration to that effect, or to the court, at no expense to himself.

That is one of the measures designed to help members with any problems connected with raising grievances. Conservative trade unionists attach great importance to the opportunity to be able to make representations.

We have added a new requirement that will pave the way for the opportunity for postal ballots on the widest possible basis. We have already imposed upon the unions a duty to compile and maintain a register of the names and proper addresses of their members. That duty was imposed upon the unions on Royal Assent. The registers must be completed by 1 October and kept up to date thereafter.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that such a register, like any other electoral register, will be open for inspection, so that all the members may be satisfied that it is in order?

Mr. King: It should be available to members of the union.

Any failure to comply with the requirements of the register will make the union open to the risk of being challenged by its members in the High Court or before the certification officer.

We have gone further than that, as we have given much greater emphasis to postal voting. Postal voting is the system most likely to be free from interference and intimidation. The motion refers to "full secret postal voting", and I should like to consider why others think that an exception is justified. I should also like to tell the right hon. Member for Devonport why I have said that sections 2 and 3 of the 1984 Act introduce the most powerful presumption in favour of postal ballots.

A union that is considering holding a workplace ballot must meet all the existing requirements for free and fair postal elections, meet additional ones concerning the supply of ballot papers and giving electors a convenient opportunity to vote, and satisfy itself in advance of the ballot that there are no reasonable grounds for believing that any of the Act's electoral safeguards will be breached. A union member can go to the certification officer in advance of the ballot and get his support with a view to getting the High Court to act. That was the error of the right hon. Member for Devonport, because the certification officer has no power in this regard. If there is malpractice or intimidation, the ballot is put at risk.

If a union is not challenged by its members before an election, but the conduct of that election is found to have fallen short of the legislation's requirements, the High Court has a duty to order a re-run of the election to be conducted by a full postal ballot unless that is plainly inappropriate. A few unions seem not to have taken those provisions fully on board as they are making fairly relaxed comments about them. It would be wise for union leaders to reflect on those provisions and the events of the past few months.

This is not an argument about mandatory full postal ballots. On 1 December 1983, the hon. Member for Stockton, South said:

"We strongly favour the principle of one member, one vote and believe that postal ballots should be the norm. That is as far as we go. We do not say that it should be laid down as the only way of organising ballots within unions."—[Official Report, Standing Commitee E, 1 December 1983; c. 135.]

On 25 April 1984, the hon. Member said:

"Postal ballots could not be adopted in every instance."—[Official Report, 25 April 1984; Vol. 58, c. 844.]

On 24 July 1984, the hon. Member said:

"There is a need also for some flexibility in the operation of postal ballots. We accept that it is wrong that postal ballots should be imposed on every union."—[Official Report, 24 July 1984; Vol. 64, c. 864.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) also accepts that there are cases when exceptions might have to be made. It is accepted that there is a case for postal ballots. The question is, therefore, under what terms and arrangements they are to be permitted. I am anxious to ensure the greatest possible democracy and to establish higher standards of democracy in trade unions where they have been lacking. I do not include all trade unions in that criticism. Two criteria must be met. We must ensure fair and secret elections, which are free from intimidation and malpractice, and we cannot walk away from the problem of encouraging every member to vote, because turnout matters in a democracy.

If properly organised, workplace ballots tend to attract a much higher percentage ballot. The classic illustration of that is the National Union of Mineworkers. There was an 11 per cent. turnout in a fully postal ballot in the furniture trade union. For those who believe that workplace ballots can always be rigged by a union leadership, we should remember that Mr. Scargill was defeated twice in such ballots. He had polls of 87 and 93 per cent. and lost both ballots. Most recently he tried to persuade his members to vote for the 50p levy, which proposal was also defeated by a workplace ballot.

I have already said that the postal ballot can be the best solution if the avoidance of intimidation and malpractice is the overriding consideration. I accept that there must be postal ballots in some circumstances, because of the activities of the union leaders. There has been some interesting research on the problems of organising a postal ballot and getting the electoral roll in order. Right hon. and hon. Members know about the problems associated with parliamentary elections. I understand from the research that, in a fully postal ballot conducted by the AUEW, which has confirmed these findings, 200,000 members never received a vote and 20,000 received a vote to which they were not entitled. The Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunication and Plumbing Union has tried hard to establish the best possible postal ballot system, but there are still problems. Right hon. and hon. Members know that people who come to our constituencies after October are not able to vote for us for 15 months — [HON. MEMBERS: "After March."] I am grateful. I hope that I am better on union law than perhaps I am on electoral law. Democracy must be about giving the maximum number of people the maximum opportunity to vote. However, they must be able to vote free from intimidation and malpractice in a secret ballot. Our legislation ensures that they have the best possible chance to do that.

The argument between us is whether it is better to give the power of determination of when there should be workplace ballots to a public officer—the certification officer—or to members, who should be given access to the courts. I have chosen the latter course. Our approach will succeed because it works with the grain of all union members. We are giving them rights, not imposing obligations on them. The defence of freedom and the avoidance of malpractice and intimidation, which all responsible right hon. and hon. Members deplore, will lie with the vigilance of union members. But it is our duty to see that they have proper rights and proper access to remedy. Because, in that spirit, our legislation embarks most effectively on that course, I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): I had better get to the Dispatch Box quickly, while I have the opportunity to do so.

The amendment reflects the Government's anti-trade union attitude, and their legislation applying to unions must be seen in the light of their overall policy.

SDP opportunism is reflected in the motion, which was not particularly ably moved by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)—[Interruption.] On the facts, the right hon. Gentleman did not make a good case. As he was motivated to initiate this subject at the first opportunity he had from the alliance point of view, he should have mugged up on the facts, particularly in relation to the unions to which he referred.

From the comments made in the debate, it would appear that neither side believes that the universality of the ballot is in issue. There are clearly problems in the trade union movement about how ballots should be applied. That is why flexibility and choice are allowed. Flexibility is necessary. It appears in the legislation and it even appears in the alliance motion.

We can assume, therefore, that the universality of the ballot is not in issue and that we are essentially concerned with proper practices in the development of ballots. We are also concerned with the democratic participation of union members and the importance of achieving the maximum participation in ballots.

I wish to make it clear from the outset that no hon. Member on the Labour Opposition Benches would have any truck with the interference of, or irregularities in, ballots, and the same goes for the proper democratic expression by trade union members on whatever issue may be in question. There need be no doubt or division on that aspect of the matter.

I speak as having been a seaman with 10 years' experience in the shipping industry. I recall taking part in debates in 1972 with the present Secretary of State, particularly on legislation about the closed shop. Exemptions were then made for seafarers because of the difficulties they face in relation to ballots. The right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) featured in the debates at that time. Clearly, therefore, my experience of the subject is bound to influence my attitude to the subjects of ballots and participation.

For 30 years I have been active in a trade union as an official and as an ordinary member. I have taken part in ballots — some postal — for executive councils, AGMs and delegates. Those ballots have occurred at the workplace, on sites, on ships, at branches, in executive councils and, for unofficial and official strikes, on sites. I can claim, therefore, to have participated in every type of ballot known to the trade union movement, including those covered by the Electoral Reform Society.

I learnt from those experiences. I am convinced of the role that ballots can play. My trade union actively ballots, in most cases by way of postal ballot, on matters concerning strikes, the election of officials, the political fund — the political fund will now be governed by legislation—and various other matters. In other words, ballots are an integral part of my union.

I recall one case when I was led to complain about a ballot irregularity. I complained through the normal procedures within the trade union movement and, as a result, the rules applying to ballots were tightened up. The ballot in question, with which I was closely concerned, was a postal ballot. The irregularity occurred because the postal ballot papers were sent to a ship which was due to remain in port at Southampton for only 24 hours. All the postal ballot papers were sent to the ship and we had a particularly active member who, in an effort to increase participation, collected all the envelopes and voted as he thought fit for members who had not received their voting papers.

I regarded that as a gross irregularity, which it clearly was, and, when I laid my views before the union and its executive, the procedures were changed. Indeed, the change was such that every member then had to sign for his or her ballot paper, to be sure of receiving it. The trouble was that, because everyone had to sign, so few participated in the ballot that a mockery was made of the vote.

There were bound to be difficulties because seamen cannot always be contacted. Indeed, the population of seafarers, so to speak, changes to the extent of 20 per cent. every year. Not only do their home addresses change, but seafarers may be out of the country for as long as a year or two years. That is the scale of the difficulty that my union has in dealing with ballots.

Every union, on receiving evidence of irregularity, will act. We do not need a commission or legislation to make it possible for people to take legal action. Many cases have arisen in the courts as a result of people pursuing breaches of union rules. Often the common law is invoked in that respect. In other words, the right of ordinary union members to pursue cases in court has always been available.

The interference directly in a ballot about which I am talking is improper. The sort of interference, as exemplified by Bernard Levin's article in The Times, however, is considered to be proper. He named candidates whom he thought should be elected in a ballot held by their union. He used the fact of his access to a national newspaper to influence a ballot. Apparently it is considered democratic for him to do that, even though he is not a member of the union concerned. He believes strongly, it seems, that moderates should be elected, and he uses The Times for that purpose.

I hope I have said enough to show that I need no lectures from alliance or Conservative Members about trade union ballots and their importance. I have explained that I am well aware of the way in which ballots operate, and I have described my involvement in them.

In my notes, when preparing this speech, I wrote, "SDP evidence," and left a gap which I thought I could fill in when listening to the speech of the right hon. Member for Devonport. In the event, he did not produce a scrap of evidence to justify any of his assertions. [Interruption.] I shall deal with the various points that the right hon. Gentleman made, including that applying to SOGAT.

When speaking of the TGWU, the right hon. Member for Devonport said that he was prepared to leave the issue as it applied to that union. I wish that he had decided earlier not to proceed with that. He was prepared to make all sorts of scurrilous charges on the basis of what he said he had heard from individual members who were making allegations about ballots.

The Secretary of State was right to point out that that union acted, without recourse to legislation, firmly in the case of Bristol and dismissed two officials. [Interruption.] Whether or not my agreement with the Secretary of State is an alliance in truth I do not know, but the facts are clear on the issue.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): The hon. Gentleman must know that I, as a member of the TGWU, wrote to Moss Evans and Norman Willis long before the wounding of the TGWU had continued for this length of time. In that letter I suggested, being aware of what was likely to happen — because of the way in which such matters tend to develop—that the best course would be for the TUC, as an independent and non-hostile body, to carry out an inquiry into what was happening. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would have been better if that course had been agreed to some weeks ago?

Mr. Prescott: Whether or not the hon. Gentleman feels that the response to his letter was undertaken quickly enough is another matter. The fact remains that the union and the candidates in that election made their position absolutely clear. The union and Mr. B. Evans, have been calling for evidence all along. I should have thought that this debate provided a good opportunity for that evidence to be produced. Instead, we have had only innuendo. We have not been given information of any kind to enable us to judge why the right hon. Member for Devonport believes that everything should be done by way of postal ballot.

The position seems clear enough. The TGWU executive will meet and deal with the matter. It has a history of dealing correctly with such complaints, and a similar history runs right through the trade union movement. If the union does not act, there will then be cause for concern. Either way, those who make allegations must justify what they say.

In that context, we must consider some of the statements that have been made by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock). I have read his party's press releases on this subject. The hon. Gentleman makes various scurrilous remarks in press handouts and then, when he writes to the certification officer, produces no evidence whatever. He can only refer to what some trade union members have told him they think is going on. A campaign based on such a lack of evidence reflects the opportunism which we have come to expect from the alliance.

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): Following the letter that I sent to the certification officer and Mr. Willis of the TUC, there was ample evidence for the TUC to step in and authorise a ballot to take place and for the certification officer to investigate the claims contained in the letter that was sent to him. In other words, ample evidence was provided for the investigation to take place.

Mr. Prescott: If the hon. Member is the SDP spokesman on industrial relations, if he believes that is the TUC's role and if he has been advising his right hon. Friend, it is no wonder his right hon. Friend made a mess of the facts. My point was that the letter sent to the certification officer had no evidence in it. I have a copy here. No evidence was given apart from conversations that the hon. Gentleman had with members of a trade union, whose support he presumably canvassed when he was a Labour party member, without one murmur about whether it was legitimate to receive such support. It is only since these people became members of the alliance that they are concerned about what they regard as matters of democracy. Therefore, this is an act of opportunism by the SDP.

If we want further evidence, we find that they voted for the Second Reading of the Trade Union Act 1984 and then abstained on Third Reading. When I looked through the debates on that legislation, I found that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) moved an amendment to a House of Lords amendment proposing that there should be a postal ballot for the political fund but then, at approximately 12.30 am, he said:

"In view of the lateness of the hour, and the fact that we have discussed these matters on previous occasions, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment." — [Official Report, 24 July 1984; Vol. 64, c. 492.]

The right hon. Member for Devonport was not even in attendance when there were votes. On that occasion the SDP did not pursue the amendment, which it thinks is so important, to require a postal ballot on the political fund. Why did the SDP not pursue the matter then? I am perhaps cynical. Shortly after that there was a statement by Shirley Williams, about which there was much publicity in the press, offering a deal to the unions—that if they gave some money to the SDP, it would not lead a campaign against a ballot on the political fund.

I do not know what happened, but now we have this motion before the House. Perhaps the SDP thought that it might get involved in bargaining and would have a case for saying, "Give us some of the money, Barney." When one considers the arguments and the statements that have been made, the matter does not seem very profitable for the SDP.

If the SDP's strong view on abuse of such political funds was reflected in the motion—companies giving money to political parties without balloting their shareholders—I might understand the motion. I think companies give donations to the SDP. It received £8,300 last year, and I think £5,000 of that was from the Norwich Union. The right hon. Member for Devonport is nipping round to companies, having lunch, and asking for money. If he thinks it is wrong to have political funds, it would be useful to legislate for postal ballots of company shareholders before companies decide that money should be made available to political parties. If the right hon. Member is nodding his head in agreement, why is he receiving money from companies when he does not know whether the shareholders agree that the money should be given to the party? I do not think that things like that worry the right hon. Gentleman. So long as he is getting the cash, so long as he is making a political point and so long as he can get more votes in the process, that is all he is concerned about.

When one considers that that kind of money is given to the SDP it reminds us of the point that was made earlier about SOGAT. Of course, the SDP expressed its view about the SOGAT ballot. It bought space in The Sun. I have a copy here. It placed an advertisement, costing £6,000, to lead an attack on SOGAT. It had received £5,000 from the Norwich Union. Therefore, one could say that that money from the Norwich Union helped to pay for the advertisement to have a go at SOGAT. It was a scurrilous advertisement, seeking to intervene in the election going on in that union. If I may be more cynical, perhaps placing it in The Sun was looking for a bit of aggro with the printers. It might have been seen as a good investment if there had been opposition to printing the advertisement. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer said about the miners' strike, it might have been a good investment. That may have influenced the attitude of the SDP.

The SDP's concern seems to be mainly about political ballots. As we know, the strike ballot does not come into force until October. The right hon. Member for Devonport addressed himself only to the political fund ballot. I draw to his attention the fact that there is a dispute in Devonport at present. As I understand it, the men walked out without a ballot. Of course, the Government are closing down the yard, so one can understand the lads reacting about that. Did the right hon. Member demand a postal ballot before they came out?

I thought I had better read the intellectual newspapers in that area, so I scoured through the Western Evening Herald for comments. All I could find was that the right hon. Member had said:

"Though anger and frustration may lead to protest today, by next week we must develop a constructive strategy for fighting back with alternative proposals."

That is quite proper. That is what a Member of Parliament should be doing. But he did not say that the men should get back and have a ballot. He did not say that what they had done was illegal and that he had supported the 1984 legislation which laid down that they should have a ballot before taking industrial action. That was another act of opportunism by the right hon. Member, in line with accepting trade union money and trade union nominations, all of which he did in his earlier career but which he now rejects as undemocratic.

I come to the Government's case.

Mr. Golding: Before my hon. Friend does that, will he deal with the point on campaigning made by the leader of the SDP? Is it not true that if the main purpose of any literature used in a lobby is held to be to further the interests of any party or candidate, it can only be financed from the political fund? If there were no political fund, it would be illegal. We are telling members that they have to vote yes in the ballot so as to keep the unfettered right to campaign.

Mr. Prescott: That is a very sound point. It was the concern of the SDP when it put that advertisement in the newspaper that the question was not about whether people voted for the Labour party. That was another mistake by the right hon. Member for Devonport. The question concerns whether a union has political objectives and uses its funds for those objectives. That question is determined by the certification officer and, as I understand it, by Parliament. It is determined by law and is carried out under the law. The question is not whether the money is given to the Labour party, the SDP or the Tories, but whether funds are used for political objects. That is the question that has been put to union members.

In regard to the Government's case, most of the conditions for ballots are determined by the Government. They set up the certification officer procedure. In some cases they pose the question. All these matters are determined by legislation, so in many ways this is direct intervention in trade unions which are voluntary bodies. No other voluntary body is faced with legislation like this.

It may be the Government's case that trade unions are different and have to be treated differently. I believe that the Government see the trade unions as different. They are a target to be dealt with. Therefore, a case can be made that the Government are anti-trade unions. The Secretary of State claims that his policy is different in that it is step by step. The objectives are no different from those of other Tory legislation in the past, but the Government are achieving their aims by stealth with a little assistance from the mass unemployment that they have brought about with their policies.

The Government's policy is to discipline the trade union movement. What else would one do with the "enemy within"? Is not that how the Prime Minister sees the trade unions? They have to be disciplined; they have to be made into friends; one needs legislation to bring them into order. The Government's language is entirely anti-trade union. Their legislation has been designed to cocoon the trade unions in court actions, where they are sued for damages and costs. Those are academically different from fines, but they are heavy on the funds. The legislation is designed to achieve a fundamental shift in power in the workplace. It is designed to attack the trade unions, impose legal controls on them and enforce the Government's ideas about ballots and how they will be conducted.

Therefore, the Government are not motivated by concern for good industrial relations. The idea is to strengthen management. We often hear that it is the right of management to manage. The Government want to influence the power structure in the place of work. It is one step towards weakening the trade union movement before they implement the rest of their policy, which is more unemployment, lower wages, reduced benefits, the reform of the welfare state and, indeed, the reduction of statutory employment rights.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prescott: I must get on with my speech. The Government's attitude is influenced by those facts. We said that in the debates on the legislation although I did not attend them and had to read the reports. Since then, the same charge can be made against the Government. There have been further announcements about the reduction of employment benefits. There has been the abolition of the fair wage clause, which led to a 12-month strike at Barking, where the women faced lower wages and a reduction in their working week. It is proposed that the wages councils should be abolished. The Government now talk of lowering the costs of industry by attacking maternity benefits, equal opportunities, and so on. All those things have been spelt out by the Government.

The one thing that brought home to me the Government's attitude was the press statement of 17 April on unfair dismissals. Now one needs to work at an establishment for more than two years to be able to bring an unfair dismissal claim. It is difficult to understand why the Government want to pursue that if they are not simply to be seen as vindictive. When I consider how many people are involved, I believe that the unfair dismissal proposal is, once again, a way of improving the strength of the manager at the place of work, and reducing the rights of workers to appeal against an injustice.

In support of that I refer to the statement made by the right hon. Member for Waveney in a Cabinet document of 17 July 1981. He was opposed to the suggestions, and he said that only 7 per cent. of all dismissals actually went to the industrial tribunals. In that document, he said to his Cabinet colleagues:

> "My conclusion, therefore, is that there is insufficient justification to amend employment legislation further in favour of employers. Moreover, I believe that any attempt to do so would alienate large sections of the working population, trade unionists and others and would therefore be politically damaging to the Government."

Now the right hon. Member for Waveney has been removed from the Cabinet, so there is action to reduce many employment benefits. That can be seen particularly in the Government's approach to unfair dismissal.

The same two-year period will not apply to the man who might join a union with a closed shop. He might join it today, but go to the other side of the world and decide that he no longer wants to be a trade unionist. He has an action for damages against the union if he refuses to remain in the closed shop—he is a sort of bounty hunter for the money. The same two-year period does not apply in that case. That can happen from day one. That illustrates the Government's approach to trade union legislation. That is why many feel——

Mr. Gale: I did not agree with much that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said today, but he did say that trade unionism was not the prerogative of any one political party, which is absolutely right. Will the hon. Gentleman concede that at the last election an assessed 5 million trade unionists voted for the Conservative party, that they are very well represented by the Conservative trade union movement, and that movement fully endorses the measures proposed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State?

Mr. Prescott: I shall not go into those arguments. I do not deny the right of any politician to make the case one way or the other. I am simply saying that the people who are arguing against the trade union legislation are making those points to me. I am arguing that the Government are anti-trade union in their legislation. They are continuing that approach by bringing in such measures.

The Government say, "Look what our legislation did for British Leyland." But there was a strike. It is interesting to note that Jaguar at Coventry did not choose to use the courts or any form of intimidation, and settled a similar matter quickly. The matter dragged on in British Leyland for several days, but it was settled quickly at Jaguar.

[Mr. Prescott]

Let me take the more recent case of the Post Office. Management took unilateral action with which the union and its members disagreed. Eventually they came out on strike, but the matter was settled quickly. We believe that as a result of the legislation there will be more unofficial quick strikes, such as we used to see in the 1960s. That is the way to bring management to its senses without recourse to the courts. Under the Government's legislation, the individual cannot be sued. Only the union can be sued. We shall have to wait and see what happens.

In their amendment, the Government talk of their concern for greater democracy. I was reminded of that when I read in The Guardian today of the fifth suicide at Government Communications Headquarters at Cheltenham. There was no ballot of members. They were not asked whether they wanted a trade union. The Government imposed their draconian power and used an Order in Council, which did not even have to be debated in the House. They denied those people the right to belong to a trade union. They were not asked whether they wanted a ballot. That was denied to them. All that they were offered was a £1,000 bribe to give up their trade union rights.

At the moment the other place is dealing with legislation that seeks to abolish democracy in the metropolitan counties and the Greater London council. Some time ago the other place was asked to consider passing a law to abolish elections when there was no Bill saying what would take their place. Therefore, how can the Secretary of State talk about democracy in these matters? There is no ballot for the people to enable them to decide whether they wish to keep those local authority structures. All the polls suggest that they want to keep them. The Secretary of State also talks about greater participation at the place of work. Why are we the only country in Europe that is refusing to implement the Vredeling recommendation that there should be more information for working people about their employment conditions?

At the same time, the Under-Secretary talks about the political godfathers in the trade unions giving money to the Labour party, but he does not comment on the money that has been given to the Tory party by companies. Some £3·5 million was given last year. The hon. Gentleman does not consider any of those companies to be godfathers. That is the sort of double-talk that we have come to expect from the Government, especially when it was the non-elected chairman of the Tory party, the hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who implemented the legislation.

We believe that the Government's legislation is an attempt to take us back to the old master-servant relationship. Labour Members believe, as we did in past legislation, in strengthening workplace participation, strengthening collective bargaining within the workplace, and bringing about greater industrial democracy and participation and harmony and co-operation in the workplace.

I want to make this clear to the Secretary of State, because he seemed to get a bit upset about it last time. I endorse the pledge given by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helen's, North (Mr. Evans) at Question Time on 2 April, that the next Labour Government will repeal Tory anti-trade union legislation and put in its place a new employment protection Act, which we are at present discussing with the trade union movement, emphasising our belief in co-operation rather than in confrontation for all those at work. There will be many more at work when a Labour Government are returned at the next election.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): I wish to make a brief intervention. I do so as a member for some years of the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs and an office holder in my local branch, and one who has tried to serve on the so-called parliamentary committee of ASTMS, without any success, because it will not allow anyone on it who is not a member of the Labour party.

Secondly, I speak from the privileged position of being national president of Conservative Trade Unionists, an organisation representing a large number of members, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) said earlier. As a matter of information, we would probably represent the largest block vote at the Trades Union Congress if we chose to exercise it at all, which of course we would not like to do. We have a substantial following. All the officers are elected legitimately within the context of the rules of Conservative Trade Unionists, and there is no reflection upon us of any of the activities that have been observed recently in the Transport and General Workers Union and other unions.

I agree with one point that was made by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). He criticised the official Opposition for suggesting that they had the inalienable right to represent trade unionists and trade unionism in the parliamentary debate, and particularly in the House. We all know that that is not the case. The majority of trade unionists at the last election, and in the election before that, voted Conservative rather than for the right hon. Gentleman's party. In those circumstances, he cannot gainsay the facts as presented, whether or not he likes them. The facts are that we can speak with as much authority on trade unionism as he can.

The two points that I wish to make are brief. First, the misconceptions represented by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport have, I think, been dealt with extremely well by my right hon. Friend the Minister. It would waste time if I were to go over them in detail. However, they bear repeating in one context only, in that the four safeguards in the Act need emphasising time and again. They are, briefly: a new right for members to complain to the certification officer about the arrangements for union elections before as well as after the poll, a new duty on the certification officer to investigate the complaint at no expense to the complainant.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The hon. Gentleman has already said that.

Mr. Atkins: I emphasise it again because certain people who are not a million miles away appear not to have recognised what is involved.

Next, there is a new requirement that, when a court orders an election to be re-run, it will normally be done by post. Finally, there is a new duty on all unions to compile an up-to-date register of their members' names and addresses so that postal votes can be held. Let us therefore be clear about the four safeguards in the Act.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) has, I think, just lost his standing at the next election as a result of the statements that he has made, which have been confirmed by his hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). He has said that he will repeal all the trade union legislation passed by the Conservative party. He is referring to legislation which, if he talks to the trade unionists whom he is supposed to represent, he will find is popular with them, whether in my constituency or in any other, and he knows that that is the truth. That is the kind of approach that will lose him and his party the next election, and he had better recognise it here and now.

It is clear that the Labour party, as usual, has been nobbled by the trade unionists to take a stance which conflicts entirely with what ordinary trade union members believe in in their various trade unions. We observed the other day that at one moment the Leader of the Opposition was in favour of a re-ballot in the TGWU, and then somebody got on the telephone to him and said, "Look, this is not quite on, old boy," so he changed his view, and he is no longer in favour of a re-ballot in the TGWU.

As I said earlier, we have observed the hon. Member for St. Helens, North being supported by that man of principle, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who, perhaps seeing the way the wind is blowing, has decided that he is now in favour of a new social contract, which means that again trade unionists have been on the telephone to him making it clear where he must stand in the context of the Labour party.

Anybody who appreciates what is involved in this issue knows that the majority of people who are members of trade unions understand only too well that changes need to be made. Where we differ from the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport and his party is that we do not believe that the postal vote system as he enunciates it is the answer. There is a real possibility that the necessary organisation to operate that system would become the sort of quango which the extreme Left within the unions could choose to argue against more easily than it could the views of the members of trade unions which ought to carry more weight.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) said, we believe that we should give this legislation a chance. The legislation of 1980, 1982 and 1984 has proved that legislation can be put on the books to cope with some of the difficulties and problems, and, above all, with handing back the trade unions to the members who ought to be participating.

In those circumstances, I believe that the motion of the SDP and the alliance is wrong. The speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear why we believe that we are right to adopt the path that we have adopted up to now and will continue to adopt. The statement of the hon. Member for St. Helens, North, supported by all the Johnnies-come-lately in the Labour party, will be a contribution to the Labour party losing the election, and it will not be helped by the antics of the alliance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House will wish to know that the wind-up speeches are expected to begin at a quarter to 7, so time is now very limited.

6.35 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I should first like to make the point that, if I live long enough, in three years I shall get a 50-year badge in my trade union. I think that I can speak with some experience of trade unionism at many levels, as an ordinary member, a shop steward and a district committee member, and as having once fought the assistant general secretaryship of my union and almost winning it when I did not want to—but these things happen.

I wish to make one point clear. The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) suggested that the Government's legislation would give the unions back to their members. As far as I am concerned, the trade unions have always belonged to their members. The Secretary of State made some reference to car parks or suchlike in relation to voting in branches. I have to explain to the Secretary of State that each union has its own different methods of voting. The Amalgamated Society of Woodworkers always voted at a branch, and I will tell the House how we did it. We voted at the branch meeting. There were two tellers and the chairman recorded the vote on the sheet. It was, of course, an individual vote for each person who was standing, so that one received 25 votes and another 50 votes, and that was recorded. At the end of that part of the meeting, the chairman read it back. Therefore, it was on the sheet, read back, recorded in the minutes and sent to the national executive. At the end, we received a booklet which recorded every branch vote for every individual member—the fairest method of voting that I know in the trade union movement because checks took place at every level. I never knew anything different from that in my trade union.

With regard to voting in relation to strikes, I will give a concrete example of workers who did not have a ballot, but who took an action which I think was one of the greatest actions of solidarity that I can remember. The Canadian seamen came into the port of Liverpool, and they walked off their ship on the instructions of their union in Canada. A group of dockers were instructed to work the ship, refused to do so and were suspended. Within three hours, every dock worker in the port of Liverpool and Birkenhead was out on strike and remained on strike while that ship was tied up. It lasted six weeks. They did not get a penny. It was not for themselves; in my view it was purely an act of unselfish solidarity, the likes of which, incidentally, one does not often see. It was absolutely magnificent. I think that there were a few blue union members around at the time, but in the main they were members of the TGWU.

It is nonsense to say that there is no democracy in the trade union movement. As we all know, fiddles sometimes take place within every organisation. Can any hon. Member say that they do not take place within the Conservative party? I do not know how many votes take place at local level—[Interruption.] I understand that there are not any votes. Of course there cannot be any fiddles if people cannot vote. It is as simple as that.

But from time to time, something will go wrong over ballots in any organisation and there will be arguments about it. That is the law of nature. It happens. But it does not mean that the Government must interfere in that organisation's internal affairs. Members of the trade union movement are quite able to deal internally with the difficulties as they arise, as the TGWU and other unions are quite able to do. In all the years, only one exception to that rule is constantly trotted out, involving what was then the Electrical Trade Union.

[Mr. Eric S. Heffer]

The speech of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) was as bad as that of any Right-wing member of the Tory party, and it made the Secretary of State look like a liberal. It was remarkable. That right hon. Gentleman was once a member of the Labour party and accepted everything that the Labour party could give him. He would not be where he is today if it had not been for the Labour party and the trade unionists and others who worked for him and backed him in the early years of his political life. I say to him as I say to others, "Don't turn your back" — although, of course, he has — "on the people who have sustained you in your political life."

I shall not make a long speech, as I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), who is sponsored by the TGWU, also has a right to speak in the debate. Today, the SDP and the Conservative party have once again stressed their basically anti-trade union attitudes. That is what this debate is all about. The move began many years ago with a pamphlet published by a group of Conservative lawyers which was entitled, "A Giant's Strength". They believed that the trade union movement was too powerful, that working people were getting conditions that were too good and they had to be cut down to size. That is what this debate and the legislation is all about, and that is what the right hon. Member for Devonport and the Government wish to do, although perhaps with a slightly different emphasis. They are trying to prevent the trade union movement from fighting for decent conditions and for workers' rights.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Penhaligon.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro) rose——

Mr. McNamara: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Today we have had a statement from the Secretary of State for Employment about my union's procedures. When I sought to intervene in his speech to correct him, he refused to give way. In addition, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) made scurrilous comments about my trade union without any evidence and did not give me——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman's point of order is.

Mr. McNamara: I was about to come to the point. Perhaps you can tell me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, how there can be a debate which is designed to attack the trade unions without Members who are sponsored by unions being given an opportunity to reply. I remind you that 28 Members are sponsored by the TGWU, which is more than the combined total of alliance party Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I realise that the hon. Gentleman is one of several hon. Members who have been unable to speak in this very short debate, but he is a very experienced Member of Parliament, and I am sure that he will find another way of putting his point on the record.

Mr. Penhaligon rose——

Mr. Cyril Smith: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Might I suggest that if Labour Members had not attempted to prevent the debate from taking place, and had not carried on for an hour, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) might have been able to make his speech?

Mr. Penhaligon: I always enjoy the speeches of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), because those of us who have been in the House for some time know that he is clearly part of the trade union movement and understands it.

However, it was slightly ironic that the hon. Gentleman should criticise my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) for changing his party, because I understand that from 1941 to 1948 the hon. Gentleman was a member of the Communist party. I do not say that there is anything wrong with that, but he is not in a particularly strong position to criticise my right hon. Friend for changing his party. Another reason for enjoying the speeches of the hon. Member for Walton is that he now represents the Right wing of the Liverpool Labour party. That is clearly a mantle which the hon. Gentleman finds extremely difficult to bear in this House.

I should like to clarify several points that have been raised in the debate. The Minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that the executive of the NUM proposes at the July conference to change the rules to make it quite clear that Mr. Scargill does not have a casting vote and so may not be re-elected under the legislation. It was ludicrous of the Minister to claim that the earlier remarks of my right hon. Friend were wrong. The Minister should be well aware that we have always taken the view—and accordingly we abstained from voting on the previous legislation — that although we want strike ballots eventually, the Government's proposals for ballots are not necessarily the best way of achieving that aim. We still think that trigger ballots are best, and much of the criticism of Labour Members about the legislation causing unofficial strikes has some substance to it.

I deal now with the political levy. I listened to what the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) said, and I do not complain, because what he said is true. If the political levy is voted down, the trade unions will not be able to use money to ask people to vote for Labour candidates. I have a good few farmers in my constituency and, as any hon. Member who has two cows and a pig in his constituency will know, the most effective campaigning group is the National Farmers Union. It does not specifically ask people to vote Tory, but I suspect that behind the scenes it gives a fair bit of encouragement in that direction. As I understand things, the NFU would come within the legislation as currently proposed.

Mr. Golding: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that on the ballot paper it specifically says that money has to come from a political fund if it is spent "on the production, publication or distribution of any literature, document, film, sound recording or advertisement the main purpose of which is to persuade people to vote for a political party or candidate or to persuade them not to vote for a political party or candidate."?

Is the hon. Gentleman further aware that the Post Office Engineering Union found it impossible to persuade the Court of Appeal about our main purpose? We were defending jobs, but we were told that we were political. We lost the case because we could not persuade the court that we were pursuing trade union objectives.

Mr. Penhaligon: I can only suggest that the hon. Gentleman's union should take some advice from the NFU, which has had quite remarkable success and, indeed, as a rural Member of Parliament, I can say, has sometimes caused me slightly embarrassing results for the past two decades.

However, I shall move on as there are only 12 minutes left in which to speak. I still believe that workplace ballots have something to recommend them. The problem is that for such ballots to be seen to be above question there must be a system of independent scrutineers. That is my view, and it is the position that I have taken for some considerable time.

Mr. McNamara rose——

Mr. Penhaligon: There is not time—there are 11 minutes to go.

I also take the view that the provision of independent scrutineers at all workplace ballots for great unions like the TGWU is a total impossibility in terms of resources and money. To take my own constituency, to offer scrutinised ballots the TGWU would have to employ the entire staff who man a general election. I do not believe that that is possible and realistic, so I am opposed to workplace ballots as currently constituted.

Clearly, the scrutineering is being done by parties which often have a very clear, firm view themselves. As I understand the legislation to be enacted in October of this year, that position will not change. If there is a ballot at a workplace, the scrutineers are likely to be the most partisan people in the entire campaign, because the chances are that they will be the leaders of the union. The Government are allowing that to continue and it is rather like, at a general election, allowing the Labour party to run the ballot in Durham, the Tories that in Surrey or the Liberals—to show that I am broadminded—that in Truro. I do not think that any of them would be the first persons to spring to mind to run an absolutely independent, above-board election in any of those areas. It is my view that sheer partisanship is bound to affect a minority and that it is bound to use the opportunities available. I believe that for a minority the temptation will be just too strong.

What is required are postal ballots with a register of members, and it is to the credit of the Government that at least eventually they will produce a register of members. The postal paper ballot should be sent to the members, and the individual members should send them to an independent agent. Anything less than that is open to adjustment.

Many of us recognise that some genuine ballots take place within the NUM, but one of the ironies—and this takes some explaining—is that at every important NUM ballot that I can recall since I have been a Member of Parliament we have been told the result, except when it has been a very close call, before the ballots have gone to the Electoral Reform Society for counting. That clearly means that somebody has been looking at the ballots and counting them. I am not saying that they have been adjusted, but occasionally the temptation so to do must be too much for the independent agent.

It is worth remembering that in the demonstration that took place it was by and large the most enthusiastic union members who sat on this Bench and denied my right hon. Friend the Member for De onport the opportunity to make his speech, and that they are the independent scrutineers whom the unions normally appoint. The truth is that the reliability of the trade unions in carrying out an absolutely independent, above-board ballot has fallen into disrepute.

The claim that 98 per cent. of the members of the TGWU and a whole series of unions voluntarily pay their political levy is quite incredible. The amazing situation that we now have is that the Labour party is arguing for the trade unions to maintain the position that is currently favourable to it, and the Government are coming to its defence in that. It is time that the Government recognised the logic of this motion and that Government Members voted for it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I suspect that if the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) had been able to draft this motion, he would have put down a slightly different one. He has given a rather more acceptable face to it than did the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen).

The leader of the SDP went through the first half-hour of what ought to have been this debate in a spirit of good humour and tolerance and I would like to recognise that. What we saw at the beginning of this debate was the kind of behaviour that some complain of at trade union branch meetings and others have experienced at Labour party meetings. When this happens anywhere, we ought to condemn rather than support it.

Mr. Evans: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bottomley: No, I will not.

One reason why this debate is so important is the shoe that was not dropped by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). He did not talk much about political review ballots and the reason is that he knows that about 80 per cent. of that money goes to the Labour party and those who are not in the Labour party have a vested interest in stopping it. That is open and above board. What seems to me important is that, while people are saying things which are not right about the review ballots—one example was given in the SOGAT Journal and others are in the TGWU Record, as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) could have said—there has been very little media interest in what union journals are saying. I think that they might go through the list of unions with a political fund, as in the cerfication officer's report on SOGAT and get in touch with the editors of the jornals and ask if they believe what they are saying. When they give examples of what they claim requires political funds, they ought to ask whether that activity has in the past been funded by political funds or by the general fund. I suspect that in that way we would get many more people participating in the review ballots and I suspect that we would see some of the funds go.

I want to give a bit of advice to bank managers who are financing the political funds that are in deficit. They ought to be very careful about these, because if a union cuts off its political fund, the bank will be unable to get the money from any other part of union funds. That is one of the things that they ought to start looking at.

On the question whether we should have only postal ballots in this whole field, we need first of all to see what sort of employment protection Act we are promised by the Labour party. Are they going to keep the political fund review process? Are they going to keep regular elections for members of the executive of unions?

Mr. Evans: I do not know what the party's policy is yet, because we are having discussions with the trade unions. However, I can tell the hon. gentleman and the Tory party what I want. I want to abolish the necessity for trade unions to have political funds.

Mr. Bottomley: We will see. It is quite clear—this runs right across the political spectrum from Ron Todd to the leader of the SDP—that unions need to demonstrate that their affairs are in order. As Ron Todd himself has said, to have unity, trust and confidence, there must be election systems which people do not and cannot tamper with. To balance that with the sort of participation rates which my right hon. Friend was talking about requires discussion and debate not only in the House but outside. It is the sort of subject that the House can return to with advantage so that we do not just have the sort of demonstrations that, sadly, we have seen today. We should hear from the Labour party and from people such as my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North and get the kind of participation in union affairs which is essential. That is the only way that trade union activists can represent the interests of their members and increase interest in the unions.

There is no need for union leaders to be political godfathers. The normal and ultimately the natural posture of the trade union movement is one of neutrality towards each political party and co-operation with the Government in office. That doubles their influence. When there are trade union leaders who can demonstrate that they have the widespread support of their members, they are likely to be taken more seriously in all parts of the House and not just by those who want to barrack to get all points of view other than their own submerged in the sort of demonstration that we have seen today.

It is quite clear that trade union ballots and elections will never be the same again. Even in the Transport and General Workers Union, of which I am a member—

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Who did you vote for?

Mr. Bottomley: I did not vote this time, because it would have been a vote for the Labour party.

It is quite clear that, with political funds fairly run and with fair national executive elections, it is inconceivable that the general secretary should be elected in a different way. It is important to note that higher participation in union votes and elections is likely to result in a trade union movement that serves the interests of its members. Parliament will then serve the interests of trade unions.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the success of the Government's step-by-step approach to the reform of industrial relations law and to the strengthening of rights of individual trade union members; welcomes the new and stringent provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984 concerning secret ballots before strike action, for trade union elections and for the maintenance of political funds; notes the fundamental change in trade union attitudes and practices now taking place; welcomes in particular the increasing interest and involvement of trade union members in the conduct of their unions' affairs; and congratulates the Government on making the achievement of greater democracy in trade unions a central objective of its industrial relations policy.

Orders of the Day

Ports (Finance) Bill

7.25 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This is a short, but necessary, Bill which I commend to the House. It is in three parts, and it deals with three distinct aspects of port finance.

Clauses 1 and 2 enable the Government to continue to help with the cost of restructuring an industry which has undergone enormous changes in the past 20 years. The reasons for those changes are well known: the development of bigger but fewer ships; the need to minimise the time ships spend in port because of the high costs of ship operation; the effect on our patterns of trade of the development of North sea oil and of our membership of the European Community; improvements in our inland communications, both road and rail; and, of course, the evolution of new techniques of cargo handling, in particular the "container revolution." Ships now spend less time in port, so port facilities must be used more intensively; fewer berths are needed, and therefore fewer dockers. At the end of 1960, there were 74,000 registered dock workers. At the end of 1970, the number had fallen to 45,000; at the end of 1980 it had fallen to 23,000. By the end of 1984, the number of registered dock workers had fallen to 12,500.

Those dramatic changes have not been easy for the industry to cope with, but there has been remarkably little friction.

That contraction has been achieved largely through voluntary severances. In 1981-82 it became clear that the cost of this to the industry was becoming too severe, and the Government decided to assist in two ways.

First, we recognised that the ports of Liverpool and London faced severe problems. Those ports had dominated the conventional break-bulk cargo business in deep-sea trades, and were therefore hard hit by the containerisation of so much of this traffic. They were faced with enormous problems of rationalising their labour, their organisation, and their port facilities. We therefore decided that it would be right to assist them in reducing their manpower and in enabling them to continue to operate while these changes were carried through. The Ports (Financial Assistance) Act 1981 empowered the Government to make available to London and Liverpool up to £160 million by way of grants, loans and guarantees. That ceiling was raised in the Transport (Finance) Act 1982 to £360 million.

Secondly, in 1982 we decided to help the industry as a whole to meet the cost of severance payments to registered dock workers. As the House will know, special arrangements for severance apply to registered dock workers. They are not covered by the Redundancy Payments Act 1965; nor is their severance paid for directly by their employer. In 1969, the employers of registered dock workers entered into a national voluntary severance scheme, which is administered by the National Dock Labour Board. The board makes severance payments from a fund that it administers on behalf of the employers, and which is paid for ultimately by a levy on the employers.

Although by 1982 the fund had been substantially supported by Government loans, it was clear that at the rate at which voluntary severances were continuing, it was beyond the means of the employers both to service that debt and to meet the continuing cost of new severances. So we agreed to a three-year moratorium on the servicing of that debt, provided that the employers paid to the National Dock Labour Board a levy of £12 million annually to meet the cost of new severances.

A large part of the assistance which the Government have given to the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company under the 1981 Act has been in the form of grants to pay the full cost of severing registered dock workers in those two ports — no less than £106·7 million. That has not been a discrimination in favour of London and Liverpool. The money has, in fact, benefited all ports in the dock labour scheme, because it has relieved the ports collectively of a cost that would otherwise have fallen directly upon the national voluntary severance scheme, and which they would otherwise have had to fund themselves.

London and Liverpool have continued to pay their share of the levy although they have not, because of special Government assistance, been drawing benefit in return from the scheme.

I have described the background in some detail because I believe that it helps to explain the reasons for clauses 1 and 2.

Since 1982, the reduction in port manpower has continued apace. In just over three years the register of dock workers in scheme ports has fallen by about a third and now stands at just under 12,000. In London and Liverpool, the decline has been proportionately greater, and the Government have committed in full the £360 million that Parliament authorised in 1982 for assistance to the PLA and the MDHC.

Moreover, the three-year moratorium on the servicing of the debt of the national voluntary severance scheme has now expired, and though the package of assistance for the scheme agreed in 1982 has made a major contribution to dealing with the severance finance problem, it has not yet solved it. The past year has been a particularly difficult one for the ports industry. As a result, the number of approved applications from registered dock workers for severance under the scheme has exceeded expectations. The number is well in excess of that which could be financed from the board's £12 million annual levy income. In fact, the rate of dock worker severances in scheme ports outside London and Liverpool has been running at over 1,000 a year, which on present scales costs £25 million a year.

To help the industry we have made a series of stop-gap arrangements to enable the board to fund those severances. The last of these, announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment in his minute laid before Parliament on 30 January, was a Government guarantee of the board's bank overdraft of up to £17·2 million, in addition to outstanding Government loans of £44·5 million. As we made clear at that time, our agreement to guarantee the commercial loan was intended to provide time to pursue alternative proposals for financing severances. We believe that there must be a continued strategic approach to the long-term restructuring of registered ports.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The Minister must forgive my parochialism, but I see that there is no specification of Scottish ports in clauses 1 and 2. Does he anticipate that part of the grant mentioned in clause 1 will go towards redundancy schemes in one or more of the Scottish ports?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, any moneys paid under the Bill—whether under clause 1 or clause 2—will go to the national voluntary severance fund and, as such, will be used to pay for the redundancies of any registered dockers in any scheme port. Therefore, any Scottish scheme port will benefit just as much as any English scheme port. Non-scheme ports are totally outside the scheme.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettlestone): Will all dock workers be treated equally? Will the same severance scheme payment apply in Glasgow as applies in Liverpool or London?

Mr. Ridley: Hitherto, that has been the case, and I see no reason why it should not continue to be so. I must make it clear that there is also the interest of the employers in what they pay redundant workers. What we do is to provide the money for a certain level of severance—in this case £25,000 per head — but making a docker redundant is first suggested by the employer, then approved by the National Dock Labour Board, and at that point the final decision is taken. It is a fairly complex matter, but there has never been any discrimination.

Since our agreement to guarantee the commercial loan, discussions have been proceeding and are continuing with the port employers. But it is already clear that the scheme ports cannot meet the full cost of future severance needs and at the same time service and repay their outstanding severance debts. It is against that background, and the unique circumstances of the manpower regime in this industry, that clause 1 is necessary.

We cannot be sure of the future level of severances, but we must make provision now for some extra assistance towards severance costs. Therefore, we propose a new power to pay grants to the NDLB as a contribution towards the cost of registered dock worker severances. These grants are limited to £10 million, but a contingency provision is included to increase the amount in future years up to a maximum of £40 million, subject to affirmative resolution of the House.

This help is merely a recognition by the Government of the special difficulties of the dock labour scheme ports as they move towards providing an unsubsidised and competitive service to their customers. I have emphasised to the employers that while these powers will enable the Government to continue to contribute to the cost of dock worker severances, the cost of severances in this industry, as in other industries, is very properly a charge on the ports themselves. Soon they will have to shoulder the burden unaided.

Clause 2 relates to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company and the Port of London Authority. Both have made strenuous efforts to adjust, and, with Government assistance, they are moving towards viability. They have, however, some way to go, and, in view of their importance, we believe that we should continue to help them towards that goal.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): Is it not a matter of the utmost regret that we are now raising the grants and loans to those two ports to £500 million, which by any standard is an enormous sum of money? Is not my right hon. Friend now doing what he often accuses others of doing — throwing money at a problem and thereby deferring the day when we reach a competitive position and place those two ports on a viable and independent basis?

Mr. Ridley: This is not discrimination in favour of London and Liverpool, because the money actually goes towards the total expenses of the severance fund. It benefits London and Liverpool only to the extent that any of it may be used on non-registered dock workers' severances. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that, as shown by the figures that I gave earlier, we have come a very long way towards achieving a position where scheme ports stand on their own feet and do without subsidy.

The fact that we have come down from 70,000 to 12,000 registered dock workers shows the immensity of the task that faced the industry. I believe that there was no alternative but to assist at least with compensation for those who lost their jobs due to the technological revolution in the docks.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): The Secretary of State appears to be maintaining that clause 2 does not provide for any discrimination in favour of those two major ports as opposed to other scheme ports, yet the explanatory memorandum states that part of the additional sum of £140 million is for "supporting them while such measures are being taken".

What can that mean other than a subsidy to those two major ports which is not available to other ports, and which must, by definition, make those other ports less competitive?

Mr. Ridley: The explanatory memorandum may be misleading on that point. It is the Bill that matters. The only determinant of how much the Government have paid in the past has been the number of redundancies declared by and accepted from Liverpool and London, and that determines the sum of money — £25,000 by 1,000 redundancies, which makes £25 million — that the Government have paid to the fund. That sum is then available to all scheme ports for the redundancies that arise within them. At the same time, all scheme ports, including London and Liverpool, pay a share of the levy that is based on their number of employees. Therefore, in that respect the Bill does not produce any discrimination.

There is an element of discrimination in that the Government have been paying towards the cost of severing the non-registered dock workers in London and Liverpool, but not in other ports. As the hon. Gentleman will soon hear, we intend to phase out that assistance so as to take away the last element of discrimination.

The £360 million of assistance authorised by Parliament under previous legislation has been fully committed. Some £145 million has been made available to the MDHC, £170 million to the PLA and £24 million to the National Dock Labour Board in respect of severance payments made to registered dock workers in London and Liverpool before 1981. The remainder—£21 million—is earmarked for a debt write-off for the PLA. The authority to write off part of the PLA's debt to the Government and to repay commercial loans which the Government had guaranteed was given in the Ports (Reduction of Debt) Act 1983.

Regrettably, neither the PLA nor the NDHC is yet in a position to manage its own affairs unaided, so the Bill proposes to raise the limit for financial assistance from the Government by £140 million up to £500 million. I cannot say how much of this additional money it may be necessary to draw upon. A substantial amount will be needed for further severances, as there are still substantial surpluses in both ports.

Scheme ports should not be under any illusion that this increase in the potential funds available would mean that they can slacken their efforts to restore their industry to health — far from it. The tasks facing the industry remain tough ones.

I add two points. First, my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), said at the end of 1982 that we were no longer prepared to make grants to the PLA and the MDHC to cover any deficits on their annual profit and loss accounts. We have stuck to that. I intend to continue to stick to that. There is to be no return to deficit funding.

Secondly, it is my firm intention to phase out assistance to these two undertakings. They should be in no doubt that public finance will be deployed for one purpose only: to put those ports under strong and steady pressure to make the changes necessary to achieve full commercial profitability, so that they can compete fairly with other parts of the industry. I therefore intend, as I told the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), to phase out, over a period, the Government grant towards the cost of severing their non-registered employees. These payments have given the PLA and the MDHC an advantage which other port undertakings have not had. It is right that in a competitive industry we should insist upon an equitable framework for competition.

The second and third parts of the Bill carry forward our general policy of deregulation and removing unnecessary Government controls and restrictions. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will be able to expand on what I briefly say when he comes to wind up the debate, if he is fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Clauses 3 to 5 remove various ministerial controls over trust port borrowing and other matters. These controls take no consistent pattern and are no longer appropriate. Their removal is consistent with the decision, announced in the autumn statement and confirmed in the recent public expenditure White Paper, to transfer trust ports' capital investment expenditure to the private sector from 1 April 1985. Up to that date, their investment had counted—increasingly illogically — as public expenditure. I say "illogically" because most ports — other than local authority ports — now obtain capital for new projects from the private sector anyway.

The funding of trust ports' capital investment in the main from private market sources has led us to conclude that the hotch-potch of ministerial consent provisions in trust ports' local legislation should be removed—partly because they are no longer needed and partly because their application and effect differ widely from one undertaking to another. Indeed, no trust ports' local legislation is alike in this respect. In practice, the powers of many ports are so framed that they can borrow all that they need within the basic limit specified in their local enactments, so they do not have to seek specific ministerial consent.

The third part of the Bill is clause 6. A year ago I announced my decision to do away with Government controls over new harbour development. Under section 9 of the Harbours Act and the control of harbour development orders made under that section, no harbour development costing more than £3 million could be undertaken without my approval. This was an anachronism in a commercial, competitive industry. Accordingly, I made an order to revoke the orders which gave effect to section 9. The order was debated, on an Opposition motion, on 19 June last year, and approved by the House.

Section 9 itself, however, still remains on the statute book. Clause 6 of the Bill repeals it, along with all the consequential provisions which relate to it. The clause fulfils the undertaking that I gave a year ago, to repeal section 9 at an early opportunity.

The Bill is needed to help our ports to bring their manpower numbers into line with the requirements of the traffic that they now handle. Without these powers, scheme ports risk being forced to keep, and to pay, staff for whom they no longer have any need. This adds to their costs and hampers their ability to compete with non-scheme ports. It makes it more difficult for our ports to meet the competition from continental ports.

Therefore, I urge the House to give the Bill a Second Reading.

7.45 pm

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I apologise to the Secretary of State for the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) who, as the Secretary of State is aware, is serving on the Standing Committee on the Transport Bill. She is at dinner at the moment, but she is going back to the debate on de-regulation of the bus industry. As we do not have as many shadow spokesmen as the Secretary of State has Ministers, it is important that my hon. Friend remains in her place. I hope that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) will not seek to gain possession of the Dispatch Box, because I shall be in my place throughout the debate.

The Secretary of State has given the reasons why the Government have yet again found it necessary to come to the House to seek approval to increase the limits of the financial assistance to the scheme ports, particularly to the ports of Merseyside and London. I shall not be encouraging my hon. Friends to seek to divide the House, because we are all too well aware of the financial difficulties that both these ports have undergone and in many respects are still undergoing.

The port authorities covered by the scheme will have to pay £800,000 a month in April and May to finance the voluntary redundancy fund; that is 20 per cent. less than last year. I understand that the severance scheme is about £58 million in debt, most of it to the Government. The Bill will mean that the National Dock Labour Board, as the Secretary of State said, will get £10 million grant, with further powers to receive another £30 million some time in the future. I have watched the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) through transport debates over the years. It makes a refreshing change, although he may not agree, to see this particular Secretary of State making public funds available to ensure that the scheme works properly.

Mr. Moate: I wish that it were a refreshing change. In this industry, this Secretary of State and this Government have consistently, time after time, come back to the House and asked for more money. Every time, we are told that it is likely to be the last time, so why should we believe it now?

Mr. Stott: It makes a refreshing change for this Secretary of State to say that he is prepared to put more public money into making the scheme work properly. We are not complaining about that.

The decline in manpower in the port of London and in Liverpool illustrates in our view the chaotic state of the British port industry. When I left the Merchant Navy in 1964, my home port of Liverpool employed 13,500 dockers. Today, that has shrunk to 2,841. Some 301 jobs were lost through voluntary severance during the last 12 months, and more jobs could be lost in Merseyside as a consequence of the loss of the Isle of Man trade. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) will enlarge on that problem if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

According to the Port of London Authority's latest annual report, the number of people employed by the PLA has been reduced from 4,406 to 3,553. That reduction included 400 registered dock workers and 453 non-registered personnel, and represented a reduction of 17 per cent. in registered personnel and 22 per cent. in the rest of the work force. In the past twelve months alone, we have seen in those two ports a drastic reduction in manpower.

We have had a number of debates in the House on ports and harbours since the Government came to power, and under successive Secretaries of State. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) in 1983, and my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) in 1984, with every justification, repeated the assertion that the Government have no long-term strategy for the British ports industry other than selling off the profitable assets of Associated British Ports and Sealink harbours and dissolving the National Ports Council. That lack of a proper strategy has accelerated the rapid decline of the once great natural highways of the Mersey and the Clyde. It has encouraged Antwerp to become, one might almost say, another British seaport, just as Schiphol has become another British airport.

The Secretary of State's response to the decline of this great industry has been predictable. The Secretary of State and I and a number of our colleagues are engaged in a titanic battle in Committee because the Secretary of State is putting into practice his obsession with market forces by deregulating Britain's buses.

The Bill merely confirms the statutory instrument introduced last year. The right hon. Gentleman is deregulating Britain's ports by replacing section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964.

Among other things, section 9 included the words:

"Subject to the provisions of this section, the Minister, with a view to securing the proper control in the national interest of schemes of harbour development that appear to him to involve expenditure of a capital nature".

The important words are "in the national interest".

That section was inserted because it was felt at the time —and I still feel—that the development of ports is a national issue and should be treated on a national basis. That is what the Secretary of State seeks to do.

Mr. Ridley: If the hon. Gentleman wants endlessly greater investment in the infrastructure, why is it in the national interest to have powers that are limited to preventing investment being made in the infrastructure?

Mr. Stott: It is interesting that the Secretary of State should raise that point, given his views on the alleged profligacy of bus support. However, I shall answer it shortly.

Last year, at the annual dinner of the British Ports Association, the Secretary of State made his intentions clear. They were not surprising. The Secretary of State is well known for his neolithic views about how we conduct our affairs. He said:

"Our predecessors saw"—

even this point is wholly wrong—

"the ports as part of the infrastructure needing to be centrally planned, protected from so-called 'wasteful' competition, regulated by Government, with investment vigorously controlled by the state . . . We regard the ports industry as a normal industry like any other. Ports can and should compete among themselves. We have made them compete with each other as well as the continental ports".

That is typical of statements by the Secretary of State. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, East said in the debate on the statutory instrument:

"This naive belief in the absolutism of competition shows an ignorance of port activities and of the industry."

I subscribe to that view.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Is not the situation even more serious? My hon. Friend mentions Antwerp. On the philosophy of the Secretary of State, Dunkirk, Antwerp and Rotterdam are competing directly with London. The right hon. Gentleman says that there is more surplus labour in London to be discarded. He did not give the figures. Is he not devoting public money to subsidising the elimination of port facilities in London necessitated by subsidised competition from municipal ports on the continent?

Mr. Stott: My hon. Friend is quite right. That point was made by the managing director of the PLA when I visited Tilbury last year.

It is generally acknowledged in the industry——

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has not given his hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) a very satisfactory answer. Rotterdam is probably the biggest port in western Europe. It handles about the same amount of trade as the whole United Kingdom. It employs about 4,400 dockers — about a third of our total. That is why overseas ports take our trade. They are more efficient in the use of labour.

Mr. Stott: We could stay here all night disagreeing with the Secretary of State's interpretation of facts and figures. Neither I nor my hon. Friend believe what the right hon. Gentleman says for a moment, and I am sure that my hon. Friend preferred my answer to the helpful intervention of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Spearing: I certainly did.

I visited Rotterdam last October. It is very different from the British ports because it fulfils a somewhat different function although it can compete with the ports of south-east England.

Mr. Stott: It is generally acknowledged by those in the industry—even if not by the Secretary of State—that there is serious over-capacity in our ports now, and has been for some time. That became abundantly clear last year when Southampton, regrettably, ceased to function as a port for a considerable time. The cargo was absorbed quite easily by other United Kingdom ports.

During the 1983 debate, my hon. Friends graphically illustrated to the House the way in which their ports had declined—especially the ports on the west coast. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston, (Mr. Marshall) summed up the debate for the Opposition. My hon. Friend the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said:

"It is horrible to think that 10 years or so ago there were over 2,000 shipping movements on the Clyde, but last year there were only 112. We have seen a collapse from about 1·6 million tonnes of general cargo to under 500,000 tonnes."—[Official Report, 14 March 1983; Vol. 39, c. 86.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) can confirm that there has been an even bigger decline in traffic movements on the Clyde and in cargo movements.

With my hon. Friends from the shadow transport team, I paid an official visit to Glasgow some years ago. At Gushetfaulds freightliner terminal, we discovered that crates of bottles of Scottish whisky were not being exported through the great natural highway of the River Clyde but were being put aboard freightliner trains, sent to south-east England and shipped out from Felixstowe. That is the result of a lack of strategic planning.

It will not have escaped the Secretary of State's attention that the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company has introduced a private Bill with a view to extending its facilities. I want it to be understood clearly by all concerned that we shall vigorously oppose that Bill because of the damage that it will do to other port facilities, especially to the port of Ipswich, which I shall visit tomorrow with my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch). We shall discuss that matter with the work force and the port managers.

Britain's ports are in decline. There are now 87 per cent. fewer registered dock workers than there were 12 years ago. The redundancies have been accelerated by the Government, under whom there are more than 12,000 fewer registered dock workers—a decline of nearly 50 per cent. Investment has also declined by the same proportion. Government policy is to leave the development of ports to the market place, with no assessment of the needs of the country.

The fortunes of British ports are tied closely to the patterns of foreign trade, and they have shared a fate similar to that of the merchant shipping industry in the past 20 years. The pattern of development of ports has also been closely connected with the demands of shipowners, dock companies and the users. The Government believe that ports ought to develop according to the demands of the market place, and they have removed powers to control port development from the statute book. That was done primarily to ensure that they did not have to make a decision on whether to allow Falmouth's container port to develop.

It is nonsense to say that ports can develop without any implications for the Government. Southampton has all the facilities of a port, including the benefits of past Government investment in developing the road network to cope with the traffic. Falmouth, however, is developing without the necessary infrastructure having been built. If developments at Falmouth go ahead, it will not be long before the industry and port users demand new and expensive roads and railheads to the terminal.

Ports are vital to the British economy and involve millions of pounds of public money. There should be sensible planning and proper use of resources. The history of British port development in the past 20 years is one of poor planning, uneven development and decline in traditional port areas.

Another sign of the decline in ports traffic comes from the figures of tonnage that has gone through British ports in the past 20 years. Traffic has increased, but the increase in oil traffic accounts for most of it. The development of North sea oil has meant an increase in the overall oil traffic through ports and a turnround from petroleum imports outweighing exports to exports outweighing imports.

The figures disguise what has happened to the distribution of traffic. There has been a substantial loss of trade on the west coast of Britain, especialy in south Wales, on the Mersey and on the Clyde and a concomitant gain on the east coast and in channel ports. The increasing use of container or railway traffic is likely to continue. That will probably mean a further increase in spare capacity in British ports, and further redundancies and loss of port investment.

The Government's policy towards ports has been counter-productive. They have often sided against the unions on the operation of the national dock labour scheme, ducked out of crucial decisions on port development by removing legislative controls, abolished the National Ports Council and privatised Government-owned ports.

Mr. Ridley: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stott: The Secretary of State says, "Hear, hear," but the Public Accounts Committee criticised the Government for under-pricing Associated British Ports when it was privatised.

Britain's ports are suffering from the problems of excess capacity, financial instability, fragmented control and insecurity among the work force. For the sake of our ports, we should have a rational policy. We must assess the needs and invest in the appropriate ports accordingly. Rather than shirk their responsibilities, the Government should be engaged in rational planning which maximises the potential of the ports and does not force the Government into unnecessary infrastructure costs around new ports.

The Labour party will develop its policy and continue to insist on the establishment of a national ports authority. We believe that that is essential for the control of our major ports. The Government have taken a laissez-faire attitude to the problems of the port industry and dissolved the body — the National Ports Council — which took a central view about how our ports should develop. When we return to office we shall reconstitute the National Ports Council and bring some order to the chaos that the Government have brought to our industry.

We shall not quarrel with the Secretary of State about providing more money for the severance scheme, but the repeal of section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964 is a further example of his inhabiting the planets of lunacy. That step will not help the British ports industry but increase uncertainty and ensure that ports develop haphazardly. It will also turn the ratchet once more against the west coast ports and in favour of south coast ports. We know what redundancies and problems will result from that. We might return to this matter in Committee.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Despite my natural reluctance to welcome a Bill which increases public spending and subsidises an industry, knowing all the distortions that such subsidy creates, I welcome the measure as part of the long process of bringing a sense of reality to many of the country's ports.

Despite the 1950s style of maundering and harking back to the golden age when everything was under the control of the Secretary of State offered by the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), it is worth considering why some of the Bill's provisions are necessary. They are necessary because the dock labour scheme, as amplified by the Jones-Aldington agreements, created an aristocracy in the ports. As is always the case, the only peaceful way to get rid of an aristocracy is to buy it out. It is not easy to buy out an entrenched aristocracy.

On the current problems of the port of Bristol, that city's Evening Post reported as follows on 18 April:

"manpower cutting plans are being held up by a wrangle between management and the Transport and General Workers Union . . . port bosses find they have no work for two electrician labourers and want the jobs declared redundant. The union is insisting the previously agreed manning scales should be met and the posts filled."

In other words, the attitude in the ports is that it does not matter that they have no work or that providing labour increases the cost of the port and therefore continues its decline, the posts must be filled.

In most ports, only the taxpayer funds the costs of removing the aristocracy created by the dock labour scheme. In Bristol, however, the same taxpayer pays twice, for it is the only major municipally owned port in Britain, and all the losses of the Bristol port fall on the ratepayer. Thus, the ratepayer in Bristol, as a result of the dock labour scheme, pays not only for the local losses but contributes his share, as a taxpayer, to the losses of all the scheme ports in the country. What the Opposition principally resent about the non-scheme ports is that they are not dependent upon the state because, in most cases, they are making a profit.

I listened with interest, though with an air of disbelief, to the comments of the Secretary of State when he attempted to answer what might have been an examination question, "Compare and contrast London and Liverpool ports with all other ports in this country." It is a major difference not only that the ports of London and Liverpool are covered by the National Dock Labour Board, as dealt with the clause 1, but that they need special provision because that funding is provided not just for the voluntary severance of registered dock workers, but for the voluntary severance of non-registered dock workers.

Such a policy, while it continues, cannot but cause resentment, not only among non-registered dock workers, in particular in the port of Bristol, but among the ratepayers of Bristol, who find themselves contributing twice to the severance pay of non-registered dock workers.

In addition, considerable resentment is created by the London and Liverpool schemes as between registered and non-registered dock workers in the port of Bristol because, again, the setting up of an aristocracy by the dock labour scheme has meant that some dock workers are more equal than others.

It is generally accepted that the drip feed into the Treasury, which the special schemes for London and Liverpool comprise, must continue, but I want a more specific assurance than the Secretary of State gave about when, and in what manner, the drip feed will end. It has gone on for a considerable time. We, who as ratepayers pay for the non-drip-fed ports, are entitled to an assurance that sooner or later the drip will be cut off.

I welcome the aspects of deregulation in clauses 3 to 6. Can anyone, even the hon. Member for Wigan, seriously maintain that it is a necessary factor in modern port operation that the Minister should be entitled to name the auditors for the port? If so, I shall willingly give way to enable the hon. Gentleman to explain why ports alone are incapable of choosing their own auditors.

Similarly, given that it is the policy of the Government that ports should look more to private finance—in the case of Bristol that is unfortunately the local ratepayer; in many other ports private finance is obtained, and Bristol is moving in that direction—it is nonsense that an additional borrowing constraint should be placed on ports, unlike other industries. We are not talking about public sector borrowing controls. We are talking of an additional constraint as if investment in a port did not require borrowing. Because of that, according to Labour Members, it should be made more difficult for them to obtain it.

I shall not repeat what was said in the debate on 19 June 1984 in relation to section 9 of the Harbours Act. The remarks of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) that night and those of Labour Members tonight were, as I said in the June debate, the language of Stalinism and the language of Mussolini-type Fascism. All other commercial entities can make commercial decisions, but in the ports alone commercial decisions must be at the behest of the Minister.

Mr. Stott: The hon. Gentleman must not be allowed to get away with accusing the Opposition of being in any way, shape or form related to Mussolini-type Fascism. I greatly resent his remark and I hope that he will have the decency to withdraw it.

Mr. Stern: I shall certainly not withdraw it, because the policy of the Opposition, as related to the House tonight, and as related in June 1984, is indistinguishable from the state-operated control of major industries that occurred in Italy in the 1930s. I am not accusing Opposition Members of advocating other aspects of Fascist policy. I am only saying that in this area their policy is indistinguishable from it.

Mr. Stott: The hon. Gentleman has not satisfied me. Nor do I think that he has satisfied my hon. Friends. We want that section of the Act to be retained because we believe that it is in the national interest that ports policy should be controlled. The hon. Gentleman suggests that, simply because we hold that view, in some way we subscribe to the views of Mussolini and the Fascist dictatorship in Italy in the 1930s. Many of my hon. Friends fought against Fascism in the second world war and we greatly resent remarks made in the House suggesting support on our part for Fascism. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will now have the decency to withdraw the remark.

Mr. Stern: The hon. Gentleman continues to refuse to listen to what I am saying. I repeat that the policy of the Opposition to ports is identical to the policy that was adopted towards major industries by Mussolini. I could, if the hon. Gentleman wished me to do so, draw other parallels, for example with the economic policy of the Roman empire as it was applied to certain outlying states. [Interruption.] I am sorry if Labour Members resent that parallel too and choose to draw one that goes far further than was inherent in anything that I said.

On the subject of the revocation of the order in relation to the Act, I agree with the hon. Member for Wigan on a point that was raised in the debate on 19 June. I seek, as he sought, an assurance from the Minister which has so far not been forthcoming. Unlike Opposition Members, if business men feel that there is profit to be made and employment to be created from the development of a new port, my attitude is to tell them to go ahead. It is no concern of mine. However, if, as the result of that development, the Minister finds it necessary to seek additional expenditure on the infrastructure surrounding that port, then, like Opposition Members, I, representing the ratepayers of the city of Bristol, who already pay heavily through their rates for one port, strongly resent my constituents being asked to pay to support an opposing port. I hope that the Minister will give the House an assurance that in any port development in future expenditure on the infrastructure will be entirely out of the pockets of the developers of the port.

Against normal principles, I welcome the Bill. It is part of a process that has perhaps gone on too long but, nevertheless, once started in 1946 by the introduction of the dock labour scheme, and all the problems that it generated, the process must be brought to a conclusion. I share the hope expressed by my right hon. Friend that the process can be brought to a conclusion as quickly as possible.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) except to point out that his knowledge of port is probably of port out of a bottle rather than ports such as we are talking about in the debate.

The hon. Member referred to the national dock labour scheme that was established by Ernie Bevin in 1946. The hon. Member and the House should understand that it is the very processes that followed the establishment of that scheme that we are debating today. The Secretary of State has never made any secret of his abhorrence of the national dock labour scheme. If he had been around at the time and had had his way he would probably have strangled it at birth. Fortunately for many people, he was not around then.

The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West referred to the privilege—I think that was the word he used—of registered dock workers. In the period that the hon. Member was talking about, there were 16,000 registered dock workers working in the port of Liverpool on a system of casualisation. They went to the docks three, four or five times a week to seek work. They had to stand on stands, being treated worse than animals, to be selected for work at the whim of the ship's boss. That period is a blot on British industrial relations. The hon. Member should recognise that casualisation and hyper-exploitation through the pen system of hiring ended long since and that we do not want to see that system again.

When we consider what the Secretary of State wants to do in this Bill, we have to ask if we are moving back to that state of affairs. In spite of what has been said from the Government Front Bench, it has been the clear intention of the Government and the Secretary of State to abolish the national dock labour scheme. They knew that if there had been a blatant and direct attempt to do so in the past it would have resulted in prolonged industrial disputes in the docks. Therefore, the Government decided that the non-scheme ports should be developed. That is why we have in this Bill the amendment to section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964. That means that through control — the word "control" should be seen in its proper context as planning control — non-scheme ports should be efficient and should be spread around the United Kingdom in accordance with trade in and out of the ports.

Mr. Stern rose——

Mr. Loyden: It has to be recognised that the modernisation of the ports following the Devlin report in 1967 resulted in a transformation of the national dock labour scheme. As I said, it has been the clear intention of the Government to abolish that scheme.

I was surprised that hon. Members in interventions this evening suggested that Liverpool and London were being treated better than the rest of the ports. Since the money that is to go to Liverpool and London is for buying off more jobs, I wonder what those hon. Members meant. With the Isle of Man ferry company leaving Liverpool after more than 150 years, the dock company will be obliged to go to the National Dock Labour Board to report a further surplus in requirements for registered dock workers. In that sense the Secretary of State is enabling the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company to destroy more jobs in Liverpool through redundancy payments.

The House is well aware that that area already has one of the highest unemployment rates in the United Kingdom. We do not welcome the Secretary of State's action, nor will registered dock workers welcome the fact that further money will be made available for redundancies. At the end of the day, they may be compelled by the nature of the industry to accept it, but there will be resistance for a further reduction in the registered dock labour force in Liverpool. In the 1950s that force stood at 15,000; by the 1970s it was down to 7,000, and now it is less than 2,000.

It is not just the port industry that has been affected by that downward spiral. The whole hinterland of Merseyside has been affected because industries and commerce were linked to the port economy. The Government must consider seriously the effect that the reduction in the dock labour force has had not just on the port, with seven miles of docks closed, but on the community that lives adjacent to the docks. With the exception of the development of the Albert dock and other places at the south end, those communities have been left with the obsolescence and problems that empty docks create.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): Could the hon. Member develop more fully the point he is making and bring out for me what he believes will be the help to Liverpool in competing for trade if it has to carry large numbers of dockers for whom it has no work? Does he think that will help Liverpool to get more trade or will it do the reverse—hasten the loss of trade, which neither he nor I would wish to see?

Mr. Loyden: I shall give the Minister an example of how it would not help Liverpool. Two or three months ago, Saex moved from Southampton to Merseyside. For the purpose of this debate, the reasons are irrelevant. Liverpool was struggling to cope with the additional trade. Is it not fair comment that a continuing reduction in the number of registered dock workers in the port of Liverpool will limit its possibilities of attracting trade? If the Government are intent upon reducing the number of registered dock workers in Liverpool, London and elsewhere, they are minimising the possibility of those ports ever attracting more trade. There will be no question of further recruitment in the event of trade going to those ports.

In that sense Saex is a perfect example of how the port of Liverpool is restricted in developing further opportunties for trade. It could cope with the Saex trade only with great difficulty. Had there been a further reduction in the work force it would not have been able, in my view and in the view of the registered dock workers, to cope with that increase in trade.

Therefore, such scheme ports face a clear impediment in that situation.

That discloses the real intention behind the Bill. The non-scheme ports are now being given virtually unlimited powers to carry out the functions of the scheme ports, which can be done, because of the finite nature of the trade, only at the expense of the scheme ports. The scheme ports happen to be in areas of very high unemployment. The north-south syndrome comes into the argument again.

Through those powers and many other things, the ports' functions are being restricted. I worked in the port of Liverpool for 28 years and claim, for that reason, to know something about the port transport industry. If I do not, after 28 years, there must be something radically wrong with me. I have seen the development of the ports from the early post-war years in 1946 up to the present day. I have seen the effects of the lack of investment in the scheme ports over the years, which were run by shipowners in the interests of shipowners. They were both the landlord and tenant of the ports because they were sitting on the board of the dock company, and the shipowners and merchant princes used the ports as tenants. Therefore, they regulated the costs of the ports in accordance with their own whims, which meant that they were kept at a low level. There were startling revelations in the 1960s, when 12s 6d was still being charged for the hire of a crane. That shows the way in which the ports were run by those people. It had nothing to do with the so-called elitist registered dock workers. The misery and hyper-exploitation of that pre-war period should not return.

In view of what the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State have said now and on previous occasions, I wonder what the answer would be if Liverpool were to win trade and could not meet it because of the manning levels—the number of registered dock workers in the port. One answer is to go to casual labour in the ports and docks. Therefore, we may not have seen the end of casualisation. I am very concerned about the possible effects that this limitation will have on the ports of Liverpool and London and, indeed ports in Scotland and the north-east.

During the debate on what became the Dock Work Regulation Act 1976, the Secretary of State made it clear that he wanted to see the end of the national dock labour scheme. The industry may now be drifting back, at least in the scheme ports, to a form of casualisation if the required numbers are not met by the number of RDWs employed.

That is the Government's clear intention, and it is underpinned by the decisions taken by the Secretary of State to enhance the non-scheme ports. As he sees it, and as the Government probably see it, the scheme ports will wither on the vine if the jobs there are brought off and restrictions are placed on their capability of taking on further work and bringing further trade into the ports. The obvious consequence is that the non-scheme ports will flourish and the scheme ports will die away. There is sufficient evidence that we have already gone a long way along that road.

Mr. David Mitchell: If the hon. Gentleman believes that scheme ports will wither on the vine as the non-scheme ports gain their trade, what solution does he offer? If the non-scheme port is more economic and able to attract custom, in his scheme of things how would he put right the withering on the vine of the scheme port?

Mr. Loyden: I think that I have made a sufficient contribution to that argument. I thought that the Minister would now understand the situation. There has been an act of deliberate policy on the part of those controlling the scheme ports to see that the investment does not go there. That has nothing to do with the scheme ports as such. The non-scheme ports have developed without a history in the docks industry. It is the clear intention of the Secretary of State and the Government to use the clean slate of the new complexes in the non-scheme ports as a way of breaking down the national dock labour scheme and the tremendous efforts put in by the registered dock workers to establish a decent standard of living for themselves and their families and decent conditions in the docks where they work.

I see the Bill as taking us much further along that road. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) paved the way in the debate in exposing the Government's intentions for the national dock labour scheme. It has nothing to do with Liverpool or London having more money. That money will be provided to reduce the number of jobs in Merseyside, an area of high unemployment, and the port of London.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I come to the debate, not as the Liberal party's spokesman on transport, but, as is fairly self-evident, as someone who has inherited a constituency the name of which is most associated with the docks and the port industry of the past. The Minister will know that the vast bulk of the constituents who are mine today in Southwark and Bermondsey are people whose families earned their living and made their way because of the success of the port that was London.

Let me reflect briefly over the 33 years of my life. I was born in the last days of the second post-war Labour Government, when the scheme ports were very much places where activity was concentrated and planned and we sought to make sure that we retained our place in the markets of the world, with ports guaranteed to provide those facilities. I jump ahead to a date when the figures are nicely rounded. In 1966, 25,000 dock workers were registered in London. Today's figure has been given to the Minister: it is about 4,000. Of course, the port has moved downstream from the docks on my side of the river—the Surrey docks in Bermondsey—to Tilbury and so on.

I should like to ask the Minister a couple of questions which the Bill does not answer. I welcome the ability of the scheme to pay for people who do not have work and for those who wish to take voluntary redundancy. That is right if people want to move out of the industry. It is better that they should have money to go in search of work elsewhere. The financing has needed to be upgraded on a regular basis. This is the fourth occasion since 1979 when the Government have come to the House with proposals for increasing the financing for ports. That is right, and I do not object to it. Therefore, clauses 1 and 2 are unexceptionable.

However, what begs the question is what the Minister failed to say in answer to questions that were asked earlier. It has been accepted that trade has moved over to the east and south coast ports. The pattern between the established ports and the new ports has been that ports such as Felixstowe have become effective and important contributors, while we have retained our old ports and sought to make sure that, inasmuch as they can compete for trade and hold it, they are able to do so. Merseyside and Liverpool are those two ports par excellence.

London is an east coast port. It is the capital city. There will always be a need for a decent port facility on the Thames. There is a great demand for goods to be brought to London, whether in containers to Tilbury and then by road on the M25 or elsewhere, or broken down at Tilbury and brought upstream and unloaded for servicing London. What concerns me is that in the contribution of the Secretary of State there was no projection of the need for grant or labour in London.

I obviously have a vested interest and wish to address my remarks primarily to that issue. What is the Government's projection of the future need in terms of labour and trade for the port of London? If the Government are saying that they will leave it to the market place, it could be—I do not say that it will be—that the port of London, to use the phrase of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden), will wither on the vine. It is a ludicrous proposition, when we are competing with Rotterdam, Antwerp and the major entry ports of our neighbours and allies in commerce in Europe, to think that our capital city, which has good port facilities, might not be able to have a planned development which retains its importance, given the facilities which it has historically inherited.

I hope that the Government do not believe that we can apply at some early time in the future the principle of the magic of the market place when we start, not from here, but from the fact that this inbuilt infrastructure of the ports exists with the potential for the port of London to be efficient, effective and important as part of the port network throughout the United Kingdom. This could be done without any detriment to potential competing demands for ports elsewhere.

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

First, what is the Government's plan for the port of London? All that the Bill does is to provide money to pay off those who will not have work. We need to ensure that there is a positive and not just a negative side to the coin of paying off what would be a reduced labour force.

Secondly, there have been consultations. The Minister, following the public inquiry last year into the rates imposed by the PLA on private operators on the Thames, will be aware of the decision to retain, but to reduce, rates. There is a new private sector in the Thames, the wharfingers. They can play an important, and I believe increasing, part in the prosperity of the lower river and of the upper port. My constituency and the Government's plans, through the urban development corporation, envisage such developments.

If, at some stage, the Government plan to take away the rates which the PLA charges, which effectively subsidise its commercial undertaking—that is, to take from the private wharf owners to subsidise the PLA—can they guarantee that that will not be done simply on a commercial basis if that would act to the detriment of the PLA's finances? Will the phasing out procedures envisaged as a result of the inspector's report and the Secretary of State's response take into account on the one hand the need to reduce the burden on the wharfingers and on the other the need to ensure that an unmanageable burden is not imposed on the PLA?

My last point relates to the planning of our ports policy. The pattern of events seems to show that there is some potential for developing new ports round Britain. However, it seems that there is also great potential—the case has been argued in many erudite reports — for ensuring that the river which comes up to London and services London is better used for commerce than it has been hither to. I do not expect the Minister, in the context of the Bill, to accept that it would be right to make such a provision, but it would be reassuring to know that the Government take seriously the interest which I believe the Docklands Corporation has shown in trying to maximise the commercial use of the Thames as an adjunct to, support for and extension of the existing dock and port facilities of London.

There is enormous potential, possibly for different sorts of trade. The technological revolution means that things have moved on. I hope that the Minister can say something encouraging about what he and his Department are doing, and are prepared to do, to ensure that the port of London and the PLA, which is responsible for the two different parts of the river, can—without detriment to anybody else's commercial success against other competitors—maximise London's unique potential for trade. That is why in the first place the port of London was the subject of a scheme, with all the infrastructure and planning and regulations that were established.

I do not propose to oppose the Bill. However, we look for more than merely financial temporary measures, which in my view is what the Bill is accepted to be. We look for something that will inject health, and not just money to pay off people. We look for more than the statement that the magic of the market place must rule irrespective of the interests of the port of London. I hope and believe that the Minister can be more reassuring, but I have yet to hear it.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston): I fully support and endorse all that my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) said about the intentions of the Government towards a national dock labour scheme and registered ports. I think that I need not elaborate on what he said.

I wish to bring to the notice of the House the serious situation in the Clyde port authority. If no action is taken soon by the Government, there will not be a Clyde port in the true meaning of the term, and the authority will be reduced to carrying out the role of a conservancy agency. It is inconceivable to think of the Clyde without any port at all. The indications are already there because the former Queen's dock is now the site of the new Scottish exhibition centre, and the former Prince's dock is now the site of the 1988 international garden festival. Welcome as these new ventures are, there is no shortage of alternative sites for them. It would be preferable if the docks had continued to work as a part of a busy port, as was the case not long ago.

Since its inception in 1966, the Clyde port authority has been a fairly profitable operation, but since 1980 it has made steady losses each year, and the total work force has been reduced from 2,000 to 500—a redundancy level of 75 per cent. in the short span of four years. The workers have not benefited from some of the enhanced payments proposed in the Bill.

In addition, to the best of my knowledge, the Clyde port authority never received any special grants or aid from the Government, and it has been forced to sell off many of its assets, such as land, in order to meet its day-to-day operating costs. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will give detailed facts and figures relating to activities on the River Clyde. In my brief remarks, therefore, I shall confine myself to some general issues of concern not only to Glasgow but to west central Scotland as a whole.

For the benefit of hon. Members who are unfamiliar with the Clyde, the port is like a stack of dominoes. There is the Hunterston ore terminal, Greenock container dock, Ardrossan harbour company and Meadowside granary. Take one away, and they will all eventually come tumbling down. Yet each and every one of them is at risk at present. The key domino to the future of the port is the Hunterston ore terminal. That terminal is crucial to the future of the port, yet its very existence hangs by a thread. That thread is the continuation of the Ravenscraig steelworks at Motherwell. Without Ravenscraig there would be no need for the Hunterston ore terminal, and without that terminal there would be no Clyde port at all.

I hope that the Secretary of State for Scotland, who is one of the Bill's supporters, will take steps to ensure the continuation of Ravenscraig, and so guarantee the future of the Hunterston terminal, thus making the provisions of the Bill unnecessary, at least for Hunterston. The Greenock container terminal has only one container firm remaining there. I hope that the Secretary of State will do all that he can to keep it there. In addition, the Ardrossan harbour sea wall needs repair.

I mention these points because the Clyde port authority cannot afford from its own resources to make concessions to container operators or to invest in the necessary new infrastructure and equipment that would make it a modern, competitive port. It is unable to do that, because it has never received the assistance that other ports have received. Indeed, I hope that the Minister will bear that in mind.

The Meadowside granary in Glasgow is the second largest in Europe, with a capacity of well over 100,000 tonnes; yet it is lucky if, at any time, there are 10,000 tonnes of grain in it. It is operating at only a fraction of its capacity. All that could be changed substantially for the better. I understand that recently the EEC intervention board visited it regarding the possibility of storing EEC intervention grain there. If that is to be done, improvements will need to be made to the loading facilities. Will the Minister give an assurance that he will do all that he can to get that grain into Meadowside? Will he tell us what the prospects are for any shipments of intervention grain going to the Clyde this year?

I am glad that earlier, in response to my intervention, the Secretary of State confirmed that all dockers covered by the national voluntary service scheme, regardless of location, will receive the same treatment and that the sum will be £25,000 per person. I understand that until a week or two ago the figure for Glasgow was £16,000, but that happily there were no takers. Will the right hon. Gentleman again confirm that the figure for Glasgow workers will be £25,000?

Dredging on the River Clyde costs the port authority about £1·5 million per annum, yet there is no statutory obligation on it to carry out that work. If it has to stop doing it because of its desperate financial position, what will happen to the shipbuilding industry on the upper Clyde? What future will there be for Govan Shipbuilders and for the newly-privatised Yarrows yard in Scotstoun? Severance schemes, even at an enhanced rate, are not the answer to such problems.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) referred to the speech made in the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden, (Mr. Dewar) in March 1983. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow will confirm that we take no pleasure in informing the House that the situation on the Clyde is much worse than it was only two years ago. One reason why the Clyde is experiencing such difficulties is that the traffic is diminishing. In recent times 75 per cent. of our trade has been with South America. We are concerned about the need to bring more business to the Clyde. Will the Minister give an assurance that he will do all that he can to attract new business to the Clyde and to build on the South American connection, whether or not it is to the Government's political liking?

As Clydeside Members of Parliament, we expect some evidence from the Government that they are aware of the major problems confronting the largest port in the west of Scotland and of the imminent threat of closure. The Clyde has been treated inequitably compared with other ports. I am glad that the Secretary of State has returned to the Chamber, as he will no doubt recall meeting the delegation of workers from the Clyde, as well as my hon. Friends the Members for Garscadden, and for Greenock and Port Glasgow, my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and me on 26 April last year. We were asking for parity of treatment with Liverpool and London. We were asking not for any additional aid or concessions, but only for parity. Surely that is not too much to ask for.

I hope that the Secretary of State will make a positive response to the appeals that I have made on behalf of the Clyde port.

8.54 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I give the Bill a general welcome. It is good evidence——

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman has only just come into the Chamber.

Mr. Fallon: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to intervene other than from a sedentary position?

Dr. Godman: Perhaps I should apologise, but I was pointing out from a sedentary position that the hon. Gentleman has only just come into the Chamber.

Mr. Fallon: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was asleep earlier, but I was here for both the opening speeches. I then had to leave the Chamber for another engagement, but I have now returned. I hope that that satisfies the hon. Gentleman.

The Bill is good evidence that the transfer of ports from the Department of Trade and Industry was a good move. They are now covered by one of the more enterprising Departments. I only hope that one day the Department of Transport will complete the exercise by taking from the Treasury control of the freeports and encouraging the development of a second generation of freeports under the auspices of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State rather than under those of the Customs and Excise.

The Bill is about freeing our ports. I welcome all the dismantling of controls that it contains. If I have one small reservation about it, it involves clauses 1 and 2. What my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is doing is not unreasonable—he is a reasonable man—but the amounts of money involved are large, and he is taking a considerable power.

I wonder whether hon. Members are not entitled to a slightly clearer statement from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—I am not sure whether I have his attention at present—on the timetable that he hinted at. He spoke of the unique circumstances and the special difficulties. That might seem to be rather Department of Energy language to those of us who consider the various borrowing powers Bills that are presented to the House. But I put it no stronger than that.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that it was his intention that assistance generally should be phased out. I wonder whether we could be given a slightly clearer idea whether he envisages the clause 1 arrangements, in particular, having any sort of medium-term permanency. The difficulties that have arisen and that clauses 1 and 2 are intended to tackle arise in no small part not because of the absence of a scheme but because of the very generosity of the scheme and the enormous costs thus imposed. It seems to me that the scheme as a whole has quite clearly destroyed rather than protected them. The clearest evidence for that is the ports to which reference was made by the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) and his hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) — that is, Antwerp and Rotterdam. It is to those ports that we should look and that ports in this country hoping for commercial success should look.

Like the hon. Member for Newham, South, I paid a visit to the port of Rotterdam some three or four years ago and was enormously impressed by its efficiency. It may well be a different type of port from some that we have been considering tonight, and there is no doubt that it has very different working practices. It was made absolutely clear to me that no-strike agreements were at the heart of those working practices. Under his contract, an employee of the port of Rotterdam authority is not allowed to go on strike.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Member, by what he has just said, has obviously had more experience than I of the workings of the Rotterdam docks and industry and also the industrial relations that exist there. Can he tell the House whether there have been any industrial disputes since his last visit there three of four years ago?

Mr. Fallon: I cannot tell the House that, and I certainly do not claim great experience. I made a visit there, which lasted two days, as a guest of the port of Rotterdam authority. Strikes certainly did not seem to feature very high on their agenda, nor did they anticipate many in the future.

I would have hoped that in clauses 1 and 2 my hon. Friend would have laid as great stress on the need to modernise working practices and reform labour relations in the docks as he is quite evidently laying on the need for port employers to address their minds to the problem of restoring their finances.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I start by asking the Minister if, in winding up, he will elaborate on the observation made by his right hon. Friend during his comments on clauses 1 and 2 to the effect that soon the ports will have to shoulder their burden unaided. I ask that because I should like to know if the Government envisage phasing out the severance scheme. this was the fate, as the House will recall, of the British Shipbuilders' severance scheme and I wonder if the right hon. Gentleman is pointing us in the same direction.

Representing a port on the Clyde, I have a great deal of sympathy for the plight of the docks on Merseyside and in London. However, like my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall), I would remind the Secretary of State of the very serious economic circumstances of the ports not only on the Clyde, but on the Forth as well.

The deterioration suffered by Britain's maritime industries is nothing short of scandulous. Historical trends in maritime trade have pushed us in the direction that we have taken over the past 20 or 30 years, and some would say that those trends extend much further back. There has suddenly been a shift in maritime trade from the west of Britain ports to the east coast ports and much of this has been brought about by the growing importance of the short sea trade—the trade between those east coast ports and continental Europe.

There has also been over the past 20 or 30 years a disastrous, deeply worrying shift from Scottish to English ports, as outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan. Until he mentioned the Clyde, I was beginning to think that here again we were listening to a debate concerning the Government's policy for the English ports. There seems to be little or no ministerial concern for the plight of the Scottish ports.

There are understandable reasons which partly explain the decline in the Scottish ports. I am not talking here about Aberdeen or some of the other ports in the north-east of Scotland which have benefited dramatically from the development of the offshore gas and oil industries, but certainly other ports on the Forth and on the Clyde have suffered severely over the past 20 or more years.

Every day, Scottish goods are shifted to England by road and rail transport. Scottish cargo, including whisky, whether malt or blended—that is the best known cargo — knitwear, textiles, engineering products and goods produced by our burgeoning information technology industries, bypasses the ports on the Forth and Clyde and is shipped to places such as Felixstowe. That harms not only the Scottish ports on the Forth and Clyde but other industries in Scotland.

The only new cargo that has been offered to the Greenock container terminal in recent weeks has been the contaminated soil from the Faslane nuclear submarine base. An outlet had to be found for that soil so that the base could take the wasteful Trident programme. I am tempted to say that that soil should be shipped to English ports, but I am not that parochial or nationalistic.

The Government's ports policy may mean — if the Conservative Government survive this long, but recent signs are that they will not—that they will preside over the collapse and disappearance of most of the Scottish ports, and even Merseyside. What is the future of the ports on the Clyde and Forth? Will they eventually close? Will all or the major part of Scottish imports and exports pass through English ports? That has certainly been the trend during the past couple of decades.

Much of the coastal trade is carried on foreign vessels — in "foreign bottoms", according to the colloquial phrase. I believe that the state can play a major role in shaping developments in our maritime industries. Does the Secretary of State believe that the pattern of maritime trade that has evolved during the past two decades will remain as it is today, with an overwhelming emphasis on traffic moving through English ports?

I make a plea on behalf of the people employed by the Clyde port authorities—my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) also made this plea — and by the Forth ports authorities. Although it is essential that help should be given to Merseyside and London, the Secretary of State and his ministerial colleagues should not overlook the desperate plight of Scottish ports.

9.9 pm

Mr. William Powell (Corby): It is always a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) and to listen to him speak about Scottish affairs. I listened to him with considerable pleasure, bearing in mind that I represent more Scottish people than any other English Member of Parliament and, indeed, more Scottish people than many Scottish Members of Parliament.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful to the hon. Member for giving way. However, as someone who was born south of the border I have to correct what he said about the "little Scotland" in Corby.

Mr. Powell: I have no doubt whatsoever that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will have noted carefully the hon. Gentleman's observations on the future of Scottish ports. There are no more ingenious or inventive people than the Scots. They have gone to every corner of the earth and created prosperity there. I have little doubt that if the dead hand of state control were to be removed from their endeavours, Scotland would enjoy the prosperity which its people so richly deserve. Of course they will need help to create that prosperity—that is why many of the hon. Gentleman's observations were of such value—but help does not mean state control. Nothing is more likely to ensure that Scottish ports have no future whatsoever than to arrange, by our legislative mechanism, for the Secretary of State, Ministers and Whitehall, far away from Scotland, to have a decisive influence upon what happens there.

The reason I welcome the Bill so wholeheartedly is that it will reduce the level of Government and Whitehall interference and control. Liberalisation and deregulation will make a real contribution to the future prosperity of our ports. In making that observation, I am conscious that little has been said about Scottish ports in this debate. The most prosperous ports in our land are situated on the east coast and in the southern part of England. Only a few years ago, they barely existed. They have grown up because of the demand for the services they provide.

The hon. Gentleman referred to traffic being transferred from Scottish ports to Felixtowe. I have no doubt that both he and others will have asked themselves why Felixtowe has become such an attractive port to so many people. Geography is one factor. The hon. Gentleman is in the unfortunate position of representing a constituency in a part of the country which a century ago was ideal for the trade which passed through the ports on the west coast of Scotland and England. Because of the switch of international trade to Europe, those ports are now on the wrong side of the country. Those areas which, 100 years ago, were far from prosperous and endured periods of considerable depression and poverty are now the most prosperous in our land, while those areas which, 100 years ago, were the most prosperous now find that they are in the opposite position.

I am not one of those who believe that the state has no role to play. Far from it. The state has a role to play, but at best it is a regulatory role. State control is unhelpful and has led to the accelerated decline of ports whose prosperity was so evident only a generation ago. For that reason, the provisions in the early clauses of the Bill are very welcome.

My right hon. Friend has many matters on his desk. I welcome the fact that, despite his many other responsibilities, which take up a considerable part of his time, he has devoted part of his time to bringing before the House this measure which will make a real contribution to the future of our ports.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I was somewhat intrigued to hear the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) say that in his political ideology the state should have only a regulatory role. Corby has suffered more than most places from the decline of the steel industry. I have yet to hear the hon. Member criticise the substantial assistance which has properly been given to Corby by way of regional policy by both major parties after the ending of steel production. That is not a regulatory aspect of state activity. It is far more positive and against the spirit of one of the key clauses in the Bill.

This has been an unusual debate in that the Minister, who has the reputation in the House of being essentially a Treasury man parachuted into a spending Ministry, determined to reduce expenditure at all costs, and who has followed that to the full with the bus industry, now comes to the House without a blink of an apology with a Bill the key clause of which increases public financial assistance to two major ports by £140 million in an open-ended commitment. He knows that he loyally follows a number of predecessors, because the casualty rate of Secretaries of State for Transport has been high in this Parliament. He follows a number of his colleagues who have put forward schemes for subvention. He said, with his hand on his heart, effectively, "This is the last such subvention. We believe that the industry will be able to stand on its own feet after the process has been completed."

There has hardly been a whimper from those Conservative Members who normally are so alert about such public expenditure, save perhaps his hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) who made one or two sceptical noises earlier.

The hon. Member for Corby will no doubt have noted the removal of section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964 which relates to the control of harbour developments. That was debated at length in the House on 19 June last year. The Secretary of State supports the removal of that section his proposition that it is an anachronism in a competitive industry. The points made during the debate on the order in June last year are still valid.

I wholly support what my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) said about the lack of strategy in the port industry. That is in part reinforced by the removal of that section. Surely the Government cannot maintain that in all circumstances a project involving substantial capital investment in the ports can be viewed on its own merits without seeking to examine its effects on the industry as a whole.

The Government appear to be saying, "If people are prepared to risk their money, so be it. Let market forces predominate." Even this Government, despite the way in which they have dismantled much regional policy since they came to power in 1979, maintain a regional policy, because they believe that if the ports were left entirely to market forces there would be substantial dislocation, with adverse social effects.

The Government are depriving themselves of what admittedly is only a last stop, but nevertheless, a means of placing decisions on port location and port investment in a wider context. There will now be no opportunity to exercises a wider national control or to examine any port investment decision in a wider regional context.

An example is the viability of the new port project at Falmouth, which may now be in doubt. Not unexpectedly, the promoters are still saying that it is going ahead. They are still optimistic. Can it be said that the development at Falmouth has no relevance to the national interest, and that the Government can simply say that if private promoters are prepared to risk their money, so be it? Obviously, it must have an effect on other ports, especially at a time of over-capacity and when that intended investment is aimed at ocean-going container ships and piggy-backing the imports to other ports.

Obviously, the project will also have an effect on infrastructure within that region. It is not enough to say that the local planning authority — Cornwall county council — exercise sufficient control. It will want to attract as much private and public investment into its area as possible. But that investment has public investment implications. If the project goes ahead, it will no doubt be said that the road pattern to Falmouth is inadequate and there will be pressure for an increase in road spending. If that road spending is not sufficient, there will be pressure for increased rail investment and section 8 grants.

Therefore, one private investment without any Government supervision will not only have an effect on other ports within that area, but will trigger off a substantial amount of public investment. Can it be said that the Government, exercising the national interest as they would have done under section 9 of the 1964 Act, have no proper role in such an investment decision? I believe that that is wrong and that anyone looking objectively at a major investment location decision will surely conclude that Government should have a role in considering such an investment in a wider national context.

My second point relates to the additional £140 million to finance the severance pay at London and Liverpool. Will the Minister clarify his remark to me that there is no element of subsidy in that? He said that the explanatory memorandum was loosely drafted and he implied that it did not say what he had intended it to say. That memorandum states that the effect of clause 2 is to raise

"from £360 million to £500 million the ceiling on financial assistance" to those two ports

"by grants, loans, and guarantees for measures to reduce manpower in their ports and"— this is the key phrase—

"for supporting them while such measures are being taken."

I concede the Minister's point that the wording of the Bill is the key factor, not the explanatory memorandum. However, is he seriously saying that those words in the explanatory memorandum have no meaning? If they have a meaning, what is it? Can it be other than that there is a subsidy to those two ports and that they are therefore receiving a form of assistance that is denied to other ports and making them that much more competitive than other ports?

I remind the Minister that other scheme ports contribute finance, for example, for the servicing of debt, much of which is used for the purposes of those two ports. All registered ports have to pay a levy that is now roughly £1,000 per annum per man. I think that my arithmetic is correct. There are roughly 12,000 dock workers and the Secretary of State said that the cost of the scheme is £12 million per annum.

All the operators within the registered ports have the burden of financing severance, but some are more favoured than others, and this has regional implications. A port such as mine in Swansea suffers from the same problems, albeit not on the same scale, as the PLA and the Mersey ports. We too are subject to the effects of the same recession.

My port has been heavily dependent on the steel industry and there has been a major decline in the manufacturing base of south Wales. Queen's dock in my constituency is virtually dependent on British Petroleum. Within the past few weeks, that company has announced the closure of its refinery at Llandarcy in my constituency. This is bound to have an effect on the port because ports are a service industry. They reflect the pattern and volume of industry and the health of industries in their areas. The recession hits ports outside the two favoured ports just as much. They too will be affected by the same factors of over-capacity and the new technology of containerisation. I ask the Secretary of State to look carefully at this.

Have we not come to the point, in seeking to meet the problems of these two major ports, at which there can be adverse effects on the other ports, also in difficult parts of the country, that are suffering from the same factors, including the way that scheme ports are harmed by developments in unregistered wharves? These are developed alongside the scheme ports and have problems about safety. There are also concerns about the pensions available to the men and they are not burdened — properly burdened — with the obligations laid on the scheme ports.

Will the Secretary of State look carefully at the philosophy behind the Bill? Is it not going too far in the direction of favouring two ports at the expense of other ports, often in difficult regions and often facing the same problems?

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I apologise for not having been able to be present at the outset of the debate. I was detained upstairs in a meeting of the Select Committee on Procedure.

Any debate concerning ports is of interest to an hon. Member representing a Southampton constituency, and it is a pleasure for me to be able to rise in a debate on ports policy in a rather more hawkish frame of mind than I have on recent occasions.

There has been a great and welcome revival in the fortunes of the port of Southampton this year. That is due to good management, to a much better relationship with the work force and to an increase in realism, which has been sadly lacking in the past.

Last year, the troubles in the port resulted in a trading loss of £6·4 million. This year as a result of negotiations between management and work force, the total number employed in the port has been reduced from 2,400 to 1,400. That is sad, but in consequence there has been a 25 per cent. reduction in the rates offered to people wishing to use the port, most of the port's principal customers have returned, and business is booming.

On 29 March, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State made a speech at a lunch organised by the British Ports Association. It was reported in the Financial Times on 30 March. He referred to the fact that "British ports cost an average of 50 per cent. more for handling deepsea container cargoes than their Continental rivals", according to research by his Department. He said that this had raised the costs of imports, resulted in lost export orders, and increased unemployment. It was also disclosed that negotiations were taking place between the National Association of Port Employers and the Government over the cost of the national dock labour scheme. The employers had argued that if the Government continued to refuse to scrap the scheme, which makes compulsory redundancies difficult, they should bear the costs.

There is little evidence in the Bill that the burden placed on the scheme ports is being reduced to any significant extent. I welcome clause 1, which will give a £10 million subsidy to the national dock labour scheme. The clause will stop that burden falling upon employers in the scheme ports. However, compared with the additional subsidy of £140 million referred to in clause 2—I look forward to my hon. Friend's replies to the points made about that by the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson)—it is pretty small beer and goes no way towards dealing with the principal complaint of scheme port employers—that a levy of about 10 to 13 per cent. is added to their costs because they belong to the scheme and carry the enormous burdens that it places upon them.

The port employers' chairman, Mr. Donald Stringer, was quoted in the Financial Times as saying:

"It is one thing to know that we are to continue to be beaten but it adds insufferable insult to painful injury if we have to pay the cost of the beater and his overheads."

That feeling is shared by scheme port employers throughout the country and by those who work for them. The scheme adds to the costs of the ports and makes it more difficult for them to compete with other British and continental ports.

Many of the problems that the Bill seeks to address have been caused by the national dock labour scheme. I do not call for the abolition of that scheme, but it is clear that it is expensive, inflexible, outdated, and in need of major reform, if not abolition. The Bill does not deal with that problem.

The purpose of the scheme was to secure stability of employment for dock workers, and the creation and maintenance of a permanent labour force of a size and composition appropriate for the efficient performance of dock work. In 1955, there were 81,000 registered dock workers. Today, there are 13,000. The scheme has failed to maintain the size of the labour force. It has also failed to provide a work force of a composition appropriate for the efficient performance of dock work.

Today, I received from the National Dock Labour Board figures for the numbers of people employed and the age groups into which they fall. There are 12,822 dockers on the register. Only 50 are aged under 25, 349 are between 25 and 29 and 994 are between 30 and 34. A grand total of 1,391 are under 35. I calculate that figure to represent less than 11 per cent. of the total, whereas 44 per cent. of the generally employed population are under 35. That shows the extent of the problem for scheme ports. They have the continuing burden of an aging work force and potentially large severance costs.

Moreover, this restrictive scheme denies entry to younger people. A young person who lives near Felixstowe can join a thriving port, but it is a non-scheme port, so, when he is taken on, the employer does not have to think about the consequences of employing him. It is rather different for scheme ports.

The national dock labour scheme has failed to achieve its declared objectives, and there are other elements of it about which I am deeply suspicious. I asked whether there is a guaranteed minimum rate of pay for dock workers and how much it is. I was told that there is no set national figure, but that it is agreed by the local joint council at each port. That is significant for both London and Liverpool. To what extent will the joint councils in those ports respond to the cold wind of competition if they are given the enormous additional subsidy outlined in the Bill?

I also asked about privileges for dock workers' children and was told that preference is sometimes shown to sons on the waiting list, again subject to local agreements. As somebody who believes in equality of opportunity of employment, I raise an eyebrow at the likelihood of preferential treatment being given to those whose fathers are dock workers.

I also asked about surplus labour in the ports of London, Liverpool and Southampton. The most recent available figures are for the last quarter of 1984. The average was 179 for London, 104 for Liverpool and 465 in the special circumstances of Southampton. The burden of those 465 was borne solely by employers in Southampton, yet there is to be a subsidy to London and Liverpool. If they are subsidised, others will be disadvantaged.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East said that it is a pity that section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964 is to be repealed and he said that the Government should be involved in the control of harbour development. That was the attitude of the Transport and General Workers Union in Southampton last summer when I met one of its officials to discuss the threat from Falmouth. I told him that the best way in which to beat off that threat was to increase efficiency in Southampton. Yet he told me that there was no way in which he could increase efficiency in Southampton and reduce costs. I am glad to say that that official has been proved wrong by what has happened since. We have been able to be more efficient and to reduce our costs by 25 per cent.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East said that the Falmouth project may now be in jeopardy, but he must accept that one reason for that is that Southampton is now a thriving competitor. A prospective investor might not think it worthwhile to invest in Falmouth when he can see a well-established, thriving port just up the road in Southampton.

For those reasons, I welcome the Bill and, although I have reservations about it, I shall, if necessary, support it in the Lobby tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): We have had a useful and wide-ranging debate on the Bill and hon. Members in all parts of the House have made interesting contributions. Rather than repeat what my right hon. Friend said at the outset, I shall deal with the points that have been raised in the course of the debate.

The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) said that he was not proposing to divide the House, and I was glad to hear that. He has adopted a sensible approach, showing that on many issues we need not have strident division. In other words, there are areas in which there is agreement and about which there is no reason to create artificial disagreement.

As the hon. Gentleman went on to develop his speech, there was much with which I could not agree, and he will not be surprised to hear that. He referred to drastic reductions in manpower, particularly in Liverpool and the port of London, and he illustrated the decline of the ports industry. He claimed that it was all because the Government had no strategy.

I assure the House that the Government have a strategy. It is based on the recognition that, as a trading island, reliant for jobs in manufacturing and service industries on our ability to get goods in and out of the country at the minimum cost, we have an overwhelming national need to ensure that the disadvantages of being an island—in terms of our ability to compete, particularly in continental markets—are minimised. For that reason, we must have ports which are as cost-effective as possible, so enabling us to get goods in and out of the country effectively and efficiently, with the quick turnround of ships and the safe movement of cargo.

There are areas besides the handling of ships which impose costs and burdens on goods coming into and going out of the country. They include the cost of pilotage, a problem which the Government have sought to tackle in a recently published Green Paper, in connection with which we are consulting on major reforms in the archaic system which governs pilotage in this country. There is also the area of lights. A major report has just come into our hands on what we should do about the burden of lights, which are perhaps unfairly distributed as between one vessel and another.

Thus, for the hon. Member for Wigan to talk about our not having a strategy is wrong. Our strategy is designed to ensure that we do the best possible for the many people whose jobs depend upon our being competitive in international markets. That means cost-effective movements through our ports.

The hon. Gentleman gave his alternative strategy. He said that he wanted to see planning, and he demonstrated that, I thought helpfully, by describing the Scotch whisky trade. He said that instead of the whisky being loaded from Glasgow, it was sent to Felixstowe for export. That was a very good illustration of the divide in the House on these matters. We would say that that whisky should go by whatever means its owners found to be most competitive in selling it abroad. The hon. Gentleman thinks that it should go by a planned system which would ensure that it went out through the Clyde by ship. As it would probably be destined for somewhere on the continent, it would have to go round this island before reaching its port of destination. That would add so much to the cost of the whisky that orders would be lost. That would mean not only that there would be no jobs for people on the Clyde, but that people in the whisky trade would lose their jobs because their product was not competitive in the markets in which people were trying to sell it. That is the sort of madness that would come from the planned system which the hon. Gentleman seeks to visit on us.

Dr. Godman rose——

Mr. Mitchell: I shall cover the points made by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) if he will give me time.

The hon. Member for Wigan opposes the Felixstowe expansion scheme. It is not for me to comment on that today. He said that he would be visiting there tomorrow, and that he would also be visiting Ipswich. I hope that he will see the Transport and General Workers Union representatives in both ports, as I have done, and not just the union representatives in one of them, so that he can get the pure flavour of their views.

The hon. Gentleman went on to attack the possible development of Falmouth, on the grounds that it might justify investment in road construction and in railways. Those are odd grounds on which to attack the idea. I had thought that there were other reasons which he might have used.

I do not know whether Falmouth is the right place for a port to be developed. That is for potential investors and the management to form a judgement on. However, a major transformation is beginning in the movement of international container cargo. Huge vessels are going round the world with the minimum number of stops. They will make one stop in Europe. It may be—I do not know; it is for the investors to judge—that if there were a transhipment port somewhere on the south coast—perhaps Southampton, Falmouth or some other place—it would attract all of that transhipment trade. Therefore, the employment would come to this country rather than go to Le Havre or another European port with us being missed out. I urge the hon. Gentleman not to wear blinkers when considering the possibilities that are opened up by new investment.

The hon. Gentleman claimed that ports had been privatised at too low a price but in the same breath he said that there was a surplus of capacity. I cannot think of a better way of the hon. Gentleman shooting his argument in the foot.

The hon. Gentleman also said that a Labour Government would go for interventionist policies. He illustrated that by saying that the ending of Government control had led to the loss of jobs in west coast ports and consequential gains on the south coast and the east coast. It is not the Government's ending of controls, but rather the movement of trade, which has led to that. It is the fact that continental markets have been opened up. Our trade is increasingly into Europe. Therefore, it must follow logically that it takes the short sea route from the east coast direct to the continental ports. The hon. Gentleman is living in cloud-cuckoo-land if he believes that one can expect to be competitive by shipping cargo from the west coast of this country into continental ports. That would destroy the prospect of those goods ever being sold. They would become uncompetitive because of the burdens which the right hon. Gentleman would add by the cost of transport. Transport is a very important part of the cost of delivery of goods and of our being competitive in world markets.

I respect the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) for his intimate knowledge of the port of Liverpool. I believe I am right in saying that he worked in that port for just short of 30 years. He referred to the national dock labour scheme as having been founded by Ernest Bevin, that great man of my old union, the Transport and General Workers Union. Many have a great deal of respect for the hon. Gentleman's approach to trade union matters. He referred to the inequity of the former casual labour system, and I join him in his condemnation of it. When going around the ports I have met no one who would seek to bring it back. There are good Transport and General Workers Union members who work in non-scheme ports and who can demonstrate that one does not need to have a scheme to put an end to casualisation.

The hon. Gentleman said that, in his view, it was the clear intention of the Secretary of State to end the scheme. The Government have no plans to change or abolish the national dock labour scheme. However, I thought that the hon. Gentleman had a glimpse of reality when he said that we should plan ports so that they are spread around the country where the trade is. It is "where the trade is" that is the glimpse of reality. The problem is that the trade has moved from the west coast ports—from Glasgow, the Clyde, Liverpool and Manchester—to the east coast ports. The fact that one must have ports where the trade is provides the reason for the reduction in the amount of cargo going through the west coast ports.

The hon. Gentleman believes that if Liverpool won a large new service the port could not take it on because of the shortage of labour. Is it not ironic that at a time when there is so much unemployment in Merseyside, the hon. Gentleman, representing a Liverpool constituency, can get up and say that he believes that the port could not take on extra work if it were available? I do not take as unhappy a view, because my reading of the recent report of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company is that it could, and would, willingly seek to take on considerable extra work. Therefore, I do not take as despondent a view, though the hon. Gentleman does do so. If the company would not dare to take on a contract because of a lack of labour when so many people are unemployed, that shows that it is because people cannot be asked to leave that others are not being recruited. Potentially, that is preventing jobs being created.

The hon. Gentleman referred to scheme ports withering on the vine because the non-scheme ports are free from the penalties of history. We should all recognise, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) has recognised, and as the experience of the unfortunate major strike in Southampton last year illustrated, that when we are talking about the penalties of history and the penalties of restrictive practices that go with it, those are things that men and management can tackle if they are determined to do so. They can break through and shed the shackles of history so that they can complete successfully for trade, in the way that Southampton is now winning back trade which, for some time, it was thought it would never succeed in resecuring.

In an intervention in the speech by the hon. Member for Wigan, the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred to unfair competition from subsidised continental ports. I agree that there is an area that is unsatisfactory. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has recently given notice to one of the EEC Commissioners of our concern about state aids for port infrastructure. He is actively considering how we should pursue that matter in the European Community. It is linked with the area of shipping policy on which the Community is taking a new initiative and, more directly, with the treaty requirements concerning state aids. The hon. Gentleman was right to draw attention to it, and we are pursuing this at present.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) described the London area's need for goods, and he wants to maximise the commercial use of the river. He and I may have some glimpse of what it could be, and a great sense of loss of what it is not. Here in the capital city there is a huge requirement for an enormous amount of stuff that is imported into the country, yet it lands at Felixstowe on the east coast and is dragged all the way along our road system to London. The simple reason for that is that London is not competitive. If London would get its act together, it would be the natural place into which all those goods should come.

I trust that the hon. Gentleman would not wish, and I certainly would not wish, to impose a requirement on people to send their goods in through the estuary and through the Port of London Authority if that were not the most economic way of doing it. His constituents would not thank him if the cost of the commodities that they bought in the shops had a loaded 2p or 3p on each item to pay for the extra cost of moving goods in less than the most economic way.

I therefore have to say to the hon. Gentleman that, unlike the Opposition Front Bench, who seem to have learnt nothing, we have a vision. It is not a vision of directing cargo to go to one port or another because that is what the planners think is good for people, but a vision in which that port gets its act together to the point at which it is the most attractive place for goods to come. A great deal more cargo ought to be coming into London, because it is the natural place and has all these advantages, but this will never happen until it can become an efficient and attractive place into which people can bring their cargo.

We have been seeking to strengthen the board of the Port of London Authority. We have appointed new members to it, who bring with them a breadth of business experience. Recently we have appointed a new chairman, Sir Brian Kellett. I am confident that, when he has become embedded in his new job, considerable progress will be seen, in a way that we would both wish, in London receiving its proper share of the cargo that is available.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) exposed some of the petty conflicts in the port of Bristol. He and my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) are worried about the way in which the PLA and Merseyside are given special provisions and favoured by the Bill, as is my hon. Friend the Member for Itchen. They referred in particular to the generosity of the finance that is available on severance of non-registered dock workers. I understand their concern. We have announced today that we intend to phase out for these two ports the extra assistance for non-registered dock workers' severance costs. That is an important indication that we are moving in the way that my hon. Friends seek.

I was asked when the drip feed from the Treasury would come to an end. I can say only that there is no firm date, but we are moving perceptibly in the right direction.

My hon. Friend the Member for Itchen made a perceptive speech which I do not have time to cover in the depth that it warrants. Clause 1 is designed to move in the direction in which he seeks to go in beginning to mitigate the disadvantages of the burden of the scheme.

This is a small, useful Bill which I believe can do a little to help in a number of ways. It provides further funds to Merseyside and the Port of London Authority. It makes available limited resources to help scheme ports. It takes useful steps to reduce the burdens on trust ports, and finally formalises the end of section 9. I believe that it should be welcomed as a small step towards fairer competition in the ports industry. On that basis, I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

PORTS (FINANCE) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Ports (Finance) Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the payment out of moneys provided by Parliament of any sums required by the Secretary of State for making grants (not in the aggregate exceeding £40 million) to the National Dock Labour Board in respect of costs incurred by the Board for the purpose of reducing the number of registered dock workers; and

(b) any increase in the sums payable out of such moneys or into the Consolidated Fund which is attributable to increasing the limit in section 1(3) of the Ports (Financial Assistance) Act 1981 from £360 million to £500 million. [Mr. Durant.]

Foreign Limitation Periods (Northern Ireland)

9.59 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I beg to move,

That the draft Foreign Limitation Periods (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 2nd April, be approved.

The law in Northern Ireland, in common with that of other developed legal systems, contains limitation periods for the bringing of civil actions, so as to prevent stale claims. Actions in respect of contracts and debts, for example, must generally be brought within six years of the events which give rise to the action; actions in tort within six years, or three years in personal injury cases; and actions involving land within 12 years. The law of limitation in Northern Ireland corresponds to the law in England and Wales; the law of Scotland is distinct.

But it may happen that under the established rules of private international law — which have been evolved from the common law in relation to both England and Wales and Northern Ireland — a court in Northern Ireland is called upon to apply the law of a foreign country. I shall try to illustrate this with a simple example. A Northern Ireland importer agrees to buy goods from a French manufacturer under a contract governed by French law. A dispute arises in respect of the goods, and proceedings are instituted in Northern Ireland. The Northern Ireland court applies French law.

In such a case as the one that I have illustrated, the French limitation period may well appear to have relevance in the proceedings which are substantially governed by French law. But, in essence, under the present rule of private international law in Northern Ireland whether or not the Northern Ireland court applies a foreign limitation period depends in turn upon whether the court classifies the foreign limitation as a matter of substance or merely as a matter of procedure. If the court regards the limitation as a matter of substance, it will apply the foreign period; but if it regards the matter as merely one of procedure it will apply the Northern Ireland period.

The English Law Commission examined the rule in its report No. 114 and found it wanting. The rule was based on a highly technical and perhaps artificial distinction between matters of substance and procedure; it had created a number of anomalies; and it was inconsistent both with the private international law of many other countries and with the European Community Convention on the Law Applicable to Contractual Obligations.

The Law Commission's report was implemented, in relation to England and Wales, in the Foreign Limitation Periods Act 1984. The order does likewise in relation to Northern Ireland, thus ensuring that the private international law of Northern Ireland remains the same as that of England and Wales.

The essence of the Law Commission's recommendations, contained in article 3 of the order, is that, where under the established rules of private international law the substantive foreign law applies in a particular case, the rule of that same foreign law which relates to limitation should also be applied, rather than the Northern Ireland law of limitation.

Article 4 contains three exceptions to the rule, the most important of which concerns public policy. Where in a particular case the court determines that the application of the limitation period prescribed under the foreign law would be contrary to public policy, it may refrain from applying the foreign period.

The order is quite legally complex. I know that the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) is a lawyer and he will no doubt look upon it with a lawyer's eye. However, I am grateful for the support which the order received from the Northern Ireland Assembly, which considered it with the benefit of submissions from the Law Society of Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Chamber of Commerce and Industry. All of them supported this change. Thus, I commend the order to the House.

10.5 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in this debate. The Minister anticipated my enjoyment when he referred to the fact that I am a barrister. As a barrister I have looked very carefully at the order. I have also looked at the order very carefully as a legislator. The legislator must be eternally vigilant. The barrister must be vigilant too, but in the sense of protecting not the nation but his client, whether plaintiff or defendant.

As a barrister I have welcomed this stroll back in time through the doctrines of renvoi — quaintly called "tortuous reasoning" by a Member of the Northern Ireland Assembly. There are also in this order the rules of private international law, lex fori and lex causae—rules which are prosaic or exotic, esoteric or essential, depending upon whether one is a plaintiff or a defendant.

The realms of international law are not as complicated or as bureaucratic as those of the former Chancery—by which we are all being entertained in "Bleak House" on BBC Television. They may not be as expensive as libel actions brought against the BBC and the "That's Life" team, but they can be costly and lengthy all the same. The weaknesses brought to light in Great Britain by the Law Commission, while they may be rectified by the order, may in time reveal other weaknesses which will also have to be purged from the statute book.

Reverting briefly to the role of the legislator, I congratulate all those in the Northern Ireland Assembly who have scrutinised this order in accordance with section 3(2)(a) of the Northern Ireland Act 1982. They have rendered the House a signal service and in a sense done a great deal of work for us.

I read with some amusement the verbatim record of the evidence taken by members of the Finance and Personnel Committee on Thursday 11 October 1984 from witnesses well versed in the highways and byways of private international law who were from the Office of Law Reform. I can sympathise with the statement of the deputy chairman of the Committee, who admitted that there were some of his members whose knowledge of legal matters was somewhat elementary but who had no doubt been enlightened on the subject. It is to be hoped that some of our colleagues have been and will be enlightened by this short debate tonight and that more will be enlightened when they avidly read the pages of Hansard, which I am sure that many hon. Members do, certainly as they relate to debates on Northern Ireland. I am sure that that is how they stay in touch.

I note that the deputy chairman requested submissions from a whole host of authoritative bodies in Northern Ireland, included among which was the Irish Congress of Trade Unions. There is no evidence of a reply. I presume that they were preoccupied at the time with the future of the town gas industries — and no doubt we shall be getting round to a debate on that subject at another time in the House.

The Finance and Personnel Committee was thorough in its work and therefore, as I have said, rendered a signal service to the Northern Ireland Assembly as well as to Members of the House, and they should be congratulated on that. It highlights once again the importance of the Assembly and the useful work that it can do on behalf of the citizens of Northern Ireland even when dealing with an item of legislation as abstruse as the Foreign Limitation Periods (Northern Ireland) Order 1985.

The heart of the order, as the Minister has already indicated, is the new rule, already incorporated in legislation covering England and Wales. Mercifully we are not also discussing Scotland tonight. The rule states that where a foreign law falls to be applied in a Northern Ireland court the rule of that same foreign law which relates to the limitation should also be applied, and not the Northern Ireland law of limitation. It occurred to me immediately on reading that that it might cause damage to plaintiffs rather than assist them or cause benefits to accrue to them. For a plaintiff might be damaged in the pursuit of his claim if the limitation period in the foreign law were shorter than the limitation period in Northern Ireland. That may be a complex point and it may read better then the way I have put it. We must bear in mind that there are different and differing limitation periods throughout the EEC.

I was somewhat assuaged in my anxiety when I read the background paper by the Office of Law Reform on the draft Foreign Limitation Periods Order, which seemed to indicate that this difference had been taken care of by article 4(2) which provides that the application of foreign limitation periods

> "shall conflict with public policy to the extent that its application would cause undue hardship to . . . a party to the . . . proceedings."

The example of undue hardship that was given was one where the foreign limitation period was extremely long compared with the Northern Ireland limitation. In such a case, the court might take the view that it would cause undue hardship to a defendant to have the threat of an action hanging over him for an excessive period—the concept in law of the so-called stale claim.

Conversely—this is the point that originally exercised my mind—in different circumstances a court might take the view that a foreign limitation period that was excessively short caused undue hardship to a plaintiff.

All this is not, of course, in the order. It is an interpretation which a judge must make. He must decide the appropriate definition of hardship. I cannot ask the Minister to alter that tonight. I cannot ask that the English and Welsh law should be changed tonight. I cannot ask for the Law Commission to make a further reference back to the Chancellor, because that can be done only if the Chancellor wishes. This is the concept of functus officio. Unless the Lord Chancellor refers the matter back to the Law Commission for further and better particulars and advice, the Law Commission has no status. It will be left, therefore, to the enterprise of the Bar, to the skill of the barrister on behalf of his client, plaintiff or defendant, to drive that point home in the Irish court of law or in arbitration proceedings. It will be for the judges or the arbitrators to understand and take that on board.

With these fine legal points I have completed the circuit of private international law, statutes of limitations, lex fori, lex causae, renvoi and the draft Foreign Limitation Periods (Northern Ireland) Order. I therefore follow the Government in commending the order to the House.

10.12 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I first congratulate the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) on the substantial and tasty meal that he has made out of this order. It need be no secret from you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that throughout this afternoon and evening my hon. Friends and I have been anxiously approached by other hon. Members desirous of knowing the likely duration of the proceedings on this order and the order that is to follow and whether any events would require their presence. We have assured them—or, if they had spared the time to listen, we would have assured them — that it is not our fault that they are being troubled in this way, that we are on their side and that it is very much our contention that these are procedures with which the House should not be troubled; and that in the interest equally of Northern Ireland and the rest of the kingdom.

The Minister of State observed that the law of Northern Ireland in this respect corresponds with that of England and Wales. None of us would dream of saying that an alteration such as that which was made by the statute of last year in the law in England and Wales should not correspondingly apply in Northern Ireland. To that extent, we welcome the order. We have no intention of resisting its passage. We must take the opportunity to draw attention to the absurdity of the operation in which the House is engaged.

I have in my left hand the Foreign Limitation Periods Act 1984, applying to England and Wales, which was passed last year by the House, and in my right hand I have the Foreign Limitation Periods (Northern Ireland) Order 1985. I have examined them quite zealously and, except for the necessary references in the Act to England and Wales and in the order to Northern Ireland, they are to all intents and purposes identical—as, indeed, they ought to be. Therefore, the question naturally arises: why, when we enacted in 1984, did we not enact at the same time for that part of the United Kingdom in which the law on the subject is and ought to remain the same?

When we made observations upon that point, my hon. Friends and I used to be reminded of an imaginary thing called the statute book of Northern Ireland which had to be maintained in its pristine integrity. In order that it may retain that integrity, whatever is done in England and Wales that ought to be done in Northern Ireland has to be done separately for Northern Ireland by an Order in Council. However, in this case, as in many of the other examples that we have examined, that will not wash, for in article 4(4) we find a reference to something which will not be found upon any real or imaginary statute book of Northern Ireland, namely, the Limitation (Enemies and War Prisoners) Act 1945.

I consulted the statutes at large and ascertained that that Act applies to the whole of the United Kingdom. Therefore, the House is being troubled with an order so that the separateness of the code of law that applies to Northern Ireland may be maintained, yet this order is having to appeal to the text of an Act of the United Kingdom to which the same procedure was not applied —an Act of the United Kingdom, incidentally, that was passed when there was still a separate Parliament in Northern Ireland.

It would be wrong for my hon. Friends and I not to complain once again of the arrant and useless waste of effort and time that is involved in this sort of complication. It is a waste of skilled manpower. Drafting work is duplicated. It is also a waste of resources, of the time of the House and of the effort of all the officials who are concerned. It might be thought that this wasteful procedure is being maintained simply for the purpose of irritating hon. Members, including my hon. Friends and myself. It used to be argued, although the argument is wearing threadbare, that in order that Northern Ireland might drift off or be pushed off into another political connection there ought to be loaded on to it, as this House legislates, separate legislation for Northern Ireland. Then it could sail away with its code of law complete, not to mention the Limitation (Enemies and War Prisoners) Act 1945. For such causes is this House invited to do such absurd things.

Although the application of the Foreign Limitation Periods Act 1984 to Northern Ireland is necessary and right, it is a wasteful and stupid absurdity against which my hon. Friends and I are bound to protest. It is absurd that tonight the House is being troubled unnecessarily with what could have been accomplished equally well, sooner and more efficiently within the ambit of the 1984 Act.

Dr. Boyson: I have listened carefully to the points made by the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell). On his point as to whether the foreign limitation period is excessively long or excessively short, if the court decides that in the public interest it is excessively long or short, action can be taken under the law of Northern Ireland. I welcome the general comments of the hon. Member.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) expressed the view that he holds about this procedure. I am not being drawn into that argument this evening. I know the integrity with which he holds that view. He has expressed it on a number of occasions.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): I assure the Minister that all my hon. Friends—present and absent—share the views of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell).

Dr. Boyson: I welcome that intervention. I do not doubt that that is so. I referred to the right hon. Gentleman because only he had spoken. It would be difficult to refer to 635 people if all hon. Members agreed about something. I hope that on this occasion when there are only nine or 10 of us here we can agree to the order.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Foreign Limitation Periods (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 2nd April, be approved.

Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland)

10.20 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I beg to move,

That the draft Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 27th March, be approved.

One needs to be a quick change artist, Mr. Deputy Speaker, with the orders being brought forward as quickly as this.

The order deals with escapes of water from mains and pipes belonging to the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland, which is the sole water authority there. It would, except in certain circumstances, make the Department of the Environment strictly liable for loss or damage resulting from escapes of water onto agricultural or forestry land from a water main or service pipe belonging to the Department.

Until recent years, water authorities throughout the United Kingdom were liable to compensate only for loss or damage resulting from an escape of water caused by a water authority's negligence. Property owners, however, could insure against loss or damage caused by escapes of water from water mains, but it has always been extremely difficult, throughout the United Kingdom, to insure agricultural or forestry land against that.

Following many years of pressure from farming and land interests in England and Wales, section 6 was added in Committee in the House of Lords to what is now the Water Act 1981. It creates a liability, which is not confined to agricultural or forestry land, on English or Welsh water authorities for loss or damage caused by all escapes of water from water authority mains. That provision was included after a promise made on Report in this House.

As often happens when proposed legislation is amended at a late stage, the effect of the coverage given was not fully realised. Because of the breadth of cover provided, water authorities have found themselves having to pay large sums of money to persons who would, in the normal course of events, have no difficulty in obtaining insurance against the risks covered by the legislation.

In 1982-83, over £14 million was paid by water authorities in England and Wales. Of that, only £100,000 was for damage to agricultural and forestry land. In 1983-84, the figures were nearly £2 million and just over £80,000 respectively. The money went to people whose agricultural or forestry land had been damaged by water from burst water mains. The effect has therefore been that in each of those years less than 5 per cent. of the money paid has been going to the bodies whose difficulties originally raised the need for legislation.

In addition, it has been discovered that of the compensation paid probably as much as 80 per cent. is paid to insurance companies through injured parties, or direct. The beneficiaries of section 6 of the Water Act 1981 have therefore been insurance companies and the losers have been the payers of water rates.

Inquiries of those companies have revealed that the provision of legislative cover has had no effect on the premiums payable for damage caused by water. The vast majority of claims against insurance companies for water damage are as a result of burst pipes or overflowing systems within property or floods from rivers overflowing.

I repeat that it should be kept in mind that the cost of meeting these claims, as with all other costs, is in fact borne by the consumers either through the rate bill or by direct charges.

The Water Act 1981 did not extend to Scotland or Northern Ireland, but it was indicated in Parliament at that time that the law in those two countries would be changed in due course, although there has not been a lobby for it in Northern Ireland.

Scottish legislation was enacted in section 57 of the Local Government and Planning (Scotland) Act 1982. It was wisely more tightly drawn, and it confined its cover to those suffering loss or damage resulting from an escape of water on to agricultural or foresty land; that is, to those who could not normally obtain insurance cover.

In bringing foward the amendment to the Northern Ireland water legislation, we propose to follow the Scottish rather than the English path and to deal specifically with the problem which first gave rise to this legislation, that is, the uninsurability of agricultual and forestry land against water damage risk.

The draft order was considered by the Environment Committee of the Northern Ireland Assembly and was debated in the Assembly. The report of the Assembly recommending no change to the proposal was laid before this House on 19 December 1984, and all of us will have seen that report.

Prior to the laying of the order before this House, a number of Northern Ireland hon. Members made representations to my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) to follow the English rather than the Scottish legislation. Among the 30 non-governmental bodies consulted on the legislation, only one made that representation. I can well understand why hon. Members made that representation. They were desirous that the law in Northern Ireland should be the same as that in England. It will be the same as that in Scotland—a country which has had close links with Northern Ireland. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, the Minister with responsibility for the environment in Northern Ireland, has communicated with my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction, who has agreed to consider whether there should be a change in the English and Welsh law on the lines of the Scottish law.

I stress that the unexpected results of the England and Wales legislation have put money into the pockets of the insurance companies at the expense of the payers of water rates. They take up with the authorities damage done to their client's property by burst water mains and collect the costs from the water authority despite having themselves received premiums to cover such liabilities.

As one who believes in personal responsibility and containment of Government expenditure, I support the move to the present Scottish system and not the England and Wales system, especially bearing in mind that the England and Wales system is being reconsidered.

I must also stress that the order does nothing to remove the existing rights of individuals to pursue claims against the Department if it is negligent. On the contrary, it provides cover for a section of the community which has difficulty in insuring against damage which may be caused by escapes of water from the Department's water pipes. If this order is not passed tonight, the holders of agricultural and forestry land in Northern Ireland will be at a disadvantage compared with their counterparts in England, Wales and Scotland.

As hon. Members are anxious to raise points on the order, I shall not go through the articles one by one, unless hon. Members so desire. It is the general theme of the order that concerns us, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): As the Minister has indicated, the order has its roots in section 6 of the Water Act 1981, which relates to England and Wales. When we ask that the same law be applied to Northern Ireland as to England and Wales, we are at least consistent. We are asking only for the principle that has already been followed to everyone's advantage.

I appreciate that this matter has caused some difficulty for water authorities in England and Wales, but that is not a good argument for suggesting that the people of Scotland or Northern Ireland should be deprived of a benefit that, perhaps, is more widespread than the Government may like but that would be of real benefit to some people in the community.

When the corresponding legislation for Scotland was being discussed, I noted from Hansard that, while the Labour party was anxious to support such legislation for England and Wales, it took the opposite view for Scotland, and did so on not particularly good grounds. The grounds were that there is a different set-up for water authorities in Scotland, where councils were the responsible body, and they could not afford the extra burden. I rather fear that the Labour party was taking that line on the advice of the councils in Scotland rather than on published figures, because it is difficult to get hard and fast figures on the cost of the application of section 6.

When the order was first published in September, I noticed that Northern Ireland was not being treated as England and Wales were. I asked what the effect of this difference in the law was, as I am of an inquiring mind. I wrote to the Minister and asked for his observations, and with my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) I went to see the Minister. Despite the representations that we made forcefully and clearly, the order was published, and we are now discussing it.

A number of points have to be made about this order. As a general principle, we should try to have all public utilities on the same footing one with another throughout the United Kingdom, because they are all providing a public service to the community.

The water authorities have an absolute statutory duty laid on them to provide water to private individuals, and therefore Parliament has, over the years, given them the right to lay pipes where ever it is necessary to provide the water supply. If an individual builds his house alongside a major water main, he is accepting the risk inherent in that, because water under pressure is a pretty potent instrument if it gets out. However, if the high pressure watermain is laid alongside an already existing house, that risk was not there, the individual does not want it, and it is being imposed on him. On that ground alone, I would have thought that the water authorities have a powerful moral reason to provide compensation to an individual whose property is damaged by a burst watermain. However, the individual does not have that right now, unless negligence can be proven, and will not have it in Northern Ireland even if the order goes through. On the other hand, he can get compensation automatically in England and Wales.

Until section 6 of the Water Act came into force, the water authorities could not insure, and therefore they did not have the legal liability to compensate those whose property was damaged. Since the passing of the Water Act, surely the water authorities can insure that they have a legal liability to compensate. Cannot the water authorities in Northern Ireland insure themselves against damages? Has that possibility been explored?

In the debate in the other place on these issues, it was said that everybody paid water rates, and therefore all would be contributing to any compensation that was paid. It may well be that the system in Scotland is different from that in England and Wales, but the system in Northern Ireland differs from both. In Northern Ireland we all have to pay for the water that we consume. We are all metered. We all make payments to what is in effect a Government body. I can see no good reason why the burden for the damage suffered should not be spread among the water consumers rather than that the Department of the Environment should have to find extra money. Perhaps that is a suggestion that should have been considered.

I remember that the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw), then the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, said in this House that the Government believed that the Water Bill had been greatly improved by the inclusion of clause 6. Something must have happened since then. Perhaps it was the harsh light of experience that made the Government change their mind. The Government should be trying to claw back. They should not be depriving the people of Scotland and Northern Ireland, and indeed the insurance companies there, of the benefits that they should enjoy. Surely they have as much right to the money for compensation as the people of England and Wales.

One of the excuses made in the other place with regard to Scotland was that there was simply not enough time to consult all the interested parties. There has certainly been time to consult interested parties in this case, and efforts have been made to do so.

I believe that the Government have not proceeded correctly. I would have preferred them to follow the English and Welsh legislation. A mistake made in one place could perhaps then have been remedied across the board when a suitable opportunity occurred.

The report by the Northern Ireland Assembly was an astonishing document, produced after an astonishing investigation by the environment committee and the Assembly.

The Assembly was satisfied, and it welcomed the Scottish standards. The agriculture committee of the Assembly was satisfied too. I am sorry that neither of the chairmen of those committees is present this evening. They might have been able to tell us, and the people of Northern Ireland, why they took such peculiar decisions.

The Ulster Farmers' Union was satisfied. The Northern Ireland Agricultural Producers' Association was asked, apparently, and did not reply. The Department of the Environment was satisfied. The general public in Northern Ireland was not consulted by the Assembly. They had no opportunity to put their view. Apparently, one body consulted asked for the English and Welsh procedure to be followed. Could the Minister tell us what it was? Whatever it was, that body showed a wee bit of wit.

The Assembly stated that it was grateful to all the bodies that had assisted in the preparation of the report. Let us think about those bodies. Why should the Ulster Farmers Union not have been satisfied? It asked only about the agricultural aspect, and the agricultural aspect was met. The union was not worried about the domestic householder. It is not clear whether the Agricultural Producers Association was satisfied, as it did not reply. The Department of the Environment was satisfied. It told the Assembly what the Assembly wanted to hear.

The one person who could suffer from the bursting of a massive pipe was the domestic individual, and his interests were not protected.

Many years ago, when I represented the city of Londonderry, the water main to the city burst in the middle of a housing estate occupied by people who, at best were poorly paid and, for the most part, were unemployed. We should try to protect such people who, perhaps because of age, sickness or poverty, are unable to insure themselves and therefore suffer considerable personal loss. The houses were built across the hill in fairly long blocks, and some had 3 and 4 ft of water in them. A large water main with, in this case, 500 ft of head behind it, can shove out an awful lot of water in a short time. Such people get hurt, as they get no compensation from anybody and they are those who can least afford it. It is no excuse to say that insurance is available, as it is not always in force, for the reasons that I have given.

The Assembly also noted that Parliament was assured that the law would be reformed in Scotland and Ireland. I have not managed to lay my eyes on the relevant Hansard of this House, the other place or the Scottish Grand Committee, although I assume that it will be of this House. I should like to know whether Parliament was told then that the law for Scotland and Ireland would not be the same as that then being passed for England and Wales. If the House had been told, I feel that many more questions would, or should, have been asked.

The Assembly was worried about the effect on public expenditure. That might come as a surprise to some people. There is a means of spreading the compensation burden evenly, because all consumers are metered. Why did the Environment Committee and the Agriculture Committee in the Assembly and the Assembly in general allow the order to pass without challenge?

The Assembly said that it recognised the extent of the Scottish and of the English and Welsh legislation. I believe that that is not an accurate reflection of what happened. I cannot believe that anybody explained the practical effects to the members of those Committees, or to the Assembly. Officials in the Department of the Environment did not tell them, and the Minister did not tell them. Unfortunately, nobody in those Committees thought to ask the right question. The agriculture bodies were happy, as they got what they wanted, but nobody spelt out to members of the Assembly what the result would be.

I have no doubt that the Minister with responsibility for the Department of the Environment in Northern Ireland was told of the effect. I believe that his civil servants advised him, even if he had not the wit to spot it himself. Members of the Assembly and its Committees were not told, as the Minister would have been told, because the Assembly is served by civil servants who are not responsible to it or paid by it.

In other words, the brief was prepared by civil servants who were responsible to the Minister and to the interests of the Department, rather than to the interests of the Assembly. The order seemed fairly harmless, at worst, and, at best, helpful to the agricultural community. That is why I am glad that we are in this House. We can act as a longstop and ask the questions that were not asked in the Assembly.

The Department of the Environment presented to the Assembly a long letter which contained a statement that I should like to have clarified. The Department pointed out "that the regional water authorities in England and Wales who are responsible for sewerage also undertake prosecutions." Can those bodies undertake prosecutions against the Crown?

The question of the treatment of sewage occupied the Assembly when considering the order. I shall be writing a lengthy letter to the Minister tomorrow about the Kilrea sewerage works. We corresponded on the subject a year ago, but a serious problem remains. The sewage has been troubling people for years and it seems that the Department of the Environment is falling flat on its face.

That is the sort of matter with which the Assembly concerned itself. It did not worry about the domestic property that would be damaged and the problems that would be caused to the people living in that property.

The Department said in its letter to the Assembly that the whole matter would be reported to the water council. What can that council do about reports that are presented to it? I am glad to see that the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) has joined us, because he was prominent whenever section 6 of the Water Act was being debated. I trust that he will support us tonight. What can the water council do about bad sewerage works in Northern Ireland?

We are discussing an important matter because it raises the question whether all citizens of the United Kingdom shall be treated alike, shall stand equally before the law and have the same benefits, or whether some shall be treated differently.

The Labour party failed in its representations on behalf of Scotland, having argued one case for the people of England and Wales and another for the people of Scotland. The Government failed to protect the people of Scotland and are failing to protect the interests of the domestic sufferers in Northern Ireland. I hope that it will not be long before these matters are corrected.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It is wonderful how a lesson gets inculcated, first one way and then another. The second order which the House is considering returns to the theme of the first yet approaches it from a different and novel angle.

It is a pretty pickle that has been committed by the Government which the House is invited to contemplate tonight. Before 1981, the code of law in all parts of the United Kingdom in these matters was the same. In that year, the Department of the Environment in England and Wales, for reasons unconnected with the matter which is under discussion, decided to go ahead on its own, and had its own Water Bill for England and Wales.

Into that Bill was inserted under persuasion in both Houses a clause which was ill-considered, of which the consequences were not foreseen and which the Government had reason to regret. Before long it was discovered that as a result of that provision £14·5 million a year was being paid out to unintended recipients, mostly in the form of insurance companies, to alleviate the burdens and obligations that they had undertaken in the policies that they had written.

So the Government wondered what to do. One might think that the simple thing to do would be to amend the Water Act 1981 and to remove the disastrous and offending section. But then there is a saying, much current in Treasury circles, that one cannot take butter out of a dog's mouth. The proposition of introducing a Bill into the House of Commons to amend the Water Act 1981 by deleting section 6 did not commend itself, surprisingly enough, to the managers of Government business, to the Whips or to those who might have been expected to ensure that that legislation got through.

So since 1981 the Water Act for England and Wales has been left severely alone to go on its riotous course, subsidising the insurance companies, but it occurred to the Government that they had still to deal with the other parts of the United Kingdom. They took Scotland first. They had a favourable course there, because whereas in England and Wales the sufferers, mainly the water authorities, are impersonal and not very popular bodies, in Scotland the water authorities were none other than the elected county councils which, as we all know, are so popular that everybody is anxious to take part in the relevant parts of the United Kingdom in the forthcoming elections to return even more worthy representatives to those bodies. The Government got away with it in Scotland and they succeeded in passing a Scottish water measure without the blemish which had unhappily been allowed to disfigure the England and Wales Act.

Then, of course, there was left Northern Ireland. "Easy," said the Government. "We do not have to legislate for Northern Ireland. We do not have the embarrassment of having to bring in a Bill and pass it through all its stages. Goodness knows what trouble there might be when people discovered what we were up to. We can do it by an Order in Council. That is how we legislate on transferred subjects for Northern Ireland. So we will just produce an order on the lines of the Scottish measure, without the blemish of section 6 of the Water Act 1981. If they do not like it, they will have to lump it because that is what Orders in Council are about."

It turned out, as my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) said, that by some strange inadvertence the curious Northern Ireland Assembly apparently liked it but the rest of us do not like the fact that what has not been remedied in England and Wales because it would involve legislation is omitted in respect of Northern Ireland because we do not have to be legislated for, but can just be governed by Order in Council.

We come back to the same old grievance. We have returned to King Charles' head—the evil of legislating differently for different parts of the United Kingdom and in particular of legislating for Northern Ireland by means of an Order in Council.

What ought to be done — surely the Treasury's interest must be engaged—is that the Water Act 1981 for England and Wales should be amended. It is a minor scandal that when the Minister in Northern Ireland in the Department of the Environment communicated with his opposite number in England and Wales he received a vague and distant suggestion that the Department might get round to considering what to do in England and Wales. I have to say to the Treasury—if my voice will reach it —"Wake up; there is £14·5 million a year there to be saved for the trouble of introducing amending legislation. Surely you can lean on the Department of the Environment to the extent of getting it to put its house in order in England and Wales and save that substantial sum from going every year down the drain as a result of that blunder."

Until that is done, until that happens, and certainly until there is a definite assurance that that is going to happen in England and Wales, we in Northern Ireland will not sit down under the indignity, because we are legislated for by order in Council, of having imposed upon us what the Government are afraid to impose upon England and Wales. Against that we are duty bound to protest. So strongly do we feel that duty upon us that many of my hon. Friends and I have temporarily quit the electoral field in Northern Ireland in order, alone of all the parties of Northern Ireland represented in the House, to make sure that our grievance is heard and is marked.

Let me once again, therefore, reaffirm what the grievance is. That grievance is that, by reason of the fact that in Northern Ireland we are under temporary arrangements, annually renewed, legislated for by Order in Council, that which ought to ge done in England and Wales and which would save £14·5 million in England and Wales if it were done there, is imposed upon us by sleight of hand. We do not like it. We protest against it, and despite the fact that the order is beneficial to the agricultural and forestry interests in Northern Ireland, as it is in the rest of the United Kingdom, we shall protest against it in the proper manner in due course.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): It is fortunate for me that I do not have to answer the argument put forward by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), although I congratulate him, as I often do, on putting his finger on the essential matter that preoccupies Northern Ireland Members. I had some sympathy for the Minister——

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: We all have.

Mr. Bell: Several of us here have great sympathy for the hon. Gentleman.

I had greater sympathy for the Minister when he was trying to explain to the House the problem that he had, as he moved to the Scottish system, of trying not to put money into the hands of free-thinking, free market insurance companies and take it out of the pockets of the hard-pressed water ratepayers in Northern Ireland. I know that the Minister believes sincerely and deeply in free enterprise, and that he also believes in restrictions on public expenditure. Therefore the dilemma that he faces is understandable.

I took on board the comments of the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) when he said that in this matter what he described as a wee bit of wit should have been used. We might all benefit from that wit when we discuss the great ironies and illogicalities of orders which, as the right hon. Member for South Down said, are different in Scotland from those in England and Wales, and are now in parallel with Northern Ireland and Scotland. It would be of some puzzlement to the British public if they were aware of the great variety on this matter.

The essence of the order is aptly contained in the explanatory note dated August 1984 provided by the Department of the Environment. Essentially, it is that the order amends the Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1973 by inserting a new article 57A, which makes the Department of the Environment in Northern Ireland liable for damage caused by escapes of water on to agricultural or forestry land. The hon. Member for Londonderry, East referred to the domestic user of water and said that that was not covered by the order. The liability under the order is absolute and covers escapes of water from pipes for which the Department is responsible. That covers water mains and service pipes coming within the Department's responsibility.

It is true, of course, that when the proposals came before the Environment Committee of the Northern Ireland Assembly, although the proposals were generally welcomed, concern was expressed at the damage caused to agricultural and forestry land by escapes of harmful substances such as sewage and chemicals coming from equipment, plant or premises for which the Department has a vested responsibility. However, even absolute liability, to which I referred earlier, cannot be that absolute. The order will not extend to certain undertakings empowered by statute to provide public services; for example, railways and road transport undertakings. In addition, the Department will not be obliged to compensate a person who suffers loss or damage through an act for which he is wholly responsible. In essence, therefore, the basis of the order is that damage caused to uninsurable agricultural or forestry land shall be covered, but that there is a limit to the burden on public expenditure.

If I may revert again to my barrister training, I note that in the past liability rested with the Department only when an escape had been caused by the Department's negligence. The question of negligence might be relevant to the home owner who finds himself the subject of a burst water main and is not covered by insurance. He might nevertheless be covered by negligence. This principle was established by an English legal precedent, Green v. Chelsea Waterworks, and that was decided in the Court of Appeal as long ago as 1894.

Some reference has been made to the position taken by the Ulster Farmers Union. The hon. Member for Londonderry, East made the apt point that such proposals and such an order would be acceptable to the farmers union. The reasons for that are obvious. It has also sought additional amendments to cover leakages of harmful substances even in very small amounts which can lead to serious damage and losses to users of waterways, including farmers and livestock farmers. It appears to me that the farmers union, while it draws attention to valid points, goes further than this order should go.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East makes the point that possibly the wrong questions were asked in the Northern Ireland Assembly and by the Environment Committee. It is right, as he said, that we are the backstop, the ultimate legislators who must try to put the right questions in the right circumstances. The Environment Committee recognised that there was a distinction between water and sewerage operations, whereby the Department had sole control over the former, whereas third parties can discharge effluent, pollutants and the like. It recognised also the increased financial implications should the area of liability be broadened. It also accepted the high level of public scrutiny to which the Department is subject in Parliament and in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

I should like to take on board all the points made by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who never ceases to draw the attention of the House to the various anomalies which we face when we are dealing with such orders. He puts them in a constitutional context as well as a practical and pragmatic context. The Opposition take note of the various points that have been made and the differences between Scottish and Northern Ireland legislation and that of Wales and England. Nevertheless, we feel constrained to support the Government and to commend the order to the House.

Dr. Boyson: The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross), as always, expressed a measured, careful and in many cases sound view, although I cannot agree with everything that he said.

The hon. Member referred at the beginning of his speech to Scottish Members. There is no sign that any Scottish Members feel aggrieved by the fact that legislation was brought forward for Scotland of the type proposed for Northern Ireland. Scottish Members could easily have intervened in the debate this evening, but none seem to be bursting through the doors to say that rising movements throughout Scotland are protesting that they are not having the same privileges of paying their insurance premiums, twice, as it were, with the company then getting back the money from the water authorities — in that case, as the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said, from the local councils.

I do not think that it is a question of the amount of money. The right hon. Member for South Down referred to the £14·5 million that I mentioned earlier. That is a lot of money. Of course, everything could be said to be on the margin. Mention has already been made of "Bleak House". As Mr. Micawber said in another Dickens novel, happiness or misery depends upon whether one is sixpence below £20 or sixpence above £20. I enjoy agreeing with the hon. Member for Londonderry, East when I can, but I must mildly rebuke him over his remarks concerning the £14·5 million. That was a considerable issue. The right hon. Member for South Down said that he hoped that the Treasury was listening because if the legislation which now applies in Scotland, and is to apply in Northern Ireland, were introduced in England and Wales there would be a considerable saving to the public purse.

The Assembly has been referred to time and again. Today, I ate with one of the chairmen of committees in Northern Ireland, although he was not the chairman of the Environment Committee or the Agricultural Committee. I met the chairman of the Department of Finance and Personnel Committee today. But the Assembly's recommendation is clear. The Environment Committee recommends that no change be made to the draft Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1985. That was its view.

In my opening remarks I said that, of the 30 non-governmental bodies consulted on the legislation, only one had made such a representation. As I knew that some hon. Member would ask me about that, I made a note in the margin about that body. As the hon. Member for Londonderry, East implied, it was the Law Society. I did not include that at the beginning, because it did not particularly strengthen my case, but I had it in reserve if required. But whether or not it was the Law Society, we are here as legislators, and Assembly Members were making their comments as people elected to represent the Northern Ireland electorate.

It should be pointed out that the Association of Local Authorities, Shelter and the Northern Ireland Association of Citizens' Advice Bureaux were also consulted, yet none of them was against the proposal. They either did not reply — although they were not busy electioneering at the time—or they nodded in agreement from their offices.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East queried whether the Crown could be sued. I am not a lawyer, and I should perhaps take legal advice on that. I was hoping that the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) would save me from having to answer that point. But I doubt whether the Crown can be sued in that regard. As the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, who spoke for the Opposition, said, the right hon. Member for South Down often puts matters on a more general constitutional plane. Since being privileged to be a Minister for Northern Ireland, I have listened to the logical and careful arguments that the right hon. Member has regularly put forward. He said that the grievance had been heard and marked. I am not quite sure what marked means in this case, but as a former schoolmaster I know that one can either tick it or put a cross against it. I shall leave my response to his comments there.

The right hon. Member for South Down used a phrase that I had never heard before, about taking butter from a dog's mouth. One problem is that once one legislates so that certain people have additional privileges, it is difficult to take them back.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): Fifty million of them.

Dr. Boyson: Probably fewer than that in England and Wales. I always say that one cannot take a bone from a dog without being bitten. I do not usually find dogs eating butter. They are usually eating bones.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten), who is responsible for the Department of the Environment in Northern Ireland, wrote to the Minister for Housing and Construction about what could be done to rectify an error that was made at that time in section 6 of the 1981 Act, and the last line of his reply was:

"I am happy to assure you that we will think again about the way in which section 6 has operated."

We thought again when we laid this order and decided that it was not our job to put money into the pockets of the insurance companies, which drew money from people and then got it back again, so that they were paid twice over, without any sign of premiums being lowered. It is not our job to stop people from being prudent and insuring when possible, because we believe that they should be prudent. It is not our job to increase Government expenditure—the hon. Member for Middlesbrough agreed that that has been my consistent view — but, where people cannot insure — the pressure for the original section 6 came from the fact that it was almost impossible to insure forestry and agricultural land—the Government should step in.

On those counts we commend the order to the House. I trust that my right hon. and hon. Friends will support it in the Lobby when right hon. and hon. Members opposite show their displeasure with the order.

St. John's Colliery, Maesteg

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

11.22 pm

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I requested this Adjournment debate after receiving a letter from the director of the South Wales area of the National Coal Board, Mr. Philip Weekes, who informed me that he had recommended the closure of St. John's Colliery, Maesteg. He attempts to justify his recommendation in his letter and in his press statement, both of which are dated 16 April. I shall deal with this matter in my closing remarks in order to ensure that the Minister does not overlook the special request that I shall be making to him.

The motion ends with the words

"the consequences of the closure of St. John's Colliery, Maesteg."

I appreciate the fact that the Minister may not be aware of some of the issues that I intend to raise, since they relate specifically to Maesteg and Wales and should therefore be dealt with by a Welsh Office Minister. However, I realise that the Minister was the winner of the Observer Mace for the British Universities debating competition in 1966. Therefore, I appreciate that he will be able to deliver a masterful reply. Nevertheless, I plead with him to recognise that unless a positive response is forthcoming it could result in the economic and social collapse of the whole community.

In his letter of 16 April, Mr. Philip Weekes stated that he was recommending the closure of St. John's colliery. He said that 350 men out of a total work force of some 830 had said that they were prepared to take the option of voluntary redundancy. The recommendation has not been agreed by the National Coal Board or the National Union of Mineworkers. We do not know whether the coal board could be persuaded by the NUM and others to keep the colliery open.

I am pleased to have drawn a place in the Adjournment debate to place on record the complete and overwhelming opposition to the closure of St. John's colliery felt in the Maesteg area. Some 830 jobs in the colliery and a further 200 to 300 related jobs would be lost.

The colliery is the last in the Llynfi valley. It is the town's last hope of remaining economically viable. Last Saturday morning in the council chamber I met representatives from the chamber of trade and religious organisations, the leader of the Ogwr borough council and other borough and county councillors, and representatives from the community council and other organisations. I intend to express tonight their views with the hope that somehow, somewhere, someone will listen to their pleas for help and that their 12-month struggle to retain their only pit will not have been wasted. I hope that the debts incurred will not be paid off with the 30 pieces of silver which are available to buy off the jobs of their sons and grandsons.

I stated many times during the protracted, demoralising 12-month dispute that Arthur Scargill's fight was not my constituents' fight. Their fight was not for more pay or better conditions; it was to retain their jobs, pits and communities. This proposed closure is a classic illustration of what the fight was about.

The Government did not listen then, and I doubt whether Mr. MacGregor or his Welsh boyo, Philip

[Mr. Ray Powell]

Weekes, will listen now. As they butcher the social and economic fabric of the Welsh communities, the harvest will be a complete reversal in the polls at the next election and the return of a powerful Labour Administration committed to a just society free from the scourge of the unemployment that we are now enduring.

It is fitting to consider the lovely and picturesque town of Maesteg some six years ago. It is the proud home and birthplace of saints, bards, singers, druids, miners and rugby players. It is a land full of folklore, custom, traditions and legends. It does us all good sometimes to look with humility and gratitude at the stock from which we were hewn and the quarry from which we were dug and to remember the people and influences that shaped our lives.

In Maesteg, legend has it that there was a maid of Cefn Ydfa. Hers was a romantic story that would take more than an Adjournment debate to tell. I want to go back not to the days of the maid of Cefn Ydfa but a mere six years when it was almost impossible to rent a shop in Commercial street or in the main shopping centre. It was impossible to hire a stall in the market, because the town was thriving. Unemployment was at 3·5 per cent. Of that figure, 2 per cent. of the people were unemployable because of silicosis and pneumoconiosis. The remainder were those employed in building or other such jobs registered as in transit from one job to another.

In the Maesteg area, 24 per cent. of the males are unemployed. If 830 jobs are lost at St. John's colliery, the prospect for jobs in the future is bleak and male unemployment may reach 45 to 50 per cent.

The boarded windows of shops in Commercial street symbolise the decay that has attacked that once flourishing town in six years. This community has suffered on all fronts—the catastrophic decline in the mining industry, the recently-lost development area status, and the worst catastrophe of all, the election of a Tory Government in May 1979. During the past six years unemployment has escalated and the town is now gripped in a depression that cries out for Government action, cries out for hope and cries out for reasoned and rational assistance.

The catalogue of decline since May 1979 has meant an increase in unemployment from July 1978 to July 1981 of 158 per cent. for the male population and 180 per cent. for the female population. The closure of the Caerau and Coegnant collieries has meant the loss of 483 jobs at Caerau and 392 at Coegnant. There has been a rundown of the Port Talbot steelworks with the loss of 315 jobs for workers living in Maesteg. Cutbacks and closures have shed 578 jobs. Multimetal Products, Louis Edwards Limited, Mastercraft Furniture Limited all closed in 1981 and there were 300 redundancies at Revlon International in early 1981. There were also 200 job losses at British Tissues paper mill in the Llynfi valley. All those have come about since May 1979.

What can we do to help the community of my constituents — the male and female unemployed, the business men, the bankers? At last Saturday's meeting I was asked to ask the Minister to class Ogwr borough, and Maesteg in particular, as a very special development area and regrade its development status up the two places which it was put down some weeks ago, to increase the inducement to industrialists to come into the area with more grant aid, to call on the Welsh Development Agency to look at the problem of that community area and take appropriate action, to call on the Development Agency for Rural Wales to assist and to ask for more funding from NCB (Enterprise) Limited to establish factories and improve what is already available at Tondu.

There is also the need to continue the fight to retain this colliery and there is a need for the plans for extracting coal from the Margam reserves and seams to be examined. Many miners have explained to me that these plans could be used, could work and could save the colliery for future generations. At the height of the strike there were daily bulletins about Margam development. It is passing strange, to say the least, that we have not heard a peep about the future development of Margam since the miners returned to work.

The help needed could be readily made available. The Government could have acted to retain the industries lost since 1979. We have skilled, trained, experienced, efficient and responsible workers on the dole in and around Maesteg. All that is needed is a deliberate attempt by the Government to assist in protecting the colliery itself because I have yet to be convinced that the pit is uneconomic. I have yet to be convinced that a deliberate, motivated attempt to overspend to qualify for justified closure was not orchestrated by Philip Weekes and other NCB officials.

I ask the Minister to give me a clear and concise promise that he will set in train an inquiry to establish why £8 million of public money was spent on St. John's colliery, who sanctioned that expenditure, on what it was spent, whether it was in search of coal seams and who advised where to carry out the search.

I believe that it is nothing short of criminal and wilful neglect and irresponsibility to allow such massive expenditure without some research. The Minister responsible will in all probability be asking for further funding for the NCB soon, and I ask him to justify this expenditure. Only £10 million has been allocated for NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. for the whole of the nation, but already £8 million has been spent in searching for what is now suggested to be non-existent coal in St. John's.

I recommend that the Minister looks at columns 601 to 610 of yesterday's Hansard, which has questions on job creation, answered by the Secretary of State for Wales. He will realise why communities such as Maesteg are desperate to see employment created, because there is no chance for any jobs.

I also ask the Minister to consider seriously the possibility of attracting tourism to areas such as Maesteg. Today, the Welsh Affairs Committee departed to investigate tourism in Wales. I suggested to my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell), who is Chairman of the Committee, that he should have planned to go to see some of the valleys where there is a need for tourism to be developed, rather than going to the northern part of Wales, where tourism is flourishing.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): I fully appreciate the concern of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), which led him to raise this issue tonight. Possible colliery closures, particularly in areas of high unemployment, are of concern to us all, and as a Merseyside Member I know only too well the serious problems caused by unacceptably high levels of unemployment.

The hon. Member has looked up my career, and he kindly mentioned my success in the Observer Mace. He did not mention my pride in having been born in Glyn Ceiriog near Llangollen in North Wales. I appreciate the significant point that he raised about the importance of communities in Wales. He will realise that many of the points that he has raised are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. I shall bring them immediately to the attention of my right hon. Friend and his ministerial colleagues.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the recent history of St. John's colliery, but in view of his remarks about the management of the colliery, and his remarks which have been quoted in the newspapers, it might be helpful if I outline the facts from the NCB.

Over the past few years the National Coal Board in South Wales has spent many millions of pounds in an effort to make St. John's a viable proposition. A number of faces have been opened up, but the poor geology of the area has in each case made it impossible to mine from them a reasonable quantity of coal. In fact, in the last full year of production—1983-84—output and productivity were the lowest in the South Wales coalfield. The area director, Philip Weekes has made it clear that these results were due, not to standards of work, but to the appallingly difficult geological conditions.

St. John's is recommended for closure by the area director because of the exhaustion of all reasonable reserves, despite massive efforts to secure more. The unions have suggested—and it is reported that the hon. Gentleman has suggested too—that the pit could be made viable by reducing the work force from 830 men to about 500, thereby cutting costs. But that would not do, because the forces of nature are not impressed by cost-cutting exercises and the massive geological problems would remain.

The hon. Gentleman has argued that more money should be made available and that we should have an inquiry into the money already spent. That money has been spent wisely. Boreholes have been drilled, and, sadly, similar geological problems have been encountered in all the colliery's coal seams. The hon. Gentleman believes that considerable sums of money have been wasted. How much more money does he suggest the NCB might need to spend in proving that the exceptionally difficult geological conditions will simply not permit further worthwhile seams to be established?

At a reconvened colliery review meeting on 16 April the area director said that he saw no alternative to recommending to the NCB that St. John's should close. The meeting was held under the existing colliery review procedure. I understand that a very effective presentation was made by the deputy director, mining and the chief mining engineer, illustrating on slides the results over recent years, which have been most disappointing—mainly, if not wholly, because of the difficult geology. They explained that the board had been forthcoming with major development works. Those works were explained in detail. They need not have been, as many of those present already knew the facts. Those major development works had succeeded in making available only short-life faces on which production to any reasonably acceptable level had been inhibited by faults and other geological features.

The mainstay seam for many years—Gellideg—had been worked to its limit, and there had since then been a marked deterioration in performance. It was explained at that meeting that it was "unlikely that any of the options considered by the investigating team could survive the type of geology which boreholes and other determinations had proved in the other seams."

The early stages of the existing procedure are being adhered to. The matter, I understand, now lies with the trade unions. I understand that neither the NUM nor the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers have yet given notice that they intend to appeal to the NCB about the future of St. John's. If the unions were to decide within the next month to appeal to the NCB, the next stage would be the national appeal meeting. The procedure after that would depend on the success in bringing in the modified colliery review procedure.

I understand that the NUM has made no technical inspection of the pit since before the strike. During that time, two producing faces were lost. Production is down to about 550 tonnes a day. Geological problems with the new S12 face may bring that figure down to 250 tonnes a day. With only one face now operational, there is little productive work available, sadly, for many members of the work force.

Many of the men whom the board has interviewed so far want to take voluntary redundancy and to leave the industry on the generous terms which we have discussed recently in the House. Those who wish to remain in the industry will be offered alternative jobs at other collieries.

Pits have always closed — because they were exhausted, because mining conditions became too difficult, or because they became uneconomic. Nobody denies that the closure of any pit can have serious implications for the individuals concerned and their community. That is why the board and the Government have gone to such lengths to ensure that, if a closure has to take place, there are good redundancy terms for those who choose to accept them and alternative jobs with generous transfer allowances for those who wish to stay in the industry. But that is also why we are as concerned as everyone in the House that some closures which might not have been necessary have become inevitable as a result of the self-inflicted damage of the industrial dispute of the past 12 months.

I have to say that because the hon. Member said much with which I disagreed about butchery and slaughter and the coming of a Labour Government, which would bring strength to the industry. Labour Governments were responsible for the closure of a total of 330 pits. We have debated that so many times that I shall not reiterate the arguments, except to say that there are answers to his assertions. I understand that he would not accept them and I do not propose to take up any more time trying to respond to his points one by one.

As for the new review procedure, I understand from the NCB that the first meeting of the joint sub-committee, comprising the board and the industry's trade unions, has been held to discuss the modified colliery review procedure. It was agreed to set it up at the special meeting of the Coal Industry National Consultative Council on 11 April, following the agreement last October to examine the colliery review procedure. The three unions, the NUM, NACODS and the British Association of Colliery Management have nominated two representatives to join three representatives from the NCB on the sub-committee.

[Mr. David Hunt]

Now that the strike is over, I strongly hope that this newer element will speedily be implemented in the review procedure. Provided that all those involved adopt a reasonable approach, agreement should be reached quickly, and disputed closures will be put to the new independent review body.

The hon. Gentleman has mentioned the Margam project several times in the House and blamed the Government for not bringing it forward fast enough. The board has now received planning permission from West Glamorgan county council to build a colliery at Margam, which would employ about 650 people. However, the board has yet to make a final decision on whether to proceed with the project. If it decides to proceed, the next step will be to refer it to the Secretary of State.

The hon. Gentleman spent some time talking of the effect on his community, and surrounding ones, of any possible closure. He is rightly worried about the effect of the proposed closure on the unemployment figures. We should not allow ourselves to forget that there are jobs in the industry for all who wish to remain in it. Those who leave choose to do so and receive redundancy terms which are the most generous in the country.

I should like to consider the NCB's enterprise company, which was a positive step to relieve the unemployment that follows pit closures. NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. was established by the board precisely for that purpose and to take measures which would create new jobs in areas affected by closures. The company has been in operation since October 1984 and has already established links with enterprise agencies throughout the country. It has done particularly well in south Wales, where the Welsh Development Agency is already operating, and where the Government have been creating a positive climate for job creation.

Ogwr is among the first area in Wales to benefit from the activities of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. The Ogwr partnership trust is now operational and a manager from the National Westminster bank has been seconded to it at the former NCB training centre at Tondu. The centre is being leased at a peppercorn rent to provide start-up units. The NCB is also providing revenue support of £30,000 a year over three years. Urban programme aid is expected to be sought and some discussions with officials have already taken place.

I can also tell the House that I understand from the board that, on Thursday, it will meet the leaders of Mid-Glamorgan council and of other local authorities to discuss what further initiatives can be taken in the area.

The present unemployment rates are unacceptably high, but the Secretary of State for Wales has done much to attract new industry into the area. Wales receives more than its fair share of overseas investment. I am glad to have on the Front Bench with me the Minister of State, and I understand from him that since January 1984, offers of section 7 financial assistance have created and safeguarded more than 2,000 jobs in the hon. Gentleman's constituency alone. Stirling work is being done by the Welsh Development Agency. Three units are available for letting in the constituency, 74 in total in Mid-Glamorgan.

As I said at the outset, I share in many ways the hon. Gentleman's deep concern over the effects of unemployment on his area and the results of it on the local communities, but, unlike him, I see every reason to look forward to future prosperity. All the points that he raised tonight will be carefully considered by me, by the National Coal Board and by the Welsh Office.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Africa

3. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the South African authorities over recent events in that country.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): Following the tragic events at Uitenhage on 21 March, I issued a strong condemnation of the shootings. On my instructions, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce), summoned the South African ambassador to express our shock and to call for the fullest possible investigation.

Mr. Winnick: Does the Foreign Secretary deplore yesterday's detention of three senior members of the United Democratic Front and the continued harassment of those actively involved in opposing the regime? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that, despite the somewhat cosmetic changes recently announced by the regime, there has been no fundamental change in South Africa, and that the vast majority of people there are denied basic rights and liberties because of the colour of their skin?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is too early to comment on the incident reported yesterday, but I confirm that we certainly expressed concern to the South African Government about the original arrest of UDF leaders and joined our partners in the Ten in underlining our concern. Our practice is not to intervene until the legal processes have been exhausted.

It must be acknowledged that certain important changes have been announced this year, starting with President Botha's speech on 25 January and including the suspension of forced removals, the extension of 99-year leasehold rights to blacks in the Cape area, confirmation that the Mixed Marriages and Immorality Acts will be repealed, and so on. None of them go far enough, but they appear to reflect changes in attitude which could be significant, but none of them diminish the strength with which we condemn apartheid as a system, along the lines suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. George Gardiner: My right hon. and learned Friend's latter words will be very welcome to many Conservative Members. Does he agree that if the Government gave a little more encouragement and praise for the moves towards reform that are taking place in South Africa, they would be making a constructive contribution and would ease the process of change there?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: When presenting their attitude towards events in South Africa, it is necessary for the Government to keep both halves of the subject in mind. It is necessary to condemn, as we do, actions that are plainly unjustified. But, as I have already said, it is also necessary to acknowledge and encourage steps that are being taken in the right direction. The key point is that we should continue to use all our influence and contacts in every way possible to maintain pressure for change of the kind desired in all parts of the House.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the South African Government's decision to impose a so-called multi-party Government on Namibia shows that the progress of resolution 435 has come to a halt and that there has been an end to the Crocker initiative? Does it not also throw into great doubt South Africa's acceptance of that resolution? Will he arrange to have this matter raised as soon as possible at the United Nations Security Council?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: With other members of the Contact Group, we have already made representations to the South African Government about the steps taken in Namibia and underlined the importance that we attach to the implementation of resolution 435. We shall continue to support the American-led negotiations to achieve that.

Mr. Anderson: We are glad that the Government were represented by our consul in Durban at the opening stages of the treason trial. Will the Foreign Secretary ensure that we continue to monitor that trial when it resumes in mid-May? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman consider whether we should follow the example of the Irish Government and help to pay the legal costs of those UDF defendants? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman consider also helping the families who are being crippled financially by this legal repression?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am afraid that I cannot follow the hon. Gentleman down the road that was opened up by the second half of his question. Many British subjects face trial in different countries in different circumstances, and successive Governments have not found it either possible or proper to pay their legal costs. We could not, therefore, extend our representative generosity along those lines. It is important that we should continue to monitor the trial carefully. We have already made it plain that we shall be sending an observer.

British Citizens (Hostages)

6. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British citizens are currently held hostage by overseas Governments; and where they are held.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): Although a number of British citizens are detained abroad under conditions with which we are not satisfied, none of these can be formally described as hostages.

Mr. Holt: We need to clarify the fine dividing line between what is a hostage and what is not. Under what conditions would it become unacceptable for a British citizen to be incarcerated overseas? What action would the Government take in those circumstances?

Mr. Renton: In general terms, a hostage is one against whom charges have not been laid by the overseas Government. The Government aim to render British citizens full consular assistance if they are detained overseas. That is one of the prime duties of our consular department. We raise complaints with the relevant authorities, including complaints about illegal detention, although we must work within the laws of the country concerned. In exceptional cases, and if it is in the interest of the persons held, we take the matter up at a high level with the appropriate Government.

Mr. Ron Brown: What about the case of King and Maxwell, the accused Scots held in Libya? Surely they need help badly. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that one way not to help them is to suggest that Libyan property should be seized in this country, particularly in London? That will undermine the efforts of those who are trying to secure the early release of the men.

Mr. Renton: As I understand it, those two gentlemen have stood trial, been convicted and are serving their sentences. Unfortunately, there are, as of yesterday, 1,070 British subjects abroad who are detained for one reason or another. It is the Government's duty, while respecting the laws of the country concerned, to provide as much consular protection as possible to all those people.

European Community (Dooge Report)

7. Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, in the light of the Dooge report, the European Economic Community intends to adopt a common position in international bodies.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The Dooge committee has recommended that the Ten should adopt common positions in the United Nations and other multilateral bodies. This proposal, with the others made by the committee, will be discussed at the Milan European Council in June. We hope that this discussion will lead to decisions which will enable the Ten to act and vote more unitedly in international organisations.

Mr. Gould: Will the Minister assure the House that the reservations he expressed on matters such as the weakening of the veto, the enlargement of European Assembly powers, and other steps towards political union will be firmly maintained?

Mr. Rifkind: I assure the hon. Gentleman that it was precisely for that reason that I entered those reservations in the report, as did representatives of certain other countries.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is it not thoroughly undesirable that Britain should be left isolated along with a minority of members of the European Community while the majority wish to make progress in this way? If more nationalistic states such as France can go along with these developments, why can they get away with it and we cannot?

Mr. Rifkind: The United Kingdom was not isolated in the Dooge committee. The Greek representative entered a total of 15 reservations, the Danish representative entered a total of 10 reservations, Britain and Germany both entered three reservations, and a number of other countries entered one each. On the vast majority of issues, we were able to support either the unanimous or the majority view of the committee.

Mr. Deakins: Why does the Department continue to pay lip-service to the idea of European political union when the Minister and his Department must know that that would be completely unacceptable to the British people?

Mr. Rifkind: I am not certain what the hon. Gentleman means by the phrase "European political union". It is not a phrase that has normally been used in the Community. We have said that we are prepared to see greater European unity on a range of issues, but I emphasise that what is sometimes described as the federal concept does not have the support of the vast majority of Community Governments, including the United Kingdom Government.

Mr. Budgen: If the United Kingdom entered so many reservations, will my hon. Friend explain what the Government did support?

Mr. Rifkind: If my hon. Friend had been listening to me with his customary attention, he would have heard that I made quite the opposite point. I said that while certain of our colleagues entered 15 and 10 reservations respectively, the United Kingdom and Germany entered only three reservations, in a report which covered a wide range of issues. We were able to support the unanimous or majority views on a range of questions, such as the internal market, political co-operation, security matters, and the need for more effective forms of decision making in the Community, while reserving the right of the national veto.

Mr. Heffer: Is it not a good thing that most of the nations of the EEC take decisions which are based upon their own national interests? Is it not clear that it would be absolutely disastrous if all the EEC countries took the same sycophantic attitude towards the United States of America and President Reagan as the Prime Minister does?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman has put to me a somewhat extraordinary jumble of ideas. He is correct in saying that individual countries have national interests which they are concerned to protect. Her Majesty's Government formulate foreign policy based on what we believe to be in the best interests of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. Gentleman must know that he is deceiving the House by going on about the number of reservations that Her Majesty's Government have made. Surely the significant point is the nature of the reservations. Will the hon. Gentleman agree that the unwillingness of Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with the Greeks and the Danes, to see an improvement in the decision making procedures of the Community is a bad thing?

Mr. Rifkind: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman has not read the report in question. If he had, he would have noticed that in that part which deals with decision making the United Kingdom did not enter a reservation. Two options were put forward in the main body of the report, one of which was supported by representatives of a number of Community countries. The other option was supported by other representatives. There was no footnote reservation or qualification of the kind that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. George Robertson: The Minister may have entered reservations on the question of majority voting, but he has conceded in his reservations the principle of more frequent use of majority voting on major EEC matters. Will the Minister be frank and tell us precisely to which areas the veto will not still apply? In which areas will the Government stand up for Britain?

Mr. Rifkind: As the hon. Gentleman will be well aware, the vast majority of areas permit voting under the treaty, but it has become increasingly customary for the Presidency not to ask for a vote on them in the Council. We have argued that that is undesirable. There are many areas of progress on which, if votes were taken, the United Kingdom would happily be with the majority, seeking certain changes—for example, on the completion of the internal market. That is an obvious example to which Britain has attached great importance. We have no objection to increased use of majority voting as long as there is reserved to each national Government the right, as an ultimate defence of its national interest, to apply a veto as provided for in the Luxembourg compromise.

Spain

8. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications of the membership of the European Economic Community of Spain for Britain's ties with Gibraltar.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The United Kingdom's ties with Gibraltar are not affected by Spain's membership of the European Community. We remain committed to honour the wishes of the people of Gibraltar as set out in the preamble to the Gibraltar Constitution Order 1969.

Sir John Farr: Will my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that the signature by Spain of the treaty of accession to the EEC will in no way be allowed to prejudice or weaken the close, historic and unique link which the peoples of Gibraltar and Britain enjoy at this moment?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The position is exactly as I stated in my original answer. The constitutional position of Gibraltar remains as set out in the preamble to the constitution order, which rehearses the well known assurances. We shall fully respect the freely and democratically expressed wishes of the people of Gibraltar.

Mr. Skinner: One of the questions that some people are asking about Gibraltar is put simply this: "Do you think that the Tory Government will treat Gibraltar in the same way as the Falklands, or will they treat Gibraltar in the same way as Hong Kong, which they gave away?" It is an intriguing question. I should like the Foreign Secretary to tell us precisely how the Government will treat Gibraltar.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That question is founded on a huge lack of comprehension. The British Government will treat Gibraltar as they should treat Gibraltar. The three cases are entirely distinct from each other, historically, geographically, politically and in every other sense. The position of Gibraltar is governed by the constitutional provision to which I referred, by the existence of our title under the treaty of Utrecht and by the entire difference in attitude of the Spanish Government to the people of that country. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be glad to hear that, as a result of the agreement that was put into force in February this year, there has already been a massive increase in the movements of people across the frontier. Almost 500,000 people have entered Gibraltar since 5 February. That represents a powerful foundation for growth of economic co-operation and prosperity in Gibraltar.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: In the light of Spain's accession to the Community, will my right hon. and learned Friend take this opportunity to let the House know what progress is being made to organise a new extradition treaty with Spain?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That does not arise directly out of this question, but the position is that negotiations on the new extradition treaty, to which I know the House attaches importance, are far advanced. We hope to bring them to a conclusion before too long.

Mr. George Robertson: Have the Spanish Government made any proposals to the British Government about the issue of sovereignty and, if so, when might the British Government's response be made public?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As I think I told my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) on 20 March, the Spanish Government have delivered proposals concerning the future status of Gibraltar. I have told the Spanish Foreign Minister that those proposals will be studied against the background of the undertaking to which I have referred. The details of the proposals must remain confidential at this stage, and it is too early yet to decide at what point that position will change.

European Community (Reform)

11. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the progress to date in achieving reforms in the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Considerable progress has been made. The Council has agreed the arrangements for implementing the budgetary reforms negotiated at Fontainebleau. A start has been made on the reform of the common agricultural policy. The European Council has agreed that action should be taken to reduce the burden of regulation on business and has set a target date for the completion of the common market in goods and services. A number of practical proposals for improving the functioning of the Community institutions are now under discussion.

Mr. Taylor: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, despite all those wonderful pledges and assurances, the plain fact is that the Common Market is now spending over £20 million a day on dumping and destroying food surpluses, and is vastly overspending its agreed budget? Does my right hon. and learned Friend further agree that the only way to secure reforms is to control the supply of money to the Common Market? Therefore, would it not be crazy for the Government to ask the House, at a time when we are cutting back on essential services at home, to give an extra 25 per cent. in real terms to the Common Market?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot accept my hon. Friend's approach to the matter. Of course, it is important to maintain the pressure that we have successfully maintained for the establishment of effective budget disciipline in the Community. That is why we welcome the establishment of that discipline. It will also be important to bear that in mind when we introduce the own-resources decision. We have made it plain that we will not introduce that until all the components about which we have been concerned are in place.

Mr. Johnston: How did the Foreign Secretary respond to the views put to him yesterday by the delegation from the European Parliament? Has his attention been drawn to early-day motion 630? If so, will he comment on it?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Yesterday I met the delegation from the Western European Union. I shall be meeting the European Parliament this afternoon and will be discussing the Spinelli report with it.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As my right hon. and learned Friend said, it is very important that rapid progress should be made towards a common market in goods and services. Will he tell us what progress is being made?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: At the request of the Council at its last meeting, the Commission is drawing up a full programme, which will be published during the summer for the achievement of the internal market by a date that has been fixed in 1992. That is over and above the steps that have already been taken for the harmonisation of standards over a whole range of goods. Our objective is to take harmonisation much further and to complete the internal market by 1992.

Mr. Deakins: Why have the Government just agreed to an extra £240 million contribution this year to the Community budget? When is Parliament likely to be consulted, if at all, about such an outrageous decision?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have made it quite clear that, as happened last year, Parliament will be consulted. The agreement states clearly that our contribution is dependent upon the completion of our national parliamentary procedures. There is no question of asking Parliament to approve the agreement until our abatement has been guaranteed — that is, until the provision for our abatement has been adopted. The amount agreed has been substantially reduced from the Commission's original request. As a direct result of the Fontainebleau mechanism, the net cost of the United Kingdom contribution will be less than our contribution to the intergovernmental agreement last year.

Mr. Forth: Will my right hon. and learned Friend resist the temptation to do a European deal on the European Parliament's draft treaty of union and trade away what it suggests with anything else? Will he also look closely at the terms of reference of the suggested conference that is to deal with that treaty. It is to discuss only the treaty. Any other solutions to European Community problems will be unable to be considered.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Community will consider these matters in the light of the recommendations of the Dooge committee, which will be considered again at the Council meeting to be held in Milan in June. No decision has yet been taken as to whether a conference would be appropriate. Our view is that we are most likely to achieve decisions by taking them at Council level. However, we shall discuss whether a conference is necessary.

Mr. Foulkes: How can the Foreign Secretary say that budgetary control has been achieved when yesterday's agreement on the £240 million was the third such agreement on similar amounts to have been reached within the last 12 months, either by loans or by advances which can be reimbursed? How can he say that there has been a reform of the budget when more money is to be spent upon the open-ended commitment to agriculture and less upon regional and social policies which would help Britain? As he knows, I received a reply a few days ago from his hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, in which I was told that of the 50 poorest regions in Europe, 21 of them are in the United Kingdom. Should he not be fighting for money for those areas?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to appreciate that powerful arrangements have been set in place which come into force upon the adoption of the own-resources decision for the achievement of budgetary discipline within the Community. Throughout the consideration given both to last year's budget and to this year's, including yesterday's consideration, all those measures have been taken closely into account.

Central America

13. Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his American counterpart concerning United States involvement in Central America.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I discussed the problems of Central America most recently with the American Secretary of State Mr. Shultz on 21 February.

Mr. McTaggart: As the United States Congress has made clear its desire not to pursue a military solution to the situation in Nicaragua, will the Foreign Secretary and his EEC colleagues urge President Reagan to abandon support for the Contras, to sign the protocol to the Contadora treaty and seek genuinely to help the Contadora countries in finding a peaceful solution to the problems of Central America?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman rightly reminds the House of the sustained commitment of European Community countries to the Contadora process. The United States has repeatedly stated that it wishes to see political reform in Central America through peaceful means, and we support that objective. The United States reiterated its support for the Contadora process at the recent session of the General Assembly.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Were not the recent highly successful elections in San Salvador a further endorsement of the American policy of encouraging democracy and moderate politicians in Central America?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I entirely agree. The recent elections in El Salvador were a clear demonstration of the consolidation of democracy in that country. The Salvadorean Government will continue to have our support in their efforts to place that democratic process on a stable foundation.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does not the continuing desire of the United States President to interfere in Central America tend to undermine the stability of all electoral processes in the area, so that countries, such as Costa Rica, which have continually presented a democratic front will eventually be undermined unless a united effort is made to counteract the efforts of the Contras to be based in all parts of Central America?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is worth remembering that we share with the United States Administration the common objective of a settlement in Central America on the basis of the Contadora principles. As I have said more than once in the House, there is a need for restraint on all sides in the present situation, and not least a need for Nicaragua to end the substantial build-up of arms, troops and military advisers and to stop supporting attempts to destabilise neighbouring Governments.

Mr. Healey: As both the Pope and the President of Colombia have stated that President Reagan has misrepresented their views on Nicaragua, and as President Reagan has been compelled to drop his proposals for military aid to the Contras and had his revised proposals rejected by the House of Representatives and passed by only a small majority in the Senate, will the British Government now support the forces of common sense in that area and drop their poodle-like devotion to a policy which the American President himself has already abandoned?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have not heard myself expressing poodle-like devotion to any policy, today or on any other occasion. I have made it plain that we support the common objective of a peaceful settlement in Central America on the basis of the Contadora principles, and we shall continue to support steps directed to that end.

Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions

14. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he is considering for an initiative in the Vienna talks on mutual and balanced force reductions.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): With our NATO allies, we are currently studying carefully the Eastern proposal of 14 February, which repackages elements of the East's 1983 proposals. This followed the negative response of the East to the Western initiative of April 1984, which offered a real opportunity to resolve the long-standing dispute over the size of Eastern forces.

Mr. Clarke: Is it not deplorable that the talks have gone on for 12 years without any real achievement? Does not the accession of Mr. Gorbachev provide an opportunity to accept the Russian offer to withdraw 20,000 troops from Europe if America will withdraw 13,000?

Mr. Luce: I agree that it is very sad that no progress has been made in 12 years in these very important talks. Our objective is to work for a reduction in conventional forces on both sides on a mutually balanced basis, but we cannot yet reach agreement about the size of the forces on each side. It is our firm belief that the Eastern side underestimates the size of its forces by more than 200,000 men. Until we can reach agreement on data and the actual numbers on each side, it is very difficult to make progress, let alone to solve the problem of verification?

Mr. Viggers: Does my hon. Friend agree that in all arms control negotiations sweeping declarations of intent are of little value unless they are accompanied by offers on verification and inspection?

Mr. Luce: I agree entirely that the true test of progress is not great declarations but agreement on the nuts and bolts, which in this case includes verification. We have not yet been able to persuade the other side to make good progress on that aspect. Until that is achieved, it is not possible to reach an agreement which has the trust of both sides.

Mr. Heffer: Have not the Government reacted disgracefully, as has President Reagan, to the statement by Mr. Gorbachev, just after his election to the leadership of the Soviet party and Government, that the Soviet Union was prepared to suggest that there should be a freeze on nuclear weapons? Without any question, or even study of the matter, the Prime Minister and President Reagan have immediately rushed in and said that it is not practicable. How can there be any serious discussion of force reductions if our Government and the Americans take that stupid attitude?

Mr. Luce: I must disagree with the hon. Gentleman. The true test whether both sides have good intent and are sincere in their desire to make progress in arms negotiations is whether they make progress in the confidential surroundings of Geneva, not what they say in public declarations and public sparring. That is the only way in which to make progress. In this case, as far as INF is concerned, a freeze would ossify an imbalance of six to one in favour of the Soviet Union and remove the incentive to make progress on overall arms levels, which is what we want.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as a fully participating country, Britain has leverage at the talks? Will my hon. Friend use that opportunity to impress on the Soviet Union the fact that there is no conceivable defensive reason for its overwhelming conventional superiority in Europe? Will he also impress upon the Soviet Union that a breakthrough at the talks would not only ease tension in Europe but, in turn, help towards progress at the Geneva talks on arms reduction?

Mr. Luce: That is an important point. We have a number of opportunities to talk to the Soviet leaders. We shall continue to use those opportunities to put across such points. If the Soviet Union genuinely wishes to make progress towards mutually balanced conventional forces, we must reach a proper agreement on data.

Mr. George Robertson: Does the Minister agree that what is required for a genuine arms control agreement is a bit of imagination and some political will, which seem to have been singularly absent from the MBFR talks over the past 12 years? With a new Soviet leadership and new offers on the table implying a reduction of more than 50 per cent. in Soviet troops than American troops in the European theatre, should not all forces in the West grasp the opportunity to try to break the logjam that threatens us all?

Mr. Luce: Sadly, the talks have indeed lasted for 12 years. No progress was made even during the long period of the Labour Government. There is no lack of will on our part. We are trying very hard. What we are aiming for is a balance of forces on both sides and a reduction to 900,000. I believe that that was the objective of the Labour Government. That objective makes sense, but we need a response from the other side on questions of data and verification.

Poland

15. Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his visit to Poland.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I visited Poland from 11 to 13 April. I had a full official programme, and met a wide cross-section of Polish society.

My official talks covered various aspects of East-West and bilateral relations.

I was powerfully reminded during this visit of the interests and traditions which the British and Polish peoples have in common. I made plain in all my contacts the importance that we still attach to those freedoms for which we fought together with the Poles during the second world war.

Mr. Portillo: I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his visit to eastern Europe. Can he tell us whether he met representatives of Solidarity, and, if so, what the outcome of discussions with them was?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his opening remark. I had contacts with some members of Solidarity, in order to hear their views about the situation in Poland. I regretted the fact that that led to a boycott of the reception at which I met the Solidarity members. It was helpful to me to learn their views.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: How would the Foreign Secretary like it if the Foreign Minister of a Warsaw pact country on an official visit to the United Kingdom comported himself as the right hon. and learned Gentleman did in Poland? Will the Foreign Secretary always bear in mind the wisdom of the adage, "Do as you would be done by."?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I bear that very much in mind. The pattern is that in most countries one is able to see a wide range of people, members of the Opposition and of other parties and to visit almost any part of the country. I have not seen any inhibitions put on the programme of many visitors to this country, including Mr. Gorbachev. He was free to range in many parts of London. He did not take the opportunity to visit the cemetery that he had in mind, but he took the opportunity to go to Downing street. No comparable inhibitions were put on his programme.

Sir Peter Blaker: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is relevant to the question asked by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) that Poland is a signatory to the 1975 Helsinki agreement—as is every other country in Europe — under which countries undertake to have respect for human rights? Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that that agreement also says that the observance of human rights is an important factor in the preservation of peace? When my right hon. and learned Friend visits eastern European countries and the Soviet Union, will he continue to make that point, especially in the Soviet Union, which purports to be a great peace-loving nation?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. In all my visits I drew specific and firm attention to the importance of the Helsinki agreement, exactly as he described, and I shall continue to do so.

Mr. Maclennan: Did the Foreign Secretary feel that sufficient progress, or intention to make progress, existed in regard to human rights to enable there to be any strengthening of the bilateral economic relations between Britain and Poland?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I made it plain to my Polish hosts that their stance on and progress with human rights was bound to be a factor which would affect the rest of our relations. I also discussed economic relations. There are economic factors at work as well. We hope that they will shortly sign an agreement to reschedule their 1982 to 1984 debt. We shall continue to play a constructive role in those negotiations, but the matters cannot be separated from each other.

Mr. Anderson: We warmly welcome the effective concern for human rights shown by the Foreign Secretary by his visit to the cemetery and his meeting with members of Solidarity. May we now express the hope that the same verve, imagination and force will be shown by the right hon. and learned Gentleman in respect of other parts of the world, such as Central America, Southern Africa and Indonesia, which the Prime Minister visited at the same time?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We apply the same energy to our visits in all parts of the world, Indonesia included. Questions about which the House is anxious were raised by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister as well as by me.

Middle East Wars (Casualties)

16. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the number of fatal and non-fatal casualties since the beginning of 1984 in the Iran-Iraq war, the Lebanese civil war and the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Mr. Luce: Since the beginning of 1984 there has been much tragic loss of life resulting from the Iran-Iraq conflict, the Arab-Israeli dispute, Lebanese inter-communal violence and the Israeli occupation of south Lebanon. No authoritative casualty figures are available to us. With our partners in the European Community, we have consistently called for an end to the violence, and we stand ready to support all constructive moves towards negotiated solutions of the problems of the region.

Mr. McKay: Does the Minister agree that, in view of reports from all types of media, of the three areas of conflict in the middle east, the most dangerous is the Iran-Iraq war, followed by the internal strife in Lebanon and the Arab-Israeli conflict?

Mr. Luce: I do not think that it makes a great deal of sense to apportion an order of priority. In terms of casualties, the Iran-Iraq conflict is having devastating consequences for both sides. Our priority is to work as hard as we can with other parties, principally through the United Nations and the work of the Secretary-General, for a diplomatic solution. The hon. Gentleman should not underestimate the gravity of the other problems.

Mr. Walters: As the casualties, human suffering and threat to world peace will continue in all of those areas until progress towards a settlement is reached, will my hon. Friend comment on progress towards a peace settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute? Does he think that the recent visit of Mr. Murphy has advanced the possibility of a major American initiative in the near future?

Mr. Luce: As my hon. Friend knows, we very much welcome the agreement of 11 February between King Hussein and Mr. Arafat, which we felt was a basis on which progress could be made. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has had two important discussions with President Reagan. We have kept in very close touch with the United States, and we welcome the President's statement that there will now be renewed efforts on his part to see whether progress can be made on this problem. To that end, we are very glad that Mr. Murphy is undertaking his tour of the middle east.

Mr. Faulds: Unless I misheard the hon. Gentleman, am I right in thinking that he made reference to the Israeli occupation of Lebanon, but failed to make reference to the thousands of casualties caused by the Israeli invasion of Lebanon?

Mr. Luce: No. I have already mentioned south Lebanon, and, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government strongly condemned the Israeli invasion. We are extremely critical of the iron fist policies of Israel at the present time. However, we welcome the fact that the Israeli Government have decided, in phases two and three, to withdraw within their own international borders, and we hope that they will do so as soon as possible.

Mr. Soames: What further steps can my hon. Friend take to represent the revulsion felt by many people in this country at the contemptible and grotesque behaviour of the Israeli forces in Lebanon?

Mr. Luce: I have already said — and said in the House in recent weeks—that we certainly condemn the iron fist policies, as they are called, of the Israeli Government. This cycle of violence, retaliation followed by counter-retaliation, serves no one's interests, least of all those of the people of the Lebanon. What conceivable interests of Israel can this serve? We look forward to the early and orderly withdrawal of the Israelis.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has not one of the casualties of the Arab-Israeli conflict been the fate of the 4,000 Jewish community in Syria? Will the Minister make representations to the Syrian Government on their behalf?

Mr. Luce: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the Syrian Government are well aware of this Government 's views on aspects of human rights in Syria, and they will continue to be made so aware.

Pakistan

20. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's current relations with Pakistan.

Mr. Renton: We maintain good relations with Pakistan.

Mr. Brown: Following the statement on Poland a short time ago, is it not obscene that the British Government have a close relationship with the Zia regime, which not only murders and tortures political opponents and trade unionists, but turns a blind eye to the exports of heroin to this country?

Mr. Renton: I find it quite extraordinary that the hon. Gentleman, who has twice visited Afghanistan at the invitation of the Karmal regime, should speak in such terms about Pakistan, where there are now 3 million refugees who have fled from Afghanistan and who are being looked after as well as they possibly can be by the Pakistan Government. We regularly make known to the Pakistan Government our views and concern about violations of human rights. I visited the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control Centre in Peshawar in January, and I have spoken to Pakistani and United Nations officials there about their attempts to substitute the crops from which opium and then heroin come. I remind the hon. Gentleman that elections have now been held in Pakistan—admittedly under martial law, admittedly on a non-party basis—and that six Ministers lost their seats in those elections. That, for the Opposition, should be quite a good test of progress towards democracy.

Viscount Cranborne: My hon. Friend has already referred to the results of the elections in Pakistan. Will he encourage the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown) to encourage his hon. Friends to follow President Zia's example in Afghanistan, and in particular will he tell the House how important it is for the stability of Pakistan to continue in order that the oppression of the Afghan people by the Soviets may be resisted by the will of the people themselves in refugee Pakistan?

Mr. Renton: I very much endorse what my hon. Friend has just said. It would be very good indeed if the Karmal regime in Kabul would look across the mountains south into Pakistan and take some of the tentative steps towards the restoration of democracy which are now being undertaken by President Zia.

Mr. Meadowcroft: What further representations has the Minister made to Pakistan about opium production and export from Pakistan following the revelations in The Sunday Times a few weeks ago, which appear to be well documented?

Mr. Renton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that question. It is only fair to say, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman will accept, that the responsible officials in those parts of the Pakistan Administration have, I understand, written to The Sunday Times rebutting many of the details in those articles. The growth of poppies in Pakistan is properly a matter of concern to both sides of this House, and we should all use our efforts to ensure that the crop substitution programme is successful. In fact, the Pakistanis are taking a good lead in trying to achieve that end.

Czechoslovakia

21. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his visit to Czechoslovakia.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I visited Czechoslovakia from 10 to 11 April. During the visit I met the President and Prime Minister and had talks with the Foreign Minister. I also called on Cardinal Tomasek, and met a wide cross-section of Czechoslovak society. The main theme of the official talks was East-West relations. I underlined the West's sincere wish to reduce levels of weapons through genuinely balanced and verifiable agreements. I stressed our concern for human rights throughout Europe. I also discussed bilateral relations, including trade.

Mr. Watts: I welcome what my right hon. and learned Friend has said about his visit. Does he agree that one of the best ways of increasing our beneficial influence in the countries of eastern Europe and improving our relations with them is by extending our contacts through the expansion of trade? Will he comment further on the prospects for increasing trade between the United Kingdom and Czechoslovakia?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend that trade can play a significant part in improving contacts in other ways. It was for that reason that I discussed the levels of bilateral trade with Czechoslovak Ministers. We agreed that there was scope for a large increase in trade. I have already passed details of my talks to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, who will be visiting Czechoslovakia in May.

Mr. Mason: In his talks on human rights with the Czechoslovak regime, did the right hon. and learned Gentleman enlist their aid in his efforts to apply pressure on the Soviet Union to release more Soviet Jews to Israel?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I did not seek to enlist the aid of the Governments in eastern Europe on that very important issue, which we continue to press with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his successful tour to Czechoslovakia. Will he expand on his discussions with Cardinal Tomasek? Did he have any other meetings with leaders of the very oppressed Church?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I met other representatives of the Church briefly and informally, but with Cardinal Tomasek I was able to have quite a full discussion of the problems of the Church, to which my hon. Friend has drawn attention—for example, the appointment of bishops, the admission of candidates for religious qualification and freedom of assembly. He regarded the meeting as important. I raised some of the matters with the President of the Czechoslovak Government.

Mr. Winnick: If, as I believe, it was right to speak of human rights in Czechoslovakia, is not it equally right to speak of human rights in other countries which the right hon. and learned Gentleman visits—for example, Latin America and Pakistan? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that many people in Britain, certainly in the Labour movement, remain deeply concerned about the way in which a number of people in Czechoslovakia—certainly those associated with the regime in 1968—continue to be persecuted and harassed by the Czech authorities? The Czech Government should recognise the deep feeling which exists in Britain over this matter.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am glad to have the hon. Gentleman's endorsement of the fact that concern in this country about respect for human rights in Czechoslovakia is widespread. It was on that basis that I raised the questions that I did. I agree that it is important to be ready to do so, as appropriate, in the many cases where that is necessary.

Central America

23. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent progress has been made towards stability in Central America by the Contadora countries; and what support has been given by the EEC in this respect.

Mr. Renton: We are encouraged by the resumption of Contadora talks on 11 and 12 April in Panama. We and our European Community partners continue to give firm and consistent support to the efforts of the Contadora group. We gave practical expression to this support at the meeting of European and regional Foreign Ministers at San Jose in September, attended by my right hon. and learned Friend. It has been agreed that a further ministerial meeting will be held in due course.

Mr. Lloyd: Earlier, the Foreign Secretary objected to being described by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) as an American poodle. Yet is he not just like the dog that did not bark, in that we heard him say earlier today that the American Government were seeking peaceful solutions in Central America when clearly, far from that, they are seeking a warlike solution in Nicaragua? Is it not time that the British Government placed it clearly on the record that we condemn American adventurism in that region?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Member is totally misguided in his supplementary question. The American Government have stated time and again that they are seeking a solution by peaceful means to the problems of Central America. Indeed, no country would benefit more from a solution by peaceful means in Central America than the United States. After all, the problem is very much at its back door.

I remind the hon. Member, in regard to the earlier part of his question, that our approach in that region is very much one of partnership with our European Community partners. We have together sought a joint approach. That was the attitude at San Jose last year. The same message lies behind the approach of offering European Community aid to the region.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does not yesterday's decision by the House of Representatives encourage the Government to think again about their whole aid approach to the Contadora countries? Is it not despicable that Nicaragua's aid should be held back, that in Costa Rica aid is 40 times more and in Honduras 100 times more? Surely that is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Renton: I do not think that it is for us at this stage to comment on or get involved in the process of voting that is still going on in Congress. The Senate voted in favour of the $14 million requested by President Reagan; the House of Representatives voted against. As I understand it, there are to be further votes, and the whole matter is still up for debate in Congress.

Viscount Cranborne: Can my hon. Friend tell the House whether Cuba interferes in Central America?

Mr. Renton: Yes. Of course, the answer is that Cuba does interfere in Central America. That is one of the things that greatly worries the United States and should worry us as well.

Mr. Healey: Does the Minister agree that President Reagan's policy on Central America, thank God, is collapsing in all directions, that the Contadora countries have rejected his attempt to give military aid to the Contras and that Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama are all now attempting to achieve a non-military solution to the problem? Does he further agree that the British Government should identify themselves with all those forces inside the American Congress and in the Contadora countries which reject the President's approach to the problem? Finally, does he agree that the British Government should stop licking the President's boots, because there is no reason to do so?

Mr. Renton: The right hon. Gentleman seems to be obsessed by the metaphor about licking boots. I assure him that no one on this side of the House is licking boots. As he will know, by happenstance he and I were in Washington at the same time earlier this week. Doubtless we read the same editions of the Washington Post, and went to see Members of Congress on the same day, although perhaps different members. He will know, too, that opinion in Washington is very divided, just as it is, for example, in some of the Latin American countries. After all, the President of Colombia has expressed two different opinions about the American offer. I think it only right that we should allow time for the Americans to reach their decision as to how they spend their money in this very important area.

Mr. Heffer: How can the hon. Gentleman, speaking on behalf of the Government, say in all honesty that the United States wants a peaceful solution when in recent days President Reagan has said on television—I am sure that many hon. Members saw the programme—that the Contras were like the French Resistance? First, there can be no such parallel, and, secondly, that can hardly be described as any idea of a peaceful solution.

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman appears totally to forget the effect of the presence of Cuba in countries such as Nicaragua and the fact that there have been Marxist-Leninist infiltrations into Central America and a spread of arms and violence in Nicaragua. That is what the United States is worried about, just as the hon. Gentleman would be if this country were in the same geographical position to Central America as the United States. That is why this issue gives the Americans such deep concern, although, of course, they want to achieve a solution by peaceful means.

European Community Questions

3.30 pm

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to draw your attention, in case it has escaped your notice, to the fact that this is the first occasion of the use of the new experimental system under which the 20-minute slot traditionally allocated to European Community questions has been absorbed into the overall hour for Foreign and Commonwealth Office questions.

I make no complaint about the fact that on this occasion only three European Community questions were reached, instead of the normal seven, eight, or nine which would have been reached under the previous system, but I wish to inform you that this change, which was announced by the Leader of the House just before Easter, on a Friday, in a written parliamentary answer — it having been agreed between the usual channels—does not reflect the feelings of a large number of Opposition Members. I cannot speak for Conservative Members.

The Leader of the House should take note of the fact that at the end of the experimental period we shall expect to be consulted not merely by our own usual channels but by him, perhaps in a debate on the subject, so that we can make our views absolutely clear. It is wrong that the new questions system should apply to an organisation such as the European Community, which, unlike South Africa, the countries of central America or the countries of eastern Europe, has the power to tax and legislate for the British people. We should have a separate slot to enable us to question Ministers on those matters.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you advise the House of the length of the experimental period for EEC questions? As we are about to enter a crucial period of major decisions being taken on the EEC, it would be regrettable if hon. Members were denied the opportunity to ask questions on Common Market matters because such questions are now subject to the usual ballot rather than to the certainty of the previous system. Can you say for how long the experiment is likely to run?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): One at a time, please. Mr. Teddy Taylor.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask you to advise me and other hon. Members who feel outraged at this decision, announced in a written answer, what rights we have as Back Benchers to seek to bring about a change in the situation? For example, are we able to put a motion before the House? What can we do to stop what has been unilaterally imposed, against the wishes of Back Benchers?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I appreciate that the responsibility for this change in the system cannot be put on your shoulders, but do you agree that it would be a good idea for you to examine the matter in view of the fact, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) said, that few questions relating to the Common Market were asked today under the new system? It is fair to assume that had we been allowed the 20 minutes which used to be available for EEC questions there would have been a call for a Division on the £240 million which the Government have agreed to pay, as part of the £1·2 billion settlement, to bale out the Common Market. There were few questions on the EEC, and therefore, incredibly, on the day after we heard the news about the increase, we did not have an opportunity to raise the matter.

I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will take this matter back to Mr. Speaker, so that we can return to the old system and have a real good crash-in against the Common Market in order to reflect the views of the majority of the members of the Parliamentary Labour party, and eventually get out from underneath the gigantic mess into which the Tories, the SDP and the Liberals dragged us a few years ago.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House has surrendered its sovereignty over trade policy. The House has surrendered its sovereignty over agriculture policy. The House is increasingly surrendering its sovereignty over the taxation of our people. Are we also to surrender the right to debate and discuss this issue? How was this decision arrived at, and what can we do about it?

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Has not the House been unfair to the Government about this? I am sure that the Government wish to explain their attitude, and it would be unthinkable for them——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought that the hon. Gentleman was raising a point of order.

Mr. Budgen: My point of order is that the Government, and particularly the Foreign Secretary, should be allowed an opportunity to explain——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. I am prepared to accept points of order, but not speeches. We cannot debate this matter now.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not a fact that the change in the way that questions are asked on Foreign Office days was made after wide consultation——

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Utter rubbish. Who was consulted?

Sir Peter Blaker: —and after widespread demand? How is it that so many hon. Members are complaining about the new situation when they could perfectly well have put in questions to be answered today if they had wanted to?

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): May I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, perform my usual role as a pourer of oil on troubled waters? I wish first, to mitigate any embarrassment which you personally, may feel, by saying that I understand that this was agreed between the usual channels. Secondly, we would have had twice as many questions on the European Community if all those who had put down questions had bothered to turn up for Question time today. Thirdly, I ask for an assurance from the Government that they will, as I have requested, make a statement tomorrow on the budgetary decisions of the European Council. I understand that the Minister concerned was rather too tired to make that statement today.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It may be helpful if I say something now. First, the House will recognise that these matters are not for me but for the usual channels and for the House to decide. I deliberately allowed points of order to be freely expressed, because the House will notice that the Leader of the House is with us. I thought it right that he should have the opportunity to hear the House's response to what I understand is the first time that this experiment has been tried. I was aware that this was an experiment, so when we came to EEC questions I allowed a little more latitude than I might otherwise have done.

However, these matters are for the usual channels. I understand that the experiment was introduced after consultation and in the light of representations that had been made. I hope that the House will now leave the matter, in the knowledge that the Leader of the House has heard a fairly wide cross-section of views. Therefore, I hope that we can proceed to other business.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. While it is advantageous that the Leader of the House is present, it is you who protects the minorities' interests. We in the Liberal party, who are in favour of the Community, are also in favour of retaining the Community section for questions.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You represent our interests. To say that the usual channels represent Back Benchers is the most ludicrous thing of all. The usual channels represent only the interests of the Front Benches on either side of the House. We Back Benchers, who are the great downtrodden majority, are asking you to accept that if there are Question Times for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, which, in God's name, cost us all enough, we should have a chance to ask specific questions on the Common Market, given what that costs us. We appeal to you, and not to the usual channels.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The House will be aware that there was an adverse proportion of voices opposed to these new arrangements. It is essential that it should be made clear that a large number of us eagerly support the new arrangements. They mean that there is more time for real foreign affairs questions. If the complaint is that there is not an opportunity, with these new arrangements, to make representations about the taxing capacity of the Community, should not those questions be transferred and taken out of Treasury time rather than Foreign Office time?

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Several of us have been following this issue for some time. In the past few years there have been occasions when up to 80 questions have been tabled to the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, all relating to the rest of the world. Of them, about 10 or 12 have been reached. However, in a period of 20 minutes, eight or 10 questions addressed to the Foreign Secretary may all be answered, all relating to the EEC. On several occasions I have called the attention of the House to that anomaly. It puts one part of the world—the EEC—in a privileged position, to which it is not entitled.

As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is present and is listening carefully to this short exchange, I hope he will realise that many of us think that the experiment should be regarded as a permanent change for the better.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot debate this matter now. It is turning into a debate on an issue for which I have no responsibility. It is not for Mr. Speaker to determine what time should be allocated to which Departments when answering questions. That is a matter for the Leader of the House and the usual channels. The Leader of the House has been present throughout the exchanges, has heard what has been said, and will doubtless take it into account. We must now move on to the next business.

Schoolchildren (Absence from School)

3.42 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent attention, namely,

"the encouragement of young people to go on strike in our schools tomorrow."

All hon. Members accept and understand the legal obligations on children to attend school. Indeed, all parents accept them, too. Local education authorities provide the means for the education of our children. However, it has come to my attention that adults are encouraging schoolchildren to play truant from school tomorrow. Several Young Socialists recently attended my constituency surgery in Basildon and proudly told me that they had been distributing leaflets and posters in my constituency about the strike tomorrow. When I told them that I suspected that this strike was one of the few which the Labour party would not be supporting and that I suspected it would be the Militant Tendency Members who would support it, they said that it was nice to know that there were at least a few decent Members of Parliament left.

I have received many anxious telephone calls from parents, who are greatly worried about the situation. I seek to move the Adjournment of the House in a spirit of helpfulness. I wish to help the Labour party. I believe that if we——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot move the Adjournment of the House in that spirit. He must have regard to the Standing Order, which requires him to tell the House why it is a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration.

Mr. Amess: If an Adjournment debate were held on the subject, it would give the Leader of the Opposition and the Labour Front Bench an opportunity to state clearly where the Labour party stands. The county council election is to take place on Thursday 2 May, and many people wish to decide for whom they will vote on the crucial matter of education.

I believe that all hon. Members and parents would welcome a debate on this subject, and I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will allow it to take place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Basildon (Mr Amess) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely

"the encouragement of young people to go on strike in our schools tomorrow."

I listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Avon

3.45 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision for local government services in Avon.

I move this motion on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks), whose parliamentary duties make it impossible for him to do so.

It is a pleasure to move this motion because I did national service in the RAF in what is now part of the county of Avon, and because the area has strong and historic links with Birmingham and the west midlands through their shared background in manufacturing industry. Both areas have benefited from the genius of Isambard Brunel, the pioneering engineer of whom we have such sore need today.

The Bill seeks to bring the Government to book for the damage that they have inflicted on the county of Avon. This destructive Government's general policies on local government are bad enough alongside their belief that the faceless men and women in Whitehall know better than elected local councillors, but the Government's rate support grant policies have also hit Avon hard. Since 1980 no less than £81 million has been stolen in RSG from Avon by the Government. That is bad enough in terms of services which matter vitally to many families, including the lowest paid and the poorer families among the 930,000 people of Avon. But that is not all. In 1975-76, 36p in every pound of council spending was met by local ratepayers, with the other 64p coming more fairly from central taxes. Ten years on, in 1985-86, ratepayers have to pay 72p in every pound, central taxes only 28p. The Government have stolen local money to spend more nationally. The burden has been deliberately switched from taxpayer to Avon ratepayer under an unfair system which the Prime Minister promised to abolish and has not. The blame for the burden of rates rests four-square with this Government.

In 1974, Avon county was conjured up by the then Tory Government out of Bristol and parts of Somerset and Gloucestershire. It had no administrative centre on which to build and its creation had more to do with expected political advantage than anything else. The new area was expected to repair years of Tory neglect in the rural areas to bring services up to those earlier achieved in Bristol. To a large extent Bristol was expected to pick up most of the bill.

Labour-led since 1981, Avon has done much to try to improve services, with declining support from the Government and, indeed, financial harassment. With assistance from bodies such as the Avon Co-operative Development Agency and the Avon Enterprise Board, new hi-tech industry has been attracted into the county from the nearest end of silicon valley around Swindon. Now, 98 out of every 100 children entitled to three years of infant education are getting it. That is no mere statistic, because education missed before the age of five, or, for that matter, at any other time, is education lost for good. Sixteen new nursery classes have been opened by the county council and the pupil-teacher ratio has been reduced in both primary and secondary schools to give better attention to pupils' needs.

There are 1,000 more elderly and handicapped people who now have home helps and extra places in residential homes. Small workshops have been built and financial help has been given from the £2 million economic development fund to help to create and expand jobs and business. Bus services have been improved and fares kept down—so much so that there are more passengers.

All this energy under the leadership of Councillor Andy Post contrasts with the record and threat of the Conservatives. All that they want are cuts, poorer services and higher charges—the same old dismal recipe by direction of "Her Mistress's Voice".

The Liberals are as bad. As late as June of last year they wanted a 2p in the pound cut across the board, irrespective of what that would do to schoolchildren, the elderly and the handicapped.

The Bill requires the Secretary of State to report on the damage done to Avon through successive cuts in rate support grant and to propose ways in which this can be reversed, in order better to meet the known needs of the people of Avon.

I pray in aid as well the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General, which includes extracts from the report of the Audit Commission for Local Authorities in England and Wales, published yesterday, when it makes the point:

"Some authorities are receiving less grant than their circumstances might warrant; and, by the same token, some are receiving more. The difference for a large city could easily amount to +£15 million in grant every year."

The report continues with a message for the Government:

"Local authorities' expenditure targets different from the GRE (revised) should be abolished as soon as practically possible, thus removing some of the perverse incentives in the present system."

It then adds, and this is the justification for the Bill:

"Local market forces (i.e. the local electorate) should eventually determine the level of local expenditure—provided that local accountability can be suitably strengthened".

3.51 pm

Mr. Jack Aspinwall (Wansdyke) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. Member wish to oppose the motion?

Mr. Aspinwall: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I seek to oppose the Bill because, once again, the House has been faced with nothing more than a publicity stunt. It is all part of a scheme to try to enhance the chances of Labour in the county council elections on 2 May.

Avon has been targeted because Labour can see that it will lose its overall majority, which is just two. In a sense this attention is welcome, because it shows a great respect for the view that Avon county council will again become Conservative on 2 May.

There has been a long-running campaign, of which the Bill is part, and the other day it even included a visit from the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock). It was ironical that when he was delivering meals on wheels the first recipient was a Conservative voter. I understand that today we have a visit from the Opposition Front Bench spokesman on education. I wonder whether that attention will still be given after 2 May.

The use of propaganda has become widespread in Avon. We have a fine example of an unbiased free newspaper, "Avon Report", delivered to every home, full of photographs of Labour members, at a gross cost of £210,000 to the ratepayers, while that excellent local paper, the Western Daily Press, is banned from local branches of libraries. Even the county's logo is copied on Labour party literature. Arrangements are being made to open long-standing projects during the three weeks in the run-up to the election, for propaganda purposes.

How can the Bill be introduced when the Labour leaders of Avon county council know full well that since 1981 the rates have increased by 71 per cent., the second highest of the shire counties in the country? During the same period earnings have risen by 30 per cent. and prices by 25 per cent.

There have been many fine examples of senseless overspending, such as a welfare rights campaign costing £200,000, a Sheffield-based local government campaign unit, £5,000, and CND, £900. Those are just a few examples.

Unemployment is a serious worry, particularly for young people, and many prospective employers have been frightened away — with a consequent loss of job prospects—by high rate charges and uncertainty. The Bristol chamber of commerce, representing many employers in Avon, has said that ratepayers face either a significant rate rise in 1986-87 or a sudden unplanned cut in services. That information came from recent rate consultation meetings with Avon county council.

Much of the problem has arisen because of the administration's policy, regardless of the means of the ratepayers to foot the bill. The county plans to spend £349 million in 1985-86. That cost has been reduced by the so-called financing adjustments, but it is still £10 million over the Government target. That overspending attracts a grant penalty of £28 million, payable to central Government. Many of the financing adjustments cannot be repeated next year, and similar overspending would entail a much increased penalty.

The rate increase for 1985-86 of 6·5 per cent. is acceptable. Members of the Bristol Chamber of Commerce warned that in 1986-87 the rise in rates could be at a level not known in recent years if there was no change in policy. Such high rates would mean less money for industry and commerce to spend on investment and jobs. That is the view of a responsible, non-political body —the Bristol chamber of commerce—and many others.

Avon citizens are entitled to good services and a well-run and caring administration at a price that can be afforded. That will be achieved when, again, we have a Conservative administration in the county of Avon. Therefore, I ask the House to reject the motion.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and Nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business):—

Financial Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

4.6 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): This is the second opportunity that the House will have had in nine months to debate matters concerning the financial services industry, the protection of investors and the City of London. Last July the House debated the Gower report. Today, we have before us the Government's White Paper.

It is remarkable how both the financial markets and perceptions of the requirements of investor protection have been changing since Professor Gower started his work. The scene is still changing, but our objectives remain the same: first, to enable the financial services industry to provide services to industry and commerce, private investors and the Government in the most efficient and economic way; secondly, to stimulate and encourage innovation; thirdly, to inspire confidence in issuers and investors by ensuring that the financial services sector is, and is seen to be, a clean place in which to do business; fourthly, to ensure that the system of investor protection is flexible enough not to cramp structural and other changes in the industry and not to be overrun by events. The White Paper which I published in late January is aimed at those objectives. The legislation which I hope to bring forward in the next Session will be designed to create a regulatory system powerful enough to deliver the objectives, but flexible enough to remain effective during further periods of rapid change.

It is change which has characterised the City in recent times, especially since July 1983. It was then that my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, told the House that the Stock Exchange had put forward proposals which were an adequate basis for legislation to stop the case brought by the Director General of Fair Trading against the exchange in the Restrictive Practices Court.

Of course, the ill-informed and the prejudiced described that as a sell-out and claimed that it would leave the status quo unchanged. Indeed, some of the well-informed and unprejudiced also questioned my right hon. Friend's judgment. They were of course wrong. Change has gone on apace since then. Many stockbroking or stockjobbing firms have formed links with banks or other institutions outside the exchange.

Stock Exchange members are now considering constitutional changes which could lead to corporate membership. New trading systems for both equities and gilts are planned for 1986, in time for the end-year deadline set by the Government for the abolition of minimum dealing commissions.

The shape of the City is changing, in response both to the growing internationalisation of markets, to new developments in information technology and to the need for fresh sources of capital to exploit those opportunities. There is no lack of urgency in the City. Indeed, the emergence of firms willing to trade in listed securities outside the Stock Exchange emphasises the need for swift completion of the reforms.

I believe that the changes in the City are serving to enhance the status of the United Kingdom as one of the primary financial centres of the world. The flexibility and expertise of practitioners providing a wide range of financial services have long been and will continue to be among the principal factors in our favour. The removal of restrictions such as exchange control has given the markets a liberal environment in which competitiveness between businesses and between our market and those abroad is enhanced.

The White Paper proposes a new regulatory structure to maintain and improve that spirit of competition, ensuring that it will meet the needs of those dealing in the market and thus consolidate the United Kingdom's international standing. As I have said, subject to the parliamentary timetable, I plan to present in the next Session legislation to implement the White Paper proposals.

The general reaction to the White Paper proposals has been favourable. The basic approach of self-regulation within a statutory framework has received widespread support, as indeed have the main elements in our proposals. We have also received many constructive and helpful comments and suggestions.

The drafting of the legislation is proceeding on schedule, but many details remain to be worked out, so in many cases further comments, from whatever standpoint, can still be taken into account. Indeed, this debate comes in time for the House to make its views known.

Before I go on to consider the White Paper proposals, I should again pay tribute to the work of Professor Gower, who has been responsible for so much of the change in thinking that has taken place in recent years. His report and the many discussions and consultations leading up to it have made an invaluable contribution to the thinking on this subject. Indeed, as I have said they have profoundly changed the thinking and played a key role in developing a new regulatory structure able to command the support and respect of both the financial community and investors.

Much of the interest in the White Paper has centred on the institutional framework that it proposes. I decided not to uproot the system which has served so well in the past but to build on it, to strengthen it, to repair its faults, to bring it up to date and to provide for future developments. Let there be no doubt, however, about the extent of the changes which the White Paper proposes.

The powers to regulate are to be granted by Parliament to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and only at his discretion will those powers be delegated to bodies meeting the criteria of the legislation and his approval. Those powers will be granted to the bodies only so long as they are properly used, and the Secretary of State will retain the power to withdraw the powers from a body or bodies and grant them to another, or indeed to wield those powers himself.

It would be an unwise Secretary of State who took such action except in circumstances which, I believe, are so unlikely as to be almost beyond reasonable speculation, but I do not believe that Parliament would be prepared to grant the necessary powers "freehold" to the new authorities.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I understand that, although the Secretary of State will retain power to alter things, he will need the agreement of the Bank of England to appoint the chairman. It would certainly be unwise not to consult, but constitutionally it would be a great weakness to give any outside body the power to overrule the Secretary of State, and thus the House. In my view, although it is clearly right to discuss the matter with the Bank of England, handing over a power of veto is a constitutional outrage to which the House should not agree. The power should stay here and not be handed over to anyone else.

Mr. Tebbit: I hope that my hon. Friend will not be unduly outraged. I believe that there is a place for the influence of the Governor of the Bank of England and for the influence of the Secretary of State. As my hon. Friend knows, in the area in which the Department has been the traditional regulator — the area to be covered by the marketing of investments board—the Secretary of State will appoint all the members. In the area which has traditionally been governed to some extent by the Bank of England as well as by the Secretary of State, there is a joint approach embodied in our proposals for the appointment of members of the securities and investments board. I think that it is overstating the case to refer to that as a constitutional outrage. In my view, it is a practical way of handling the problem of dual oversight of some markets.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) is not alone. There is great concern that the proposals for the SIB, as opposed to the MIB, effectively give a power of veto to the Governor of the Bank of England because in this case his agreement is required, whereas for the MIB only consultation is required, as with other sections of the industry. Many of us are concerned about the steady encroachment of the Bank of England in this area. We trust the judgment of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the appointment of the chairman of the SIB, and we do not want the role of the Bank of England to be extended in that way.

Mr. Tebbit: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the kind way in which he has suggested that he trusts my judgment, perhaps even more than that of the Governor of the Bank of England, in this respect, and no doubt I shall remain Secretary of State for a long time—but not for ever. At some time, a Secretary of State whose views are not so understanding of the City may have these powers. Many people in the City feel that it is a nice balance to have the influence of both the Bank of England and the Secretary of State in this respect.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): As the right hon. Gentleman has referred to a future Secretary of State, perhaps he will allow me to intervene. He has suggested that the purpose of the Bank of England veto, which is understandably criticised by his hon. Friends, is to guard against what a Labour Secretary of State might do. Will he explain why the Secretary of State in a Government accountable to Parliament should permit an appointment suggested by him to be vetoed by an official of the state? It is a monstrous proposition, given that the right hon. Gentleman, for all his faults, is accountable to the House, whereas the Governor of the Bank of England is not.

Mr. Tebbit: I am prepared to take criticism on this from my hon. Friends, but I am certainly not prepared to take it from a man who served under a Prime Minister whose motto was, "Find out what the trade unions want and give it to them." If any Government allowed the proposals of Parliament to be vetoed by outside bodies, it was the Government in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman served.

I am trying to deal with a perfectly practical problem, to find the best way to set up a self-regulatory agency under the statutory powers to be delegated to it. There is a strong body of opinion in the City to the effect that it is no bad thing to have the influence of professional City opinion alongside that of politicians, of whatever party, in this matter.

Mr. John Smith: The City will have a veto.

Mr. Tebbit: The right hon. and learned Gentleman constantly calls it a veto, but we consult and then reach a conclusion. The Secretary of State also has a profound influence over the appointment of the board members, who are in the majority. It is a nicely balanced arrangement. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) is trying to make bricks without much straw.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the criticism of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beamont-Dark) might be more forceful but for the nationalisation of the Bank of England? The Governor is now, as the right hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, not an independent figure. He may wish to appear independent, but he is a servant of the state, and to that extent subordinate to the Government.

Mr. Tebbit: Chancellors have in the past occasionally suggested that the Governor was too independent. My hon. Friend's point is interesting, but this is not a matter of great constitutional propriety. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) may feel that it is, but his colleagues in the City may not share his view about the practicality of these matters.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: This is an important issue. My right hon. Friend says that some of my friends in the City may not share my view. I speak as an elected Member of this House. In the end, those who are elected to this House are answerable to the House, not to the City. Cannot my right hon. Friend see the difference between being in the City and being elected to this House? My right hon. Friend keeps using the word "consultation". If the Bill were to stipulate that we must consult the Governor of the Bank of England, that would be right. If it refers to agreement, there is a veto. For the House to agree to a veto is a constitutional outrage.

Mr. Tebbit: My hon. Friend has already made that point. I am aware of the difference between being a Member of this House — or, more particularly, a Minister—and being in the City. For a start, we earn much less.

We are trying to design a practical system of regulation which has the confidence of investors and practitioners in the City. That is why I say that my hon. Friend might consider consulting those who are to operate the scheme in the City, and those who use the services of the City. He will find that the general mood is one of support for my proposal, rather than one of outrage at what I do not believe is a constitutional issue.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Can the Secretary of State tell us how many other instances there are in which the appointee of one Minister exercises a veto over the appointment rights of another Minister?

Mr. Tebbit: I cannot. I am not especially concerned about that matter. I am concerned with constructing a practical system that will work. No doubt we shall be able to dredge through the records and eventually find a precedent — [Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman should not be so contemptuous of officials of the Department. He should have more respect for them.

There is a long tradition — overwhelmingly an honourable tradition—of self-regulation in the City, but markets are changing at a remarkable pace. New products, new services and new traders are coming into the markets and some wide gaps are showing between the regulated areas as well as weaknesses within them. The Government have concluded that regulatory coverage should be extended to cover all investment business. To that end, both investment and investment business will be defined in the legislation.

As the House knows, it is proposed to delegate power to the two new proposed bodies, the securities and investments board and the marketing of investments board. It will be for those bodies to draw up rules for the authorisation of investment business and the conduct of business. These rules will have to give effect to the principles described in the White Paper; safeguards against conflicts of interest, compensation proposals, protection of clients' assets and disclosure, and so on. Clearly, I shall have to be convinced that the rules are adequate and will be effectively enforced before I delegate powers.

Practitioner-based regulation will not be a soft option. Since the bodies will involve both practitioners and users of financial services as well as market regulators, the identification and response to rule-breaking or new forms of misconduct can be rapid and flexible. They will be up with or ahead of the play in a way which an undelegated system could not hope to be.

The task of the boards will not be easy, so I am particularly pleased that Sir Kenneth Berrill and Mr. Mark Weinberg have agreed to take charge of the preparations to set them up, and that Mr. Martin Jacomb has agreed to act as Sir Kenneth's deputy chairman. I am sure that the House will agree with me that the willingness of men of such calibre to serve is a good omen indeed, and reflects well on the system of finding such men.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North) rose——

Mr. Tebbit: The composition of Mr. Weinberg's committee has already been announced and it has met. It has put it to me that its work would be assisted by the appointment of a person with knowledge of building societies. I have accepted that advice and hope to make an appointment shortly. The names of Sir Kenneth's other colleagues will be announced quite soon.

There has been criticism of the White Paper's proposal of two boards rather than one. It has been suggested that one board would be a tidier arrangement. The background to the proposal lies in the advice received from the Governor of the Bank of England and a group of insurance and unit trust representatives. It is not a point on which my mind has finally been made up. Sir Kenneth and Mr. Weinberg and their colleagues will have views. The House will have views. I shall certainly not insist on there being two boards, if no advantage is seen in this arrangement.

There is ample work to be done by the two organising committees in preparing for the implementation of the new system.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Sir Kenneth Berrill is reported to have said, on his appointment, that he did not see himself as a policeman. Given that one of the underlying principles of the White Paper is crime prevention, surely that is precisely what he ought to be.

Mr. Tebbit: My hon. Friend may have misunderstood Sir Kenneth's point. What he meant was that his job as a regulator will not so much be to track down crime as to prevent crime and to make sure that the City is a clean place in which to operate. Sir Kenneth lays great stress on that aspect of his work.

Before leaving the question of structure, I should say that I am mildly surprised that there should be any doubt about how the costs of regulation should be met. It will fall to the beneficiaries — those who use the financial markets.

I want now to consider the objectives of the new regulatory framework as a whole and how the Government's proposals will achieve these objectives in relation to each of the main groups of interests involved — investors, those seeking to raise finance and practitioners.

First, I should like to say a word about the small investor. Believing in the benefits of wider share ownership, the Government have acted to encourage the spread of share ownership through the halving of stamp duty, the abolition of investment income surcharge and within the privatisation programme. Although large investors and professional institutions have access to the expertise needed to assess the merits of investment proposals and advice, the small investor needs more help and protection and will benefit from the Government's proposals.

As I have said, there will be a new and comprehensive definition of what constitutes investment and investment business and it will be an offence to carry on such business without authorisation. The investor dealing with an authorised business will know that that business is regarded as being "fit and proper" to undertake investment activities and is subject to rules designed to ensure the proper conduct of those activities. There will be rules requiring disclosure of the information an investor needs to make up his mind about an investment, and the definition of investment business will include the giving of investment advice.

Advisers will be under a duty of skill and care, requiring them to take account of the circumstances of each client and to disclose their interests in any investments which they might recommend. Many small investors depend on professional advice, and these provisions will help to ensure that it should be unbiased and relevant to their financial needs and interests.

The principles governing the conduct of business rules will ensure that the boards make rules requiring investment businesses to segregate funds belonging to their clients and to have adequate compensation arrangements in the event of loss arising from fraud, negligence or failure to comply with the requirements for the protection of clients' assets.

[Mr. Tebbit]

Some of the comments that we have received on the White Paper suggest that our proposals on these points go too far and will be unduly costly. We shall consider these comments, but it remains our objective that there should be full segregation and full compensation for private investors in the circumstances which I have described.

Of course, many small investors prefer to invest in "collective" forms of investment, such as unit trusts or life assurance policies, which offer a wide spread of holdings and the benefit of professional management. We propose to avoid over-regulation of unit trusts so as to enhance the range of schemes available, while maintaining essential safeguards. The legislation will also extend the mainstream investor protection system to cover life assurance policies for the first time.

Standards for the selling of life assurance have much improved and the profession's status has been raised—for example, through the establishment of the Insurance Brokers Registration Council—but the proposals in the White Paper go further.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): The Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977, which is known more intimately nationally and internationally as the Page Act, will be amended, and I wonder whether, when my right hon. Friend amends it, he will think of extending it to cover a wider range of insurance intermediaries.

Mr. Tebbit: I note what my hon. Friend says. I pay tribute to his part in that legislation. If I can, I shall endeavour to take a page out of his book. I suppose that that is the right expression. I propose that, unless intermediaries are tied to an insurance company which takes full responsibility for them, those who sell life assurance will in future need authorisation and be subject to conduct of business rules about, for example, avoidance of conflict of interest and the protection of clients' funds, which will ensure protection similar to that available to those who buy unit trust and other securities.

The White Paper, and the Bill that will follow it, are about the protection of investors and investments. In such a measure it would not be right to cover non-investment aspects of insurance. That different area of activity might or might not need attention in due course, but this is not the right vehicle for any changes.

All of the measures that I have described will be of considerable benefit to the small investor and will, I believe, help to encourage more people to invest directly or indirectly in shares and similar investments.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): While discussing the interests of small investors, will the Government apply to themselves the same standards as they propose to apply to others when offering investment vehicles? My right hon. Friend might recall a poster which depicted the beatific scene of a clergyman radiating confidence in the financial aftermath of buying national savings certificates. Does my right hon. Friend agree that inflation is the worst fraud that can be perpetrated on the public? Will he deplore that and bear such considerations in mind?

Mr. Tebbit: I have frequently described inflation as the most unjust form of taxation that has yet been devised. I stand by that view. I do not know who the beatific clergyman in that advertisement was, but perhaps we could sponsor a contest for who to put in the next one.

However well regulated the system, and however adequate the disclosure of relevant facts, there will always be people who make bad decisions or who take a risk that goes wrong. The responsibility on the individual for his own decisions on how he invests will in no way be diminished, nor should it be.

The larger individual investor and the professional investor will also benefit from the investor protection measures which I have outlined. The professional investor is, however, in a better position to assess risks for himself, so we propose to continue to allow certain circulars and other offers of investment to be sent to professional investors, even though they may not be sent to other investors, and to allow certain information requirements to be dispensed with in their case.

We also propose to widen the definition of eligible professionals to include those dealing extensively in futures, and we propose to allow authorised business to pass information about less orthodox investments to clients who, although not professionals, are sufficiently expert to understand the risks involved.

There has been some criticism of this proposal, but I believe that it is a desirable recognition of the differing needs of different groups of investors and the need to avoid over-regulation and nannying of those well able to take care of themselves.

Those who talk about the financial markets often seem to forget the needs of those who want to raise capital. They too will benefit by the removal of restrictions and the promotion of competition, which will ensure a wide choice of methods of raising capital in the cheapest possible way.

The White Paper proposes changes in the law on prospectuses to standardise rules governing civil and criminal liabilities for omissions and mis-statements in offer documents and to bring the content of all offer documents within a single set of provisions. The law on this subject is now out of date and complex. Clearer provisions will help companies wanting to raise finance as well as investors trying to understand offer documents.

We do not intend to impose unnecessary requirements on companies. Indeed, smaller companies will be able to take advantage of the proposal that offers of securities in a company made to fewer than 40 people will no longer be regarded as offers to the public and will not be subject to the full prospectus requirements. This should facilitate the raising of capital for small companies. The choice of 40 as the permitted number of recipients of such offers is of course somewhat arbitrary, and I would welcome views on the matter.

I have already said something about practitioners. Our aim is to strike a reasonable balance between investor protection and over-regulation which would be likely to stifle new developments and increase the costs. It has been argued that the cost of regulation will make the United Kingdom a less competitive place in which to do business, but if investors believe that their interests will not be adequately protected they will take their business elsewhere. Over-regulation would also be damaging and we are determined to avoid it, but a clean well-regulated market will attract more business to the United Kingdom.

The growth of financial conglomerates and the growing amount of international business raise new problems for regulators. Many of the new financial conglomerates will undertake a much wider range of activities than those covered by the financial services White Paper, but reform is going on apace.

The White Paper and the subsequent legislation are but one aspect of the modernisation of the laws and regulatory arrangements in this area. Company law has, at long last, been consolidated, although I fear that it will not be many years before another companies Act comes along.

The Government are drawing up legislation on building societies. A review of banking legislation is currently under way. A consultative document on personal pensions has been published. When all these exercises have been completed, we shall have a modern legislative framework.

On the enforcement side, the new fraud investigation group has been set up to facilitate the investigation and prosecution of major fraud, and Lord Roskill's committee is considering the conduct of criminal proceedings arising from fraud. Whatever regulatory framework we design, however, financial conglomerates, by their very nature, will be subject to more than one regulatory regime in respect of their different activities.

Our regulators will have to work closely together to avoid unnecessary duplication of requirements and to ensure that there are no gaps in the regulatory system, and that the overall financial and technical resources of a business are adequate for the whole range of its activities. Naturally, we shall also continue to develop close relationships with those concerned with investment supervision overseas both to facilitate co-operation against international fraud and to encourage the opening up of overseas markets to British firms.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for corporate affairs has recently returned from visits to other European capitals and to the United States for some talks on these subjects, and he will no doubt say something about them later in this debate if he has the good fortune to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

During my own recent visit to Japan I stressed the importance which we attach to the liberalisation of Japanese financial markets. Some results are beginning to be seen. The granting of branch licences to United Kingdom firms to deal in securities has begun, and I hope that more liberalisation will be forthcoming. I also emphasised the potential benefits to Japanese investors and those seeking capital of using the City of London's unmatched expertise in investment management and financial advice.

Over recent months the Government have received plenty of advice of these matters of investor protection and market reform. Much though not all of that advice has been well considered and well informed. However, even within that category there have been widely differing views.

In principle, we have rejected both the nostalgic extreme views on self-regulation and the demands for bureaucratic state or neo-state regulation. On that matter the Government's position is absolutely firm. Equally, we believe that the pattern of self-regulation under delegated powers set out in the White Paper forms a coherent response to the needs of the City and its customers.

There are, of course, details on which my mind is not finally set, and I have referred to some of these in my speech. I would welcome the views of the House particularly, and of others outside. There is no supreme single everlasting right answer to many of the problems that we face in regulating these markets. It is in that spirit that I commend the White Paper to the House.

4.43 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I am grateful for the way in which the Secretary of State ended his speech, which seemed to indicate a disposition on the part of the Government to listen to observations that will be made during the debate. As the Secretary of State indicated, this is not the first opportunity that the House has had to discuss part one of Professor Gower's report "Review of Investor Protection". If there were a conclusion to be drawn from the debate of 16 July 1984, I think it would be that the message of the House was that a minimalist solution to the problems of the City was not enough, and something more would have to be done. I think that it would be fair to say that this is not a minimalist solution.

I shall criticise some of the Government's proposals. They are criticisms designed to elicit a response from the Government rather than being merely of a denunciatory character.

I think that there could be unanimity on a number of matters. First, I think that it was widely perceived by the House and by many other commentators that the existing law and its means of securing investor protection have become very deficient in the market place as it has developed. I am thinking particularly of technological innovation, the increasing internationalisation of markets and the number of events that have not brought credit to the City or to financial institutions.

It is a matter of concern for us all, and not only those who practise in the financial markets, that there have been major scandals. There is a widely perceived view that a number of people have been able to get away with things which, in a properly organised system, they ought not to have been able to. That is alarming both to the public and to those who practise in the City, and it is bad for the City's international reputation. In so far as these measures go some way to remedy that problem, we of course welcome them.

There is another reason why that change is necessary. It is that other changes will take place in the organisation of the City, most of which emanate from a decision of the present Secretary of State's predecessor to do a deal with the Stock Exchange in return for the Stock Exchange not being referred to the Restrictive Practices Court. I am not sure whether the changes that were found acceptable by the previous Secretary of State will have either the effects that are proposed or the advantages that are sometimes canvassed for them. However, they are going ahead. In a sense, they have been anticipated almost before the event. One suspects that changes have been made in anticipation of them which might be even greater than those that might be made as a result of them. But, whatever happens, whether for good or for ill, a new situation will obtain quite different from that which has obtained in much of the recent past. In that circumstance, this seems a desirable time for us to review the way in which the law is framed and enforced.

We have had a valuable report by Professor Gower. I was glad that the Secretary of State paid a handsome tribute to him. If I may say so by way of minor criticism, I thought that the White Paper did less than justice to Professor Gower's contribution by saying that the Government were greatly indebted to him. I am glad that the Secretary of State took the opportunity to express it today in more handsome terms. We owe a great debt to Professor Gower not only for proposing an intelligent way in which the law should be framed — and I draw a distinction between the law and the way in which it will be enforced—but, as I think the Secretary of State said, almost for changing the nature and tenor of the debate that has taken place among those who have considered the matter since the report. We have the White Paper, and we shall of course be moving to legislation.

The Opposition's judgment is that the proposed framework of the law is broadly correct. It is largely what was in the Gower report. The notion of having a fit and proper test for all those who wish to practise in the financial markets, and the notion that these should be licensed by the state before being permitted to do so, is one that we endorse.

So far as I can see, although this is a matter at which we require to look carefully when the legislation is presented to the House, the rules for the conduct of businesses seem to have a good deal of sense in them, particularly those parts dealing with the principles which should be applied, the way in which conflicts of interest should be managed and the importance of compensation for the victims of any malfeasance or fraud by those who practise in the financial markets.

At this stage, I raise one point of detail on the question of compensation. In dealing with compensation, at page 21 the White Paper states, I think properly, that the aim should be for the private investor to receive full compensation. That is, of course, a feature of quite a lot of professional obligations. For example, a solicitor undertakes to pay in full for any client of a solicitor who is the victim of defalcation in respect of an individual solicitor. The White Paper states in paragraph 7.12:

"As far as negligence is concerned, professional indemnity insurance could be made a requirement."

That "could" should be changed to "should". I can think of no reason why it should be left in the air or why there should be no obligation on those who practise to take out insurance against professional negligence. It would round off a system of protection for the investor. I hope that the Secretary of State will give sympathetic consideration to that proposal.

Mr. Tebbit: I entirely take the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point and the manner in which he made it. The key sentence in paragraph 7.12 is:

"The aim should be for the private investor to receive full compensation."

The manner in which that is achieved will be the subject of a great deal of discussion, but I do not think that either of us has any differences about the aim.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that intervention. I quoted that because I consider it to be the key sentence. However, I am puzzled about why the qualification was inserted in the sentence which immediately follows. Having announced the aim to give full compensation, it would seem sensible to adopt the most intelligent way of doing so. So far as I can see, no other options are canvassed in the White Paper.

Mr. Tebbit: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman reads the report carefully, he will see the comment upon the manner in which we might approach compensation for what is essentially a breach of propriety. The latter part of paragraph 7.12 deals with professional negligence as opposed to improprieties.

Mr. Smith: I hope that we shall not get bogged down on this point, because I did not intend to say a great deal about it. The Secretary of State has taken my point, and I am grateful for the way in which he has responded. Ultimately, if there is a difference of opinion, we shall wait to see what the House decides.

Paragraph 7.21 refers to the possibility that because of technological advance we shall shortly move to the transfer and ownership of shares without physical documentation. I readily accept that that is within the range of technology, and I would be grateful if the Under-Secretary, when replying, could give some information on how this will be accomplished. The law will have to grapple with new technology, and I should welcome a glimpse of how the Government propose to deal with it in the forthcoming legislation. I am sure that many hon. Members will offer advice on how simple that will be, but I would prefer to wait until we see what the Government propose.

The Government may have placed too much emphasise on the notion that if competition is permitted and encouraged, that somehow has a regulatory effect. That does not necessarily follow. A distinction must be made between efficiency in the market place and protection for the investor. It may or may not be true that competition leads to greater efficiency, but it is disputable that it inevitably leads to greater protection. Indeed, cut-throat competition might stimulate abuse of the market place and, by its very existence, might require even greater protection by way of regulation. It is not good enough to take refuge in some theological position and to argue that releasing market forces somehow leads to greater protection for the investor.

We have more doubts about the regulatory system. That brings me immediately to whether or not there should be a self-standing commission. When Professor Gower looked at this he came to a fairly balanced view, and his report sets out the argument for and against. On reading the report, my impression is that Professor Gower was, if anything, inclined towards a self-standing commission, although he said that there were arguments on both sides. My own party made representations to him which he took into account.

In principle, there are three possible ways of approaching the matter. The first is that the Department itself should regulate. I am strongly against that. I do not think that the Department of Trade and Industry is likely to acquire a sufficient expertise or range of talents—I mean no disparagement because the Department has other work to do—to regulate the City effectively or to keep up to date with those who are operating on the edge of good practice. I am not sure whether that is the sort of thing which we should ask a Government Department to do.

Another view, which I am glad to say is receding in its attractiveness, is that this can be left to the professions and the practitioners — that we can rely on self-regulation and that the City will look after itself. Recent experience indicates that that cannot be relied upon. It would not be relied upon given the new circumstances in which the market will operate, given that it is becoming increasingly international and given that technology makes the speed of decision such that it is extremely difficult to keep pace with what is happening.

There is much merit in the self-standing commission approach. The Government have landed themselves somewhere between self-regulation and the self-standing commission. It can hardly be said that what they propose is self-regulation. I do not make that allegation, because the statutory framework is much more onerous on those who practise in the City than old-fashioned notions of self-regulation. However, I am puzzled as to why the Government held back from going as far as a self-standing commission. It could be that they want to propitiate opinion in the City, which has so far been hostile to it.

Mr. Tim Smith rose——

Mr. Smith: I am just developing my argument, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will contain himself for a moment.

The opposition to a self-standing commission seems to relate almost entirely to the experience of the American system. It is felt that on the whole the Securities and Exchange Commission has been unsympathetic to people from this country who have come into contact with it.

It is said that it is an excessively legalistic and bureaucratic apparatus. There are reasons why that is so. The United States is a very complicated, legal world with a federal system and the laws of individual states. According to one's view, the United States is either a lawyer's paradise or a client's nightmare. It is certainly one of the most litigious countries in the world. The conflict between federal jurisdiction and the jurisdiction of the states is so easily exploited that the way in which to deal with it is very different from what would be necessary in this country. In addition, the size of the market is much greater, and what is suitable for a smaller market is not necessarily suitable for a larger one. As I have already said, the legalistic and litigious nature of United States society encourages such tendencies in an organisation which is set up to control the market place.

That need not happen here, and a self-standing commission in the United Kingdom need not apply the same deficiencies as those which occur in the United States.

In a speech in February this year, the chairman of the Stock Exchange almost anticipated a move towards an independent commission. In the president's lecture to the Insurance Institute of London, he said:

"If the structure"— that is, the structure in the White Paper—

"does not work, there will be no alternative but to set up a statutory commission".

That is simple reality, because one cannot go back to the previous self-regulation or to the Department. He continued:

"Under this government the Department of Trade will have neither the political backing nor the resources to enable it to undertake the responsibility itself".

I would add, "under any Government." He went on:

"A statutory commission is likely anyway to be our ultimate destination, but to set one up in the immediate future would be a worse situation. It would introduce immediately"—

we should note the word "immediately"—

"into regulation a legalistic dimension which could do harm to Britain's competitiveness, and it would be unhappily devised without any of the evolutionary experience which the present proposals offer".

Those sentences were carefully constructed, and seem to indicate a disposition on the part of Sir Nicholas Goodison, if no one else, to accept almost the inevitability of moving to a self-standing commission. They almost argue that it would be better to approach it by this careful route rather than to take it at one go. On the merits of having a self-standing commission, there is not exactly stout opposition from the chairman of the Stock Exchange.

That may be how things will develop and through that route we may end up with a self-standing commission. It might be better for us to move to that now. The city could swallow that just as well as it has swallowed recent changes. In the hybrid solution proposed by the Government of self-regulation within a statutory framework there is a danger that the simplicity and clarity that are necessary for any effective system will be lost.

A complicated system is proposed. The Secretary of State will get power from Parliament. He will then delegate that as he chooses, but he has announced that he will delegate it almost entirely to two separate bodies, the Securities and Investments Board and the Marketing of Investments Board. Under the SIB there will be other regulatory bodies. For example, the Stock Exchange will have regulatory capacities. In addition, there will be a tribunal to which those who have been denied a licence to practise can appeal. If a person appeals against a refusal of a licence by the Stock Exchange he will have to appeal also to the SIB before he can appeal to the tribunal because he cannot go straight from the Stock Exchange to the tribunal. We are already getting into considerable complications without going into the argument about whether there should be one board or two.

It would be much simpler and clearer to all involved, and certainly to the ordinary public, if we moved immediately towards a self-standing commission. I argue that on the basis that it is inevitable anyway, and that we might as well get there now and set it up properly so that it may last for a fairly long period. In the present circumstances, that seems to me not so much a revolutionary proposal as almost simple common sense.

Mr. Tim Smith: Of course, the proposed system is complicated and it may not work, but if there is the will to make it work it will for two reasons be infinitely preferable to what the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposes. First, it will have considerable flexibility, which his self-standing commission would not have, and, secondly, it would build on existing foundations.

Mr. Smith: I am not persuaded, with respect to the hon. Gentleman's point of view, that there would be any greater flexibility under either model. It depends on the view taken by those who have to administer the law. The law will be the same whether we have a self-standing commission or these bodies. The crucial matter will be the view taken by those responsible, whether they are in the commission or in the hybrid bodies. On the whole, having considered the arguments over a period, I think that the arguments against a self-standing commission have become less compelling as time has gone by. I judge that they are being put forward with less passion now. It is almost as if the markets are coming round to an acceptance of that point of view.

On the question of two boards, I was glad to note that the Secretary of State did not nail his colours too firmly to the mast. Opinion is moving very heavily in favour of the common sense conclusion that there is little point in having two boards when one could do the job perfectly well. Indeed, it becomes ridiculous when one understands that the majority of people will have to register under both the SIB and the MIB because the merging of different functions is such that, according to the White Paper, there will have to be provision for the exchange of information between the two boards. Therefore, a person may give information to one board or the other and they will be busy exchanging the information.

I can imagine what the Secretary of State would say if this were a Labour proposal. If the Labour party had made such a proposal we would have had to accept mocking sarcasm about such a Socialist solution — setting up boards, not even statutory boards, that were obliged by law to exchange information. I can well imagine the sort of speech that the Secretary of State might have made. When he goes home tonight perhaps he should reflect on what he might have been saying if I were the Secretary of State making these proposals. He might find that the most compelling argument of all that he has listened to in the long period since the Gower report came out.

In regard to enforcement, however we devise the law and however brilliant it seems, if it is not enforced it is not worth having. In the proposals which the Secretary of State makes new sanctions are produced. I welcome some of them. The revocation of authorisation is a very important and obvious one. I worry a little about it because it is a nuclear weapon. Will it not be a sanction that those responsible would be reluctant to operate?

I am not so sure about some of the civil remedies that are proposed. We will have to examine them in detail because they are not articulated all that clearly in the White Paper. I am not complaining about that because one cannot include all the detail in a White Paper but we shall need to consider these with some care.

The background to all this is a worry amongst the public that fraud in the City is not pursued or prosecuted properly by the authorities of the state. That point has been put to me with some force by people in the legal profession and by people who operate in the City, and I take it seriously. If an official of the Post Office steals money from a letter, he is likely to be visited with the full wrath of the law, to be prosecuted, to go to gaol and to lose his job. Of course, there is nothing wrong with that. But if a person deals in fraud on a much larger scale and runs off with £200 million to £300 million, the chances of him being brought to book are much less.

I am afraid that that is true and is perceived to be true. The reason is that those who deal in larger fraud have more resources and skill in avoiding the reach of the law. They are able to have much more elaborate and expensive defences. Worst of all, they are able sometimes either to avoid the jurisdiction easily or to create such apprehension in the minds of those pursuing them that they come to the conclusion that it is not worth continuing the pursuit. That is thoroughly bad. The Government, as a matter of urgency, should take on board the whole matter.

It is not just a simple question of having a jury. In some cases that is a side issue and we are in danger of going up a cul-de-sac in considering it. The question is whether the country is prepared to put the necessary resources behind investigating authorities and prosecuting authorities to ensure that major fraud is prosecuted with the same rigour and diligence as minor fraud. That is a slightly different issue, but it needs to be tackled by the Government.

Mr. Tebbit: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is, of course, right in saying that large-scale financial fraud is a most difficult crime to bring home and to secure a conviction on, not least because so often it is internaional in its nature and there is a reluctance of witnesses who are outside our national jurisdiction to attend court. There are problems here which are probably much more those of the law than they are of resources, although certainly we have managed to increase the resources and reorganise them recently in a way that I hope will make them more effective.

Mr. Smith: The Secretary of State is referring to the fraud investigation group which was established recently. I think that may be a useful exercise in co-ordination, but he will forgive me if I am slightly sceptical about Governments saying that they will co-ordinate their activities. I have been involved in so-called co-ordinating activities so often in the past that I am sceptical that co-ordination always achieves its objective. The immediate reaction in Whitehall to any interdepartmental problem is to propose greater co-ordination. We shall be persuaded that something is being done when there are major prosecutions and when major criminals are brought to book instead of laughing at this country from the havens to which they have escaped. They have brought the sense of fairness in British society into scepticism.

I was about to move on to the international dimension that the Secretary of State mentioned. Professor Gower drew our attention to the international dimension when he referred on page 176 of the report to the new phenomenon of international white collar crime. He argued for much greater international co-ordination. I wonder if we have done enough about that. I do not think that enough is said in the White Paper about the offshore problem. It needs greater attention by the Government.

There may be ways of doing something about it. Why cannot those who beam their activity to the British market from abroad, from Amsterdam or wherever, be penalised in relation to their other activities in Britain? If we could find some way of doing that it would be extremely useful.

I do not have an easy answer to what is a complicated problem. My impression is that not enough attention has been given to it. It is clear that there are problems of international law and national jurisdiction. We should pay more attention to the problem and see if there is a way, for example, to tackle people who have activities in this country and who indulge in activities from offshore havens, one being connected with the other. We should not enable them to have a free run in Britain, as it were, while cocking a snook at our laws from a haven elsewhere.

Mr. Tebbit: I am anxious not to interrupt the right hon. and learned Gentleman too much; I do not want to make this a debate between him and me. If persons were operating in that way, both outside the United Kingdom and had an operation here, that might lead the boards to the conclusion that they were not fit and proper persons.

Mr. Smith: It is helpful to have that remark on the record. If the Secretary of State thinks that it would be important to bring into consideration the question of authorisation, or the withdrawal of it, if unpalatable activities from an offshore haven had an impact on United Kingdom activities, that is a useful idea. That is not quite said in the White Paper. It would be a view for the regulating authorities to take, and nc doubt they are able to take a step for a hint. I hope that that was what the right hon. Gentleman was giving.

Other activities are encompassed in the quite wide definition of what is marketed in the financial world. For example, franchising is developing greatly in this country. It might be argued that that is outwith the scope of the measure—that we are not dealing with investment when we are dealing with franchising—but I suggest that it is getting near the line when people are dealing with a product and are almost licensed to distribute it. I raise that as a minor point which might be considered; perhaps some protection should be given in that respect.

The Opposition are not slow to criticise the City when it needs to be criticised. We have often said that it is inadequate in dealing with the problem of financing British industry. I am glad to say that that view is no longer held exclusively by those on these Benches. Indeed, members of the Government sometimes express it. In a recent eloquent speech, the Secretary of State for Wales berated the City for the inadequate way in which it approached industrial investment in Britain. [Interruption.] I hear some muttering from Conservative Members. I think they are showing that they do not take the Secretary of State for Wales seriously. I am sure that my hon. Friends who represent Welsh constituencies will bear that in mind.

I note that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has been careful to keep a straight face; I can see his face, whereas his hon. Friends behind him cannot. He has been careful not to betray the confidence of a colleague. I was under the impression that when a Cabinet Minister made a serious and important speech, a speech obviously considered carefully in advance, he spoke on behalf of the whole Government and not just for himself.

Mr. Tebbit: How can the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that?

Mr. Smith: I believe that the Secretary of State is telling me from a sedentary position that I should not operate on that assumption. Where, then, is collective responsibility?

Mr. Tebbit: I was wondering how the right hon. and learned Gentleman of all people, having served in a Labour Government, could say that with a straight face.

Mr. Smith: I gave way to the Secretary of State because I thought it only fair to enable him to announce once again the doctrine of collective responsibility. I noticed with care that he avoided that opportunity. But, then, having regard to his colleagues, he was probably wise to do so.

Mr. Eggar: Is it fair for us on these Benches to assume that the right hon. and learned Gentleman accepts collective responsibility for the recent remarks made, and reports put out, by his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher)?

Mr. Smith: I have been in the House long enough not to rise to the most obvious lures, especially from Conservative Members. I should be delighted to answer such questions if I thought that I could do so without breaching the rules of the House. I need only comment that the doctrine of collective responsibility is noticed in its absence rather than in its fulfilment by some members of the Government.

While there are serious deficiencies in the way in which the City serves British industry, it is important—there will be unanimity about this — for us to have an efficient, internationally competitive and fair-dealing system of financial markets in this country. It is in the national interest and in the interest of the prosperity of our trade and industry that it be maintained, particularly as the City of London is now under intense foreign competition.

I end on that note. An approach to this matter that guarantees fair dealing in the City is also the best way in which we can advance its efficiency and competitiveness. It is not just a method of protecting investors. It is a way of offering a guarantee to those who deal with it—both in this country and from abroad—that they can expect honest and fair dealing in Britain. We shall have differences of approach, but if we keep that principle in mind we shall achieve something good for the nation at the end of this whole process.

Sir Edward du Cann (Taunton): I agreed with much of what the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, in particular his concluding words. He made an admirable speech and the whole House appreciated its constructive nature. He was right to say that we should now be considering updating the law.

I am only one of many who take part in debates of this kind, inside and outside the House, and who give a warm welcome to the general principles of the White Paper. It is timely and well done. My right hon. Friend said he thought that it had had a unanimously successful press. I had not noticed that. I thought it did not have as good a press as it deserved. It is an excellent and constructive piece of work, and any criticisms of mine are more in the nature of anxieties about the detail rather than the direction in which my right hon. Friend intends to move, which I strongly support.

I have an interest to declare. I have been involved for many years in the unit trust, insurance and banking industries in Britain. I am the chairman of a unit trust management company. I was one of the sponsors of the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977, which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Sir J. Page) and which has been most successful. I am also a vice-president of the British Insurance Brokers Association.

I have therefore been a practitioner in these spheres for many years. Indeed, I have been involved not only in practice but in regulation, both as a Minister and as a member of various bodies. I speak from that standpoint.

That lifetime's experience leads me to say that the White Paper provides a desirable and practical framework for protecting the interests of the investor, and it should help to ensure the healthy development of this fast-growing financial services sector of the economy. It is not only fast-growing. As the Secretary of State and the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East said, it is fast changing, too. I am not sure that I approve of all the changes that I see.

Generalism is all very well, but the City of London has grown and prospered and has brought great strength and wealth to the nation because of its concentration largely on specialist skills. Anything that mitigates its effectiveness would be a pity. The financial services industry has been a great employer. It employs 1 million people. It has provided a great service to our fellow citizens at all levels. In other words, it is a great national asset. It has an important social and economic purpose, not least because of its £4 billion a year overseas earnings.

My right hon. Friend is therefore right to say, as he writes in the White Paper, that his first purpose as a responsible Minister must be to provide the public, the nation, with protection against deceivers, both the deliberate ones to whom the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East referred—I agree with him that the methods of international protection against deceit need to be sharpened because they are pitifully weak—and those who are careless. My right hon. Friend is right also when he says that disclosure has to be the norm, so that a man who is undertaking an investment knows exactly what he will obtain. At the same time, my right hon. Friend says—again I believe that he is right—that caveat emptor must remain the rule. The House has no business protecting people from their own folly or greed.

In choosing self-regulation as the means for achieving these objectives, the Government are giving this sector of our economy the opportunity to devise a detailed scheme to achieve a high standard of conduct by practitioners, an adequate level of competence within the industry and a proper protection for the consumer, and that too is right. There have been precedents at various levels for doing this. For instance, there has been the gentle discipline of the Association of Unit Trust Managers, of which I was one of the founders. That has been very effective. Now, with legislation, Lloyds is doing a powerful job in ensuring that the best practices are conducted there. This applies also to other aspects of the broking industry.

The House will remember that, through the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977, all intermediaries who chose to call themselves insurance brokers have, since December 1981, been regulated, and are required to observe a code of conduct that ensures their independence and requires that the interests of the client are always their first consideration. They have to meet tests on financial solvency. They are required to take out their own indemnity insurance to allow for compensation to the client if they are negligent in conducting his business. Here then is a system by which, under a general code of law, the consumer has been well protected and the industry is well self-regulated.

It is all very well establishing the idea of self-regulation, but in the end this depends on those who are doing the work of regulation. Everything is people. In insurance broking, we have been enormously lucky to find excellent people to do this work. I cannot pay a high enough tribute—some hon. Member should—to Mr. Francis Perkins, who was the chairman of the committee that brought together the four associations in broking and turned them into one. His successors, Mr. Findlay and now the excellent present man, Mr. Alexander, are also devoted people. They, and others, not least the chairmen of the registration councils and the like, and all their supporters, have done some marvellous work. My right hon. Friend will have to exercise all his ingenuity and persuasive powers to make certain that their example is followed in other respects. It is important to get the right people if self-regulation is to be made to work.

Self-regulation in the intermediaries sector anticipated my right hon. Friend's White Paper by a number of years, but it is effective only for those who have volunteered to use the title "insurance broker". Someone who wants to call himself an insurance consultant or an insurance adviser can practise as an insurance adviser without any control. This, contrary to the principles laid down by my right hon. Friend's admirable White Paper, has impeded the raising of standards. There is no doubt about that—this is a matter of fact. The fact that there is a cost of registration as an insurance broker has penalised those who wish to practise professionally and ensure proper protection for the insurance buying client.

We should be foolish to perpetuate that situation. My view, which I think is the view of the profession as well, is that one major shortcoming in the White Paper is the failure to provide for proper regulation of all insurance intermediaries. Life assurance policies, as long-term investments, will be covered by the proposed legislation and those who market them by the new self-regulatory system. However, non-life insurance policies—household and contents insurance, motor car policies, travel insurance and so on—are omitted altogether. As I understand it—this was confirmed by my right hon. Friend—it is because they are not commonly regarded as an investment. I do not accept or agree with that view. This is a serious omission, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will be willing to think again.

The private individual can suffer catastrophic loss just as much from inadequate or incompetent advice, or even from fraud, on his home insurance, for instance, as on a life policy. The White Paper could make this more likely, as those insurance advisers who fail to achieve the necessary standards to become authorised to market life policies will be able to switch their attention to the other general sector of insurance. Furthermore, the ability to opt out will inhibit the general raising of standards.

I go so far as to say that, if we do not include all intermediaries in the way that I suggest, much of the work that we have tried to do in the British Insurance Brokers Association may be valueless. What is the point of bothering to be a member of that institution and meeting its high standards and conforming with the requirements of the registration council and the rest if somebody can go down the road and do what the devil he likes?

Unless the Government bring in control of intermediaries offering advice on general insurance, we shall be losing a great opportunity. The present deficiency will not only be perpetuated but even accentuated by the new system for regulation of life assurance. It is the function of the insurance broker that needs to be controlled, not just the title of insurance broker.

In an intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West referred to the part of the White Paper that says that the Government propose amendments to the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act to fit the Insurance Brokers Registration Council for its new role in the self-regulatory structure. They should extend those amendments to provide for a proper regulation of anyone wishing to offer independent advice on insurance. If anyone is unable or unwilling to comply with the requisite standards, he could continue to trade as agent of an insurance company, provided that it is willing to take responsibility for his actions.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, who is to wind up, will have seen that there is early-day motion 460 on the Order Paper, entitled "Protection for Policy Holders". It proposes the changes that I have outlined. Without any canvassing for signatures, it has attracted signatures from some 67 hon. Members from both sides of the House. That goes to show not only that what I have attempted to talk about is a matter of wide concern in the House, but that the remedy for it has wide agreement also.

I move on to the White Paper as it affects life insurance. It asserts that the law and the regulatory system must be fair and not create artificial distinctions between services competing in the same markets. I am sure that that is the right policy. Unfortunately, it fails to achieve that objective in one major sector. It exempts what are known as tied agents from the duty to disclose their remuneration to potential clients. In so doing, it does not serve the consumer interest and it runs the risk of diminishing the sources of impartial advice available to the public.

We have heard a lot about Gower this afternoon. In his report on investor protection, Professor Gower recommended that the regulation of commission payments should apply to all intermediaries, whether independent or tied. That was his plain recommendation. I am aware that this is the view of many responsible companies, including almost all leading assurance companies in the market.

The White Paper requires only that the independent intermediary should be so regulated. But the tied agent working for an insurance company owes his first duty to the insurer and not to the purchaser of the policy. He receives commission from that company and other financial support such as office rents, phone bills and other indirect payments. Thus the White Paper's proposals create an artificial distinction and do not meet the White Paper's principle that there should be "equivalence of treatment" between services competing in the same market.

I do not think that that distinction is right. It means that the purchaser will know how much he is paying for independent advice, but not how much the tied agent is receiving. The consequence could be a diminution in the independent broker market and thereby an undesirable restriction on the comsumer's access to independent advice. That would be a pity, and it would be wrong to put the man who offers independent advice at a competitive disadvantage. Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to say that this matter will receive further consideration. If there is to be any requirement to disclose commission and other payments, it should be fairly and universally applied. That is the best way to avoid market distortion and an unnecessary and undesirable commissions war.

There is another aspect of the White Paper where "equivalence" appears not to have been observed. The White Paper proposes that certain professions, such as accountants and solicitors, should be exempt from the regulations, provided that investment business is not a "significant" part of their activities and provided that their professional bodies have standards that offer equivalent safeguards to the investor. Great care will have to be exercised over what is to be regarded as "significant", since this could be a loophole through which large professional practices, which handle much more business than small insurance brokerages, could slip with, again, a potential distortion of market forces. If one group of people is obliged to disclose, everyone should be obliged to do so. That is my plain view.

Mr. Tebbit: Perhaps I can reassure my right hon. Friend on that point. Disclosure would be among the requirements that I would expect in the professions' codes governing these matters.

Sir Edward du Cann: I am very pleased to hear that, and congratulate my right hon. Friend on having thought through the logic of this matter.

I have three other general points to make. First, we have already had some discussion about whether we should have one or two boards. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East had something to say about that. I can see the reasons that probably prompted my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to start with the idea of two boards. In theory, marketing is probably a different aspect from the management of investments, but in practice it would be very inconvenient to have two boards. However, if my right hon. Friend thinks it right to start like that, perhaps I can invite him to have in mind the bringing together of those boards into a single board at the earliest possible moment. On the other hand, if he reconsiders the matter, he may come to the conclusion that one board now would be better than two.

Second, I know how difficult this is, but I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to beware of over-regulation. It is easy to believe that one has to regulate, and that one has to dot every "i" and cross every "t". But free markets—which is what the White Paper is all about—require maximum freedom. I hope that my right hon. Friend will go for the minimum rather than the maximum amount of regulation. Third, we have had some jokes about my right hon. Friend's successors in office in a hundred years' time, but I hope that he and his successors will bear in mind the great need for flexibility in the systems that we establish. As my right hon. Friend rightly said, the scene is changing. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East said exactly the same thing, and it is true.

My lifetime's experience in the financial and other worlds tells me that the accepted wisdom of today is generally wrong. We need to provide for innovation, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has suggested. If anyone had planned the City as it is today, he would probably not have given money markets the latitude that they have had or the possibility of success. One cannot plan exactly what will happen.

Perhaps I can share a memory with the House. When I, with my colleagues, started the modern unit trust industry in this country in 1957, and introduced the equity-linked life assurance concept, the City establishment bitterly attacked us. The chief actuary of a celebrated and significant life assurance company even wrote an article in Policy Holder magazine saying that what we were doing was dishonest. That was the sort of disdainful attitude that was displayed.

If we had had to go to a conservative City group and say, "This is what we propose to do," we would have been turned down out of hand. Whoever is responsible for supervision—it may well be right to have a practitioner-based supervision—we should ensure that it is not just a cosy City affair and that we get in independent people. I am not just talking about the statutory woman, black man or trade unionist. Let us get in people of imagination. Things are changing quickly. Let us lay down guidelines by all means, but let us give those who will pioneer new ideas a proper opportunity.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State warmly on what he is doing. The catalogue of events about which he spoke, together with the White Paper and ancillary things which the Government are proposing, are all intended to make financial services more generally available to the British public and to make them a continuing source of wealth and employment in our society. I wish success to those associated with my right hon. Friend in what he is trying to do. Of course, it is a large job and it is being attempted in a short space of time. What happens and what is decided will have far-reaching consequences for a major and highly successful industry, which we hope will continue to be successful.

Consequently, it is all the more important to ensure that we get things right—although it is easy enough to say that—and that the general principles that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has enunciated, which doubtless have universal support, are implemented fairly and in the widest possible interests of the industry and the public. All those who heard my right hon. Friend's speech will have greatly appreciated his readiness to listen to suggestions and ideas. I hope that those that I have been able to offer the House will be of help.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I listened to the Secretary of State's speech, and he seemed to be trying to be at his least offensive to the City and to be kind and humane. I wish that on occasion he would show such sentiments to other people. He appeared to be saying that we must get away with the least regulation possible. I agree that a little regulation is better than none, but the right hon. Gentleman will not be too surprised to find that we do not quite agree with all that he said, and that we want to go much further.

Perhaps I could suggest that the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) looks at early-day motion 460. We all agree that life insurance is important, but there is also car insurance, household insurance, insurance covering legal liabilities, and so on. All of them are equally important. Those who purchase those policies should also be protected. It is important that things should be taken more widely than at present. Indeed, I agree with the sentiments that have already been expressed on that point.

People have had their fingers burnt over offshore companies. More should be done to protect investors. We all know about the collapse of Signal Insurance. The problem is caused by advice being given to people who are looking for a good return on their money, and sometimes an excessive return. Those who give that advice should be responsible for it, and some action should be taken against them.

I agree with everything said by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). I do not believe that the City should be allowed to regulate itself. There should be statutory regulation along the lines of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission. The individuals on the committee to organise the Marketing of Investments Board have been praised, but there is only one consumer representative on that committee. If we follow that pattern in setting up boards, we are asking burglars to police themselves. I believe that consumer interests should be represented more strongly.

I have no firm views on whether there should be one or two boards. We must consider what voluntary regulation involves. Recently, the voluntary licensing of life assurance salesmen has suffered some setbacks. Attempts have been made to examine the voluntary regulation of commission payments to independent intermediaries since the collapse in 1982 of the Life Offices Association agreement. The key task is to consider whether the regulation of investments should be carried out by the Marketing of Investments Board separate from the Securities and Investments Board.

I understand the argument in favour of just one board, because there would be less bureaucracy. Opinion is divided—the insurance industry wants two boards and the City wants one. The City does not want a supervisory body to be set up over which it has no control, and that may be the reason for its reluctance to support the setting up of two boards. Separate boards would mean that City institutions would have to obey board rules when they are allowed to sell portable pensions. I believe that the Secretary of State favours the formation of one board. The Department asked for advice, but the organising committee did not include one assurance company chairman who recommended setting up two boards.

Much has been said about Professor Gower's report. I echo the point made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East, that the Government have taken a timid approach to Professor Gower's recommendations. We must never forget that Gower aimed to protect the investors. A self-regulating body will not be successful. Such a body would be successful only if those involved in it were determined to make it a success.

The Government's mind may be concentrated by the knowledge that there is increasing demand for regulation. Without self-regulation, there will have to be statutory regulation. The confidence of all investors—large and small — must be gained, because they are equally important. Investors must be protected. I am extremely critical of the way in which the organising committee for the Marketing of Investments Board has been set up.

A complaints procedure should be established, providing opportunities to individuals to make good any losses without undertaking lengthy legal proceedings. A complaints board should initiate action on behalf of individuals and pay compensation to them. That presupposes investigation by the board to establish a claim's validity.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East said that compensation should be available and referred to paragraph 7.12 of the White Paper. We must consider the type of compensation that will be available — whether there should be a funded compensation scheme, or insurance. I am in favour of funded compensation along the lines of the levy that was charged under the Policyholders Protection Act 1975. The drawback to an insurance compensation system is that insurers would be unwilling to pay out unless a court decided in favour of compensation.

Changes are taking place rapidly, and a periodic review is therefore needed. I welcome the move towards statutory authorisation of the investment business. I believe that a uniform approach should be taken to the authorisation and regulation of all financial services, taking the "best practice" as a guide. A rationalisation of the plethora of self-regulatory organisations is required, so that companies need deal with only one organisation. That would be more efficient.

This White Paper is only the first step, albeit a step in the right direction. The setting up of a statutory board would be an even better step. I do not believe that the City would have many objections to setting up a statutory board. Stronger medicine is needed, as can be seen from the City's record in the recent past. The Government should have taken more radical action. I welcome the move to protect investors, although it does not go far enough. Sooner, rather than later, we shall all recognise that statutory regulation is required.

5.50 pm

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): I think that the House has been at its best this afternoon, in stark contrast to the horrors of yesterday afternoon. This afternoon the House has been looking, in a relatively non-partisan way, at the problems of the City and how the City can best be regulated. That must be to the advantage of all of us.

I should like, first, to say a word to those of my hon. Friends who have criticised the role of the Governor of the Bank of England and the fact that he is to have a veto over appointments. It is, in a sense, a novel idea. I should like to put one reflection into the balance against that criticism. When other regulations and burdens were imposed on business over the past 30 or 40 years, if the interested parties themselves had been consulted to a greater extent at the time when the regulations were dreamt up by Parliament, perhaps some of the regulations would have proved to be less burdensome to business as a whole.

There is the debating point that the Governor is responsible to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is also the possibility that we shall achieve a slightly better and more realistic approach to the regulation of the City by bringing the Governor into the process of consultation.

On 29 January, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made his announcement concerning the White Paper, my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Hordern)—who, unfortunately, is not able to be here this afternoon—was the first to point out that the need of the City to have the investor protected as much as possible was paramount, and that the City's reputation completely depended on that. From the debate so far—and I am sure that it is true generally—the House of Commons appears to agree with that view. I strongly agree with it. Against that very important need, we should also balance what my right hon. Friend said in his statement. He emphasised that it is very important to have a framework capable of "accommodating rather than stifling innovation". —[Official Report, 29 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 157.]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) reminded the House of his experience over many decades and reflected on the time when he was dealing with and innovating the unit trust business. He said that that innovation could easily have been stifled at that time. Therefore, my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton this afternoon reflected what the Secretary of State said on 29 January—that it is crucial that the framework should allow innovation to take place if the City is to maintain its position in the world. I should prefer to use the word "regain", because we should not delude ourselves. Some parts of the City, like some parts of British industry, have slipped behind the rest of the world and fallen behind other financial centres. Therefore, it is crucial to be able to innovate.

The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) said that he wanted to see a tighter regulatory framework, and that may be necessary in the future, but not many of us can look round that corner at the moment. I hope the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is important that the regulations should not grow so much that they stifle the sort of innovation that the City needs.

About three weeks ago the Government published a report called "The Burdens on Industry". In that report it was stated that anyone starting a business and wishing to avoid all the possible pitfalls, and wishing to avoid tripping over various laws and regulations, would need to read 270,000 words—a task that would take 24 hours. There is a lesson to be learnt from that. We must not allow the regulatory process in the City to grow to such an extent that that sort of thing could happen.

In proposing the legislation, my right hon. Friend has walked a tightrope between over-regulation and under-regulation. As far as we can see at present, he has probably got it about right. It is impossible to be sure, as he would be the first to say; indeed, he implied in his speech that he would listen to comments. If it proves necessary to tighten the scheme in the future, that will have to be done.

The rules and regulations should be clear, so that they can be understood by everyone. If that happens, we are much more likely to have a flexible and competitive climate in which we can encourage new firms to come into the City.

In recent weeks a great deal has been written about mergers in the City, with giant firms, merchant banks and stockbroking firms being created. But surely we need a regulatory system to allow for new entrants with new ideas. We should allow new firms to innovate, thus ensuring that the City keeps up with other financial institutions throughout the world.

When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that he hoped that arrangements in the City for the new system would enable the raising of finance to be done more efficiently for the smaller business, that was music to my ears. I have in mind the larger private business and the smaller private company. At present, such businesses are not all that well accommodated by the City in the raising of finance. Perhaps new entrants can make a contribution in that respect.

If we have the regulatory system right, as I believe we have, there will be freer competition; there will be competition that protects the investor. As I said at the beginning of my speech, that is crucial. Above all, we should be hopeful—as I am—that the proposals in the White Paper will allow the City not only to innovate but to grow and to regain its position as the most important financial centre in the world. If we have got it right, that can happen. As I believe that we have got it right, I hope very much that it will happen.

5.58 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): When the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) looked back into his own history and mentioned the establishment of unit trusts, he reminded many of us who have worked in the City, or have had contact with financial institutions, how much things have moved over the past 20 years—and nowhere more than in the great debate that has been going on for many years about the supervision of the City. There have been great debates within different parties about how that should best be carried out.

I am very pleased that we have moved as far as we have in the White Paper and have at last the sort of framework of supervision that some of us have wanted to see for many years. It has always been difficult to get a consensus on what that supervision should be. Although they may not be perfect yet, the proposals in the White Paper mark a welcome step forward.

I agree with other hon. Members who have spoken—and with a good deal of opinion in the City—that the major flaw in the present proposals is that there are to be two bodies. The most important change that the Government should make is to bring them together into one body. There is an overwhelming case for having a statutory body in the long term. That does not horrify me in the way that it horrifies some people. However, on the other hand, it is important to carry the City along with the proposals. The marrying together of a statutory framework and umbrella with self-regulation is a good way to do that.

Therefore, my colleagues and I will support the thrust of the Government's proposals. The idea of a statutory commission is not as horrific to me as it is to some people.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): As no one else is likely to do so, will the hon. Gentleman tell us why a statutory commission is such a great thing?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: If the Minister looks at the experience in many other places, in many international financial markets in the world, places as free, open and entrepreneurial as Hong Kong, and as far afield as Canada, Australia and many other countries, he will find that statutory commissions have been operating successfully for many years. Financial markets and institutions throughout the world fully understand the operation of statutory bodies supervising markets. Therefore, I do not think that the international financial world found that proposition as horrific as some people in this country did.

People in the City have moved forward tremendously. As I said, I welcome that. I do not want to press the idea of a statutory commission, because I believe that what the Government are proposing constitutes a combination of statutory framework and self-regulation. I believe that it is best to suck it and see with this one and hope that it succeeds, but, if it is necessary, we should move further in the direction of a statutory body if the proposal does not work.

Mr. Nelson: I should like the hon. Gentleman to clarify what he is saying, because I am sure that I am very much in support of it. I understand the hon. Gentleman to be in favour of one body instead of two. There will be one body—whether one calls it a board, a commission or an authority is just nomenclature. At the end of 1986 the legislation should come into effect. If, in a securities Bill next Session, the board is given various powers over the self-regulatory authorities underneath it, it will be the equivalent of a securities commission. There should be no disagreement on that. Why is the hon. Gentleman saying, "Let's suck it and see."? If he is in favour of one board, he should have the courage of his convictions and argue the case.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I do not believe that if the Government brought together the two bodies that would constitute the sort of statutory body that exists in other parts of the world or the sort of statutory body that other people have envisaged or proposed. It would certainly be a single body, but it would not have the powers that the Secretary of State is retaining unto himself. However, I hope that that will make it unnecessary to go down the road of giving it the complete independence and statutory authority that such a securities and exchange commission has in other countries.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I, too, am following with great interest what the hon. Gentleman is saying. I agree with him that the key question is what statutory powers—whether delegated or otherwise does not matter—that single body will have. I wonder what powers the hon. Gentleman thinks that the body contemplated in the White Paper would lack in comparison with the statutory commission that he has advocated.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: As I said, it may well be found that if, when the body starts operating, it does not have sufficient powers under the present proposals—which the two boards have—satisfactorily to supervise the self-regulatory bodies and different sectors of the City, it will have to be given statutory powers.

We need to look at the provisions that will be in the Bill. We need to judge the strength of those powers when they are laid out in the Bill. I do not see the need to go fully down that road at present. I want to see what the Government put in the Bill. All I know is that there is an overwhelming case for not having two separate bodies. I hope that combining them will provide a satisfactory arrangement.

I should like to refer to the operation of the boards as proposed, and reflect some of the criticisms that others have made. The new arrangements will have to contend with substantial changes that are taking place in the City. I hope that they will not be inhibited. In previous debates on this matter, I have welcomed the changes that are coming. They have been criticised — wrongly — by Conservative Members. I am glad that the changes are taking place, because they will help to make the City a more competitive environment. It was beginning to slip back. The markets in New York and other parts of the world were growing, but London was dropping back in some spheres. The increased competition in the City, particularly on the Stock Exchange, is wholly welcome. I hope that it will not be inhibited by the new arrangements that are being introduced in the White Paper.

One particlar change will take place after the so-called big bang in 1986 that I find rather worrying. I am not sure whether it will be adequately covered by the proposals in the White Paper. It is the problem of the so-called Chinese wall within financial institutions and the conflict of interests that will inevitably be perceived by investors and customers in large financial conglomerates. I do not have the perfect answer to the problem. Various provisions can be made, with funds being kept separate in separate accounts and so on. Various proposals have been made, but I am not sure that when the investors see the new conglomerates operating and when the new system comes into force they will be satisfied that they are operating in the best interests of the investors and not of the institutions themselves.

As I said, I do not have an instant solution to that problem, but I see it coming down the track. When the system starts operating, it will cause great anxiety. All that I say to City institutions is that they will have to be aware of the suspicions that will be engendered when the proposal comes into operation. They will have to bend over backwards to reassure their customers and the public that that conflict of interest does not work to the disadvantage of the customers whom the institutions are supposed to serve.

I should like to refer to the role of the Bank of England. I agree with the comments made earlier about the proposed role for the Governor. I do not accept the reply that the Secretary of State gave to criticisms of the role of the Governor. For too long, the Bank of England has been in the curious position of being both spokesman and friend of the City, and supervisor of the City. It should be one or the other; it cannot be both. I do not like it having a supervisory role. Its predominant job is to act as a central bank, and it should get on with it. The responsibility for supervising the banking system has been put on to its shoulders. I suppose that it is now too late to remove that from its orbit. However, I believe that the Bank of England should not have the role that is envisaged in the White Paper. I hope that the Government will make that change before they introduce their Bill.

I also agree that there should be more independent members on the bodies. If the supervisory system is to obtain the confidence of the public, there will need to be a much stronger element of independent people on the boards—respected people who are not seen to have an interest in the City.

I am not sure why the test of competence has been omitted from the White Paper. I hope that the City institutions will wish to ensure that companies, partnerships and bodies are truly professional and that before they are able to operate they pass the test of competence. I hope that this will be one of the responsibilities of those who work the system.

I hope that the White Paper's proposals will be given a fair wind and that the Government will note that an increasing body of opinion believes that the two boards should be merged. I strongly support that principle. I hope that the Secretary of State will respond to the comments and criticisms and that the new system will help the City to be increasingly successful and more competitive so that it can serve well both its customers and the interests of the country. The City is undoubtedly of great benefit to this country. The new supervisory system will, I hope, benefit both the City and investors and the whole of this country by making the City a more respected and successful financial centre.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I thought that the exchanges during the speech of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) vividly illustrated the consensus on this subject. During the last 12 or 18 months the differences between the two sides of the House seem to have narrowed. When the hon. Member for Stockton, South was asked by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) what powers he wanted to be given to the Securities and Investments Board that it would not already have, all he said was that we should have to wait and see.

If the two bodies were to be merged, there would effectively be an independent commission, so we seem to have arrived at a consensus. I welcome that. It underlines the value of the way in which the Government have sought to develop policy. We have been looking at this question for about four years and it is valuable that we have spent this amount of time upon it. It would have been impossible to legislate earlier because of the new Stock Exchange arrangements. The consensus will mean that there is a much better chance of the proposals working in practice.

It is important to remember the kind of financial scandal that the White Paper is intended to combat. People are still prepared to cut out a small coupon from a Sunday newspaper and send off a cheque for £1,000 to an organisation about which they know nothing, except for the details given in the coupon. To me that is incredible, but so long as the practice continues there will need to be very strict regulation. People are still being ripped off. Only yesterday I received a letter from a constituent who told me:

> "In August 1982 my financial advisers put the balance of my savings (at that time nearly £17,000) into a very high-risk fund on the Commodity Futures market, without properly consulting me or—even when I asked about it—giving me information on the security of the fund. (I had originally asked only about pensions and then Eurobonds, which had been highly recommended and in which that money was placed at my request). In the end I lost £6,000 and consulted my solicitor and then Counsel. They said that the company had been guilty of professional negligence and deception on four counts (and there were similarities to the LHW Futures scandal, now in the hands of the Fraud Squad.) However it was not worth taking the matter to Court and the company state that further correspondence is 'too expensive' for them!"

That is still going on and the White Paper is trying to combat it.

The White Paper envisages the right balance between statutory control and self-regulation. It seeks to secure the best of both worlds—the protection that the statute will provide and the flexibility of self-regulation to which I referred earlier when I intervened during the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith).

Confidence and flexibility are two of the stated objectives of the White Paper, as are efficiency and competitiveness. I support all four of those objectives. I support also the principles which will underlie the new system. However, the most important principle of all is that of equivalence of treatment, to which reference has already been made. It will be very important that all those who operate in this area should be treated on as equal a basis as is practicable and possible. I would add one more principle to the six that are listed in the White Paper—disclosure of information. It is very important that the maximum amount of information should be disclosed to potential investors so that they have the maximum amount of information upon which to base investment decisions.

It is right that the definition of an investment should be wide, although it must at the same time be specific. I regret that I have to disagree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton, (Sir E. du Cann) about non-life insurance. I do not believe that motor insurance can be described as an investment. An amount of money is paid for a 12-month period, after which none of it is left. One is simply taking out insurance cover for a restricted period.

As for the institutional structure, it is agreed that there should be one body rather than two. This will provide three advantages. Under the existing arrangements there is the problem of either an overlap or a gap between the two bodies. Secondly, two bodies are bound to involve additional cost. Thirdly, as was mentioned by the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, exchange of information will be necessary if there are two bodies. For those reasons, I believe that there should be one body rather than two.

I am glad to note the recognition by the Government in the White Paper of the important contribution to self-regulation which has already been made by a number of organisations. I referred to that fact in my intervention. A great deal of pioneering work has been done, in particular by the National Association of Security Dealers and Investment Managers, to which I am the political adviser.

During the last few months and years NASDIM has introduced a fit and proper test of membership. It has strict separate client account rules, adequate financial resources rules, compulsory professional indemnity insurance cover, annual renewal of membership, random checks on member firms and a proper complaints and disciplinary procedure, with the right of appeal to an outside tribunal. NASDIM is also in the process of introducing a compensation fund. Therefore, it already meets many of the criteria set out in the White Paper and should fit well into the future framework that is envisaged by the White Paper.

Chapter 6 deals with the fit and proper test. I support the White Paper statement that the test will be applied to all investment businesses. However, it will not apparently be applied to individuals within those businesses. We need to think about what that means. It contrasts with the existing law. Section 15(4) of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 requires a recognised body to be able to furnish the Department of Trade and Industry with a list of the persons who are for the time being authorised by a member to deal in securities on his behalf. Surely, therefore, the White Paper proposals ought to include a requirement in law that individuals authorised to handle investment business on behalf of registered businesses should be adequately recorded and monitored. I may have misunderstood the import of paragraph 6·3, but I am inclined to think that it does not go far enough.

Chapter 7 deals with the rules for the conduct of business. In some respects it is not tough enough. First, on compensation, I agree with what was said by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East. Paragraph 7.12 refers to professional indemnity insurance and says that it could be made a requirement. I believe that it should be made a requirement. That point was made by the Consumers Association in its submission.

On the disclosure of terms of investment business, paragraph 7.15 says that "An investment business should disclose the full terms of business dealing to actual and prospective customers".

I support that statement. However, paragraphs 10.10 and 10.11 propose one of two routes for the disclosure of commissions to prospective investors. Either specific details of the amount and nature of the commission to be paid should be given or there should be an undertaking that it is within the limits prescribed by a voluntary agreement within the industry. I do not think that that is good enough. I assume that all those within the voluntary agreement will charge the maximum. If not, they will presumably inform investors of it as an advantage. I believe that specific details should be provided in every case. In Stock Exchange transactions, every contract note shows all the associated costs in detail. I see no reason to depart from that. Indeed, I believe that the principle of equivalence of treatment would not be met if that were not so.

The White Paper sets out a framework for investment protection and describes the parameters of the legislation. Naturally, it does not go into great detail, so some questions of detail remain unanswered. It may not be the easiest thing to contrive, but it would be most helpful if the Government could publish draft clauses or a draft Bill before the legislation is introduced in November or December. I realise that the constraints of the timetable may make that difficult. The Government have had difficulties with the Insolvency Bill because, although the White Paper set out the principles, there was no opportunity to comment on the details until the Bill appeared. In this case it is almost more important to get things right because the success of the legislation will depend so much on the goodwill and co-operation of those being asked to operate it.

Mr. Gould: I very much agree with that suggestion. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that Professor Gower intended to publish a part 2 to his report which would have taken the form of a draft Bill. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is a pity that Professor Gower was dissuaded from taking that course?

Mr. Smith: Frankly, I had forgotten about part 2, having given up asking parliamentary questions about when it was to be published. I shall be interested to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister whether and when it is to be published. He may well reply, of course, that that draft Bill would have been based on the Gower report and that we have moved on since then. In any event, it would be helpful to have draft clauses or a draft Bill because I believe that the proposals will work well only if the financial services industry is kept fully informed.

Sir Edward du Cann: My hon. Friend might also consider the alternative or additional possibility of using the procedure now established in the House for legislation to be submitted at an early stage to a Special Standing Committee for detailed and careful examination, during which people in the industry could give evidence and have it considered far away from the usual party battles.

Mr. Smith: That is a most constructive suggestion. I believe that proposals of this kind, on which there is a consensus, are especially well suited to the Special Standing Committee procedure. That would be a useful additional process. I am anxious that there should be the maximum scope for consultation before the legislation is published. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to respond to that.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I welcome the atmosphere of harmony and consensus which has characterised the debate so far—perhaps yesterday's dreadful scenes had a cathartic effect—and I do not intend to disturb it.

The Secretary of State seemed to have most difficulty with questions about the appointment of the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board. He said that the Bill aimed to establish confidence both within the industry and among the consumers. I believe that the legislation must also secure the confidence of the British people, no doubt expressed through this House, in one of our greatest institutions which has brought us great advantage in terms of its invisible earnings and its standing in the world. The right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) said that the people on the boards are everything, and he is absolutely right. They must be people in whom we can repose our confidence. The Secretary of State said that one of the advantages of legislation along the lines set out in the White Paper would be to give a sense of accountability, through himself and through Parliament, to the regulation of affairs on the Stock Exchange. In many ways that is the important principle in relation to the appointment of the SIB chairman.

The present proposals will give the Governor of the Bank of England a veto. I can find no other word. The Secretary of State is known for fairly pungent and plain speaking, but if it is not a veto, I do not know what it is. If the Governor of the Bank of England puts in a caveat, and adheres to it, he will be able to prevent an appointment, whatever the wishes of the Secretary of State. In the final analysis, an objection from the Governor of the Bank of England will have a determining effect. If that is not a veto, I do not know what is.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark, who is also known for pungent speaking, referred to this veto as a constitutional outrage. That may be overstating the case a little, but it is certainly a matter of constitutional concern that the Secretary of State should be giving a veto of that nature to a public servant. The Secretary of State ended by saying that he wanted the House to give its views and that those views would be taken fully into account. I hope that he will recognise the strength of feeling on this in all parts of the House, not least on the Conservative Back Benches, and perhaps think again.

According to the Secretary of State, the White Paper has two aims—to make the Stock Exchange a clean place in which to do business, as he put it, and to fit the City out for the future. The first may be easier to achieve than the second, although it is no less important. Whether the White Paper should be supported will depend on the conclusions that we reach about those two aims.

Members in all parts of the House have recognised that the Stock Exchange is going through profound changes, due to technological developments, the forces liberated in recent years with the restructuring of various organs of the Stock Exchange and because the whole business has become more intensely international in character. In those circumstances, as the Secretary of State has said, some flexibility is needed. We have no crystal ball to tell us exactly how this will turn out, but if I criticise this aspect of the White Paper it is on the ground that too much flexibility may not be the best option. International operators need to have a clear idea of the general framework through which they are to make their investments and the rules within which they must operate. Too much flexibility could lead to a sense of chaos or continual change.

On the proposals for the two boards, I suspect from what the Secretary of State has said that we are pushing at a half-open door. The proposed boards will be hybrid in nature, complicated and bureaucratic and, some believe, in many ways unworkable. Damage may well result if the Secretary of State sticks to the present proposals.

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Member should not confuse flexibility with clarity. The flexibility which I seek is that of legislating for a system capable of changing to meet future demands which we cannot at the moment foresee. However, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the regulations should be clear, and of course they should not constantly change.

Mr. Ashdown: I hear what the right hon. Gentleman says. In my view, there is a lack of clarity in the White Paper about what the Secretary of State perceives to be the ultimate destination. As the Gower report made plain, the right hon. Gentleman had three options. He could have allowed the situation to be totally self-regulatory. We all welcome the fact that he decided not to pursue that option. No doubt he acted in the light both of his own views and of the debate in the House last year in which the opinion was widely expressed that a totally self-regulatory system would be inadequate. The second option was that of a balance between self-regulation and a statutory framework. That is the option which the right hon. Gentleman has chosen, and which Professor Gower predicted in his report would be adopted. The third option—and here I see a lack of clarity—was that of an independent commission. That was the option preferred by many people.

We do not know exactly where we are going. The Secretary of State says that it may be a question of two boards, or of one. The Minister says that there is not much difference between a single board and an independent commission. That view is broadly shared. Which of the two solutions is it to be? Is it not important for the Secretary of State to give to the House, the industry, the Stock Exchange and the international investors a clearer idea of his view of the ultimate destination?

I welcome the move from self-regulation to what one might perhaps call a halfway house. No doubt the Secretary of State has been tempted—as we all might be in his position—by the advantages of a gradualist, evolutionary approach, of flexibility, and of the need to build on the present characteristics and nature of the industry. However, the confidence of the industry, especially internationally, would be greatly reinforced, both now and when the scheme is given legislative form, if we had a clearer idea from the Secretary of State of the ultimate destination. From that point of view, it would have been better to take a larger and more courageous step and to say exactly what we want. Would one board really be equivalent to an independent commission? I do not know. It is important that we should have a clearer idea.

The right hon. Member for Taunton referred to insurance. Like others, I welcome the safeguards and protection for the purchasers of life insurance. However, I share the right hon. Gentleman's view that we must recognise that people can be damaged to a significant extent by non-life insurance too. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), like me, agrees with the right hon. Gentleman that there is a need to broaden the ambit of the protections so that they will cover others too.

Mr. Gould: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this is a very difficult line to draw. However, his point applies to almost any business transaction. People can be damaged by any foolish purchase. Where would the hon. Gentleman draw the line?

Mr. Ashdown: That is a fair point, but the insurance industry stands alone. It is clearly defined. It would not be difficult, or excessively regulatory, to treat it as a whole. The point made by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) about damage is valid, but it seems to me that we are taking only half a step when we could take a whole one. We are separating off a portion of the industry and providing safeguards only for those within it.

The White Paper must be judged by the two criteria set by the Secretary of State himself. First, will it ensure that the City is clean, and, secondly, will it fit the City for the future? There is some doubt whether these proposals will do the first of those jobs. An article in The Times on 30 January 1985 resorted to hyperbole uncharacteristic of that paper, saying:

"It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that if legislation is enacted on the basis of the White Paper, financial vermin will still be allowed to scamper unhampered through the sewers".

I would not necessarily associate myself with that phraseology, but there is concern that the regulations suggested in the White Paper may well not be strong enough.

Will the proposals fit the City for the future? The White Paper is a transitional one rather than one which delineates the ultimate destination. It would be improved by a larger amount of what the Secretary of State has himself referred to—clarity. I welcome its general direction, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South. The document contains useful proposals, but perhaps it does not do enough or go far enough.

The Secretary of State had an opportunity to create the framework for the future of the Stock Exchange. Unhappily, in my view, he has not wholly done so. He has made a beginning, but the framework is skimpy. Additions will have to be made to it. Others more knowledgeable than I have made the same prediction. The proposals in the White Paper, if they are enacted, will be deficient, although the general direction is welcome. The White Paper, to that extent, represents a lost opportunity.

The Secretary of State says that he will be flexible in taking account of the views of the House. I hope that he will be. The White Paper is more a signpost for the future than a clear delineation of a destination. We hope that in framing the legislation the right hon. Gentleman will take into account the opinions that have been expressed, and that the legislation will provide an effective structure for the future rather than a general direction.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): I join others in welcoming the consensus in the House on this important White Paper, and the opportunity that we have been given to lay down some guidelines before the legislation is introduced next Session.

The White Paper marks an important step towards improving investor protection. New markets and new technology bring benefits, but they also bring problems. There is no doubt that the emergence of new markets, such as the unlisted securities market and the financial futures market, have provided new opportunities both within the City and outside it. Easier access to those markets provides new investment opportunities for many people, and information technology enhances the opportunities presented to many people who take advantage of those markets. Many advantages also arise from the increasing competitiveness in the marketing techniques that many financial companies, and many markets themselves, have operated in recent years.

However, those welcome factors have one undesirable consequence. Investors have become more vulnerable. The scandalous fraud cases such as have been referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) have tainted the reputations not just of individual firms but also of long-established markets. Public and international confidence in the City as a free and fair market is in danger of being undermined unless an effective regulatory system is introduced and the law brought up to date.

I also pay tribute to Professor Gower, who has stimulated public debate and made recommendations. In his carefully judged interim and final reports, he tried sensitively to bring the Government forward in what they were prepared to accept and propose. I think that I can say on behalf of many hon. Members, and without immodesty, that the House has also played its part in the process and encouraged them to be prepared to do what they might not have been prepared to do a few years ago. Gower and hon. Members have played their part. I hope that my right hon. Friend and his predecessors accept that.

There is an urgent need for a new framework of protection. Rapid changes in the City make that desirable with the arrival of financial conglomerates and because scandals, failures and uncovered positions are more prevalent in bear markets. Although I have faith that the resurgence of our economy will continue indefinitely, when it comes to investing my own money, I am prepared to bet that, sooner or later, there will be a bear market. I know from experience that, in bear markets, uncovered situations and unscrupulous operators are found out and Joe Public suffers a substantial loss. It is the business of the House to try to protect the public from that eventuality. That is why I emphasise that the matter is urgent.

The White Paper admits that there will be no legislation before the next parliamentary Session. Such legislation will not be enacted before July next year and it will probably not come into effect until January 1987, unless the bodies are operating beforehand on a non-statutory basis. I am pleased to see my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State nodding and thereby seeming to agree that he wants to put the proposals into effect as soon as possible. Many of us would like there to be a regulatory framework sooner rather than later.

We must frame laws and a regulatory system, but not just in response to identifiable problems that have arisen. Some fraud cases have already been referred to today. We should provide a durable and flexible regime—those adjectives are not incompatible. Much of the legislation that governs sectors of the financial market has been passed in response to crises or problems and have not proved durable or appropriate. The Banking Act 1979 was rightly passed in response to problems in the banking sector in the early 1970s, but it is now too restrictive and does not allow sufficient competition. It does not allow successful banking companies to build up their status within the classifications of banking set out in that Act.

Conversely, the Lloyd's Act 1982 was passed slightly before there was a major scandal on the insurance markets. That scandal showed that legislation was necessary. The House should therefore have confidence in its ability to discuss these issues. It should have confidence in its judgment and status and not leave these matters to the City on the assumption that it always knows best. The initial Lloyd's Bill was resented and objected to because it was thought that it would destroy Lloyd's as we had known it. Amendments were made about divestment and conflict of interest, and they were hotly resented by Lloyd's. Nevertheless, the House passed them and, in the light of events, those changes proved absolutely right. We have since heard some objections from Lloyd's about the Act, but the House was quite right to pass such legislation. However, times change and we should not introduce legislation just to redress the problems of the past. We should try to make it endure.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I thoroughly agree with my hon. Friend. I wonder whether he is aware that the very first Companies Act was introduced in 1696 and dealt with the abuses of stockbroking.

Mr. Nelson: My hon. Friend has provided an interesting and persuasive anecdote, but he will know that there have been many Companies Acts since then.

The Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 was passed when markets were much simpler and more stable. In the 1950s, when we had nil or relatively low levels of inflation and therefore much lower levels of interest, there was a much clearer and simpler distinction between an equity and a bond. An equity was regarded as a risk investment whereas a bond was regarded as a fixed investment with an assured maturity and an assured rate of interest. Whether the interest was paid or the bond was redeemed depended substantially on the view of the quality of the person issuing it. Irrespective of whether it was a gilt-edged security or a corporate bond, there was a much simpler division between debt liabilities and equity liabilities. That division has been broken down, largely because of higher levels of inflation and the increasing volatility of exchange rates.

Bond or debt issues are now regarded as much the same as a security or equity issue. One has to make many of the same judgments about a bond or fixed interest issue as about an equity issue. That judgment has to be about currency movements, inflation rates and comparative inflation rates. The fact that a range of debt instruments are now being marketed here and in the United States, where there is a secondary market in mortgages, shows how we have moved on since the 1950s.

Against that background, the White Paper rightly makes the case for proper investor protection, while trying to maintain the vitality of the United Kingdom as the world's principal financial market. We should not forget that it generates some £7 billion of foreign earnings, about 2 million jobs and about 7 per cent. of our national income. It should be the House's responsibility to ensure that that prosperity is maintained and the protection of investors improved.

The Government have done much to promote the City's international competitiveness already. We have removed exchange controls, dividend controls and price controls and there has been a significant reduction in stamp duty and an extension of private ownership through the privatisation programme. By no means least, the welcome changes announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on capital gains tax on the futures markets will be influential in promoting the resurgence of those markets.

One of the problems of the futures markets is that, since their setting up, and in particular since the setting up of the London international financial futures exchange, there has been a lack of liquidity in the market and a lack of the speculator who performs an essential and indispensable role in the futures market. A substantial reason was the tax restraints on operations in that market which, as I understand it, have now been removed by the Chancellor's statement and will be incorporated in the Finance Bill. I hope that this change will bring about a substantial increase in the turnover, the opportunities and the attraction of the London financial futures markets of all sorts in years to come.

I believe that it is essential for the House to recognise the significant role that the speculator plays in providing liquidity to these markets, and the importance of the futures markets to the City of London and our financial system generally. Some have regarded these new arrivals as rather garnish and esoteric, but in my view there will come a time, especially if volatile international economic situations prevail, when corporate treasurers will be judged culpable if they have not considered defraying their liabilities through use of the futures markets. I believe that it is viable, essential and responsible for industrial and financial companies to consider using those markets.

Mr. Gould: I agree that there has been a shortage of liquidity in these markets. Would the hon. Gentleman accept that a natural limit may be reached at some point to the amount of money available for speculating in the markets, and that the more financial futures markets proliferate in London and elsewhere, perhaps the closer we will get to that limit?

Mr. Nelson: No, I would not agree with the hon. Gentleman, although I understand the point that he is trying to make. I believe that the London futures markets are ideally placed not only to grow in their own right in the organic way that I have suggested in trying to attract new business from corporate and other clients, but also to take substantial amounts of business from other international markets. If one considers the enormous growth of the Chicago mercantile exchange and, more recently, the establishment of the financial futures market in Singapore, one observes that in the American and Pacific basins there is already an enormous use of these markets.

We in this country are well placed to make specialist markets. One example is the Baltic exchange and the other is the gold market where the world price is established every day. We are ideally placed internationally to take advantage of business that arrives on the financial futures exchanges. One of the most used aspects of the futures markets in the United States is the stock index market, which enables managers of investment portfolios to defray risks of adverse movements in the portfolios under their control by hedging their risks on the stock index futures market. That has been widely used, and is very attractive and profitable in Chicago. That is exactly the sort of thing that we should be doing already in this country. We are well placed to do it now, and the sooner we can bring this about, the better. I believe that the removal of tax restraints on this aspect of business will allow great prospects for the development of these markets.

One of the principal aspects of the debate is whether we should have one board or two in control of the self-regulatory authorities and broadly in overall control of the financial markets in the City. As I have said in the House on previous occasions, in my judgment the arguments for two boards, or indeed more, are shallow and unsustainable. The White Paper admits that no new framework can be legislated for before 1987. In the meantime, two bodies will be developed—the Securities and Investment Board and the Marketing of Investments Board—to the stage where authority can be delegated to them. This may have been implicit in the appointment of the Martin Jacombe and Marshall Field groups, but no argument, other than saying that the bodies will be "function-based", as the White Paper asserts, is adduced in favour of two boards rather than one board.

There is, I believe, a suspicion that the underlying reason behind continuing to promulgate the case for two boards is a paranoia about creating any body that could be comparable to, or turned into, an American-style Securities and Exchange Commission. I believe that the reasons for this that were put forvard by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East are most unlikely to be valid.

In this country, the system of self-regulation is quite different—particularly, for example, in takeovers—and there should and could be no reasonable fear that, were we to establish one body, it would take on the nature of a securities and exchange commission.

I believe that there are strong arguments for one board as opposed to two as proposed in the White Paper. First, as the White Paper admits, financial conglomerates encompass marketing and investment business. It would be anomalous and unnecessarily confusing to have two boards. Secondly, the Government recognise that there will be overlapping regulatory responsibilities. Indeed, the White Paper states in paragraph 3·2:

"If the law and the regulatory system are to be clear and fair there must so far as this is possible be equivalence of treatment between products and services competing in the same market."

Such an assertion in my judgmentis quite inconsistent with the later admission that there would be overlapping regulatory responsiblities and that anomalies would inevitably arise.

Thirdly, and by no means least important, there shall be all-party support for the setting up of the board. This is important not only to avoid future uncertainty over the structure and, therefore, the authority of the regulatory system, but also to ensure that the new board gets off to a good start, that it enjoys some certainty about its future continuation and that it has the confidence of all political parties in the House.

One is led to the view again, perhaps for clever political and tactical reasons, that the Government have wanted to be seen to be dragged into the position where they agree to having one board rather than asserting it from the beginning. In the gentlest and most constructive way, I have to say to my right hon. and hon. Friends that the House made this view clear a long time ago. It should have been obvious from the views expressed on both sides of the House at that time that that was what the House would wear and that was the inevitable course of events. The Government should have recognised that this is going to be the political reality and that we are not going to wear a different system in law. Therefore, it should have been encompassed in the White Paper.

The only reason that I can see for not doing that is either the paranoia to which I have referred — that we are terrified of a Securities and Exchange Commission; or that it might be a Trojan horse which, perish the thought, some future Government of a different complexion might turn into a much more powerful controlling body. But that might happen anyway. One cannot stop those eventualities. Surely it is better to judge on the basis of fact now, consensus and what is desirable, have the courage of one's convictions and state what is right. If the whole House has agreed with and asked for it, why should the Government be seen to be resisting that advice?

Therefore, I express some concern that the Government in producing the White Paper have not responded as fully as I think they should have done to the views that the House expressed. The writing was clearly on the wall in the earlier debate. Why are we now presented with a White Paper that proposes two bodies when it is clear that the House is not going to wear them and that there will eventually be one body? As many hon. Members have said, many parts of the City are themselves reconciled not only to one body, but to the possibility of that one body eventually having substantially greater supervisory powers.

I believe that there are narrow conceptual differences between offering and providing an investment service. What is the difference, let us say, between a merchant bank which offers its services generally to people who want to have their investments managed and place their investments with that merchant bank, which promptly puts the investments into a house equity investment fund that is exactly the same as a unit trust—that happens widely in the City—and another situation in which a unit trust actively markets its units to the public? Both are exactly the same, yet under the proposals one would come under the ambit of the Securities and Investments Board and the other under the Marketing of Investments Board. That would be anomalous and undesirable.

I too share the reservations about the White Paper's proposals for the Secretary of State to appoint the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board with the agreement of the Governor of the Bank of England—effectively it would be his veto — while the board members would be appointed by the Governor, presumably with the agreement of the Secretary of State. Interestingly enough, and conversely in the case of the MIB, the chairman and members would be appointed by the Secretary of State, not specifically with the agreement of the Governor of the Bank of England but generally with that of the financial sectors involved.

Mr. Budgen: Is not this likely to be a very similar sort of agreement to that which is required when bishops are appointed, where the appointment is by the Crown but with the appearance of agreement by other bodies? The Governor is now the servant of the state. He is a high civil servant and no longer an independent functionary. It is impossible to envisage that he would refuse his agreement in any formal way.

Mr. Nelson: With great respect, I am not sure whether my hon. Friend advances his case by drawing on that precedent. While the Governor may be more tied than he has been in the past, it is evident to many people who have tried to follow these matters that in recent years, for the reasons I gave earlier, just as the prudential role of the Bank of England in terms of covering the fiduciary issue and the monetary aspects of banking control has extended substantially into the equity sector, so the remit of the Governor and the Bank of England has extended in an unlegislated and unenvisaged way into the scrutiny and control of the investment markets.

I am suspicious of the role of the Bank of England in these matters. I have the greatest confidence, as I hope all hon. Members have, in the present Governor and his very able deputy, Mr. Walker. But that is not the point. We are not making judgments about the ability of individuals—we are talking about the long-term future and the proper role of scrutiny. In my judgment, there is a basic distinction between looking after the banking and prudential requirements of the City of London and making much more judgmental decisions about investment markets, fit and proper rules, and the sort of organisations which should be involved in investment, insurance and so on. The Bank of England has a wholly proper responsibility in fiduciary matters under the Banking Act, but not in the investments sphere, which is much more judgmental, where the public is far more exposed, where political aspects come much more into play, and where this House, through the Secretary of State, has a responsibility to make the appointments to these relevant boards.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is not all this a fuss about nothing, and is not my hon. Friend to some extent belittling the role of the Bank of England? There are few enough people capable of taking an independent and informed view of these matters. My hon. Friend mentioned several individuals presently associated with the Bank of England. Surely they have made an important and constructive contribution to the measures that we are debating.

Mr. Nelson: I agree with my hon. Friend. I do not wish for a moment to underestimate or decry the great ability, experience and contribution which members of the Bank of England have brought to prudential supervision of the banking and investment sectors. However, the new investment and futures markets, and the new international aspects of those markets, are of quite a different order. As well as deserving separate supervision, they require different criteria in supervision from those which apply to the banking sector.

There have recently been problems in the United States with the Government bond market. I understand that those problems arose because of inadequacies in the supervisory system in assessing the capital adequacy of the companies involved in the secondary gilt markets. This is relevant because the White Paper makes certain recommendations about the gilt markets. If the same body looks at the capital adequacy requirements of the banks and the capital adequacy of a range of investment institutions which may deal in these bonds, there is a danger that the simple application of rules which may be relevant and prudential to the banking sector will be wholly deficient for the range of international, small and varied groups which deal in the investment sector. For this and other reasons, a differentiation is required between the financial, prudential responsibility of the Bank of England and investment and equity interests which should be supervised separately under a board or boards, as the White Paper proposes.

The White Paper identifies a number of duties for all investment businesses which could protect investors more adequately, such as fair dealing, fit and proper rules and disclosure. The abuses which arise from conflicts of interest within investment businesses have been commented upon and are worthy of some deliberation by this House. In my judgment, no reliance can be placed on the so-called Chinese walls—the practice of trying to keep private one part of a business from another part of that business.

When one looks at the agglomeration of financial businesses over recent years — particularly the acquisition of stock broking and stock jobbing firms by merchant banks and investment companies — one sees that the opportunities for breaching these Chinese walls are infinitely greater than in the past. Anyone with experience of working in merchant banks or the financial sector will, to say the least, know that there is great opportunity for breaching so-called Chinese walls where underwriting is involved. For example, a major company could accept to underwrite a new shares issue on an acquisition, but subsequently all the clients of the Investment division could find that the next day their portfolios are stuffed with the shares of that company, supposedly for the very best of reasons, although coincidentally that investment judgment is made on the very same day as an underwriting issue is made. That happens all the time.

As the White Paper recognises, very little reliance should, and can, be placed on Chinese walls. There is all the more need for independent scrutiny, fair dealing and a complaints procedure which is open to investors.

There should be a stronger duty on all involved in the investment markets to disclose their activities. However, disclosure should not extend necessarily to naming clients in all the markets. It is important to recognise that in some markets—for example, the metal markets—confidentiality is important. Where major countries are dealing on those markets, the disclosure of identity could prove a major inhibition.

There will be some problems in implementing the segregation of funds as proposed in the White Paper, especially in markets which require margin payments. The principle is sound. The White Paper also refers to compensation proposals and says that one or more of three possibilities should be considered to provide compensation to investors. One is the funded compensation scheme; the second is the transferred liability scheme; and the third is insurance. Unlike the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), I am much more circumspect about the funded compensation scheme. I do not think that the examples of travel agencies or insurance have necessarily been happy or proper ones. I would place much greater reliance on statutory insurance responsibilities and requirements on operating companies and also on transferred liability schemes whereby the liabilities of individual companies could be assumed forcibly by their holding companies if they were found liable in any action that was brought.

There is a need for much tougher penalties in regard to fraud than the White Paper proposes, particularly for individuals and not just companies. The threat of revocation of authorisation to carry on a business is not in itself a sufficient deterrent to some unscrupulous operators, and it should not be seen as the ultimate deterrent. We have to identify and hammer the individuals involved.

I very much support the establishment and work of the fraud investigation group, which has heavy and difficult responsibilities. I hope that Lord Roskill will come up with a more effective procedure in criminal cases of this kind. The Opposition parties should approach the recommendations of the Roskill committee with an open mind. The House has a common responsibility to find a more effective way of dealing with outrageous cases of fraud which up to now have proved exceedingly difficult to prosecute. Even when they have been prosecuted, they have involved an inordinate amount of time and public money. We should consider with an open mind any new procedures. Although the White Paper proposes certain fundamental changes in jury or other systems which Opposition Members and some of my hon. Friends find unpalatable, we have a serious responsibility, given the prevalence of substantial and harmful fraud cases in recent years, to consider radical reforms.

A small but significant proposal in the White Paper is the establishment of open-ended investment trusts. The corollary would be a geared unit trust—that is to say, a unit trust which can borrow money. There is a need for the public to be notified clearly what sort of fund they are investing in; they need to know when the risks are commensurately higher.

In regard to pensions, the House recognises that there is a need to safeguard the more than £100 billion that is invested in occupational pension schemes. Changes in trust law may be needed. The changes proposed in the Social Security Bill for accounting on the disposal of assets are welcome.

As to whether the pension management business of insurance companies should be treated as insurance, as it is at present, or as investments, I believe, as did Professor Gower, that logically it should be the latter. If it is not possible to bring it within that ambit, the proposal in the White Paper that it be brought within the ambit of the board should suffice.

My hon. Friend may be able to tell us when he is winding up whether there is a need to qualify the rules on issues and takeovers in statute law. I understand that this may be necessary under an EEC directive. The City Panel on Takeovers and Mergers has done a good job. If my hon. Friend is considering statutory changes, particularly to section 209 of the Companies Act 1948 on the compulsory acquisition of minority interests, I hope he will bear uppermost in his mind the need to protect minority interests and also the need to ensure that some of the worst practices of so-called golden parachutes — whereby directors of companies that are being taken over carve out for themselves enormous redundancy or service contract payments—are stopped once and for all. Such practices bring the City into disrepute and add further to lack of confidence.

With those comments, which I hope my hon. Friend will regard as being specifically constructive rather than critical, I join others in giving the White Paper a broad welcome. I wish my hon. Friend a great deal of luck, which he will need in framing legislation to satisfy the desires of the House.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) has shown how skills and experience acquired outside the House can be used for its benefit. The main thrust of the White Paper that we are debating today is that rigorous self-regulation with a full range of powers will provide a fresh climate for the operation of financial services in the United Kingdom. By and large, this is a correct approach and, indeed, the only viable approach, and I am happy to support it.

Despite this approach to the problem, the White Paper acknowledges that things can go wrong and properly devotes a chapter to enforcement. It faces up in a somewhat limited way to the question of enforcing the new structure upon those who seek to exploit it by way of fraud. As the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) put it in The Times, they are like vermin scamping through a sewer.

Responsibility for the pursuit and prosecution of those suspected of criminal offences under the legislation is to be given to the Department of Trade and Industry and the prosecution authorities, which we are left to assume will be the Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions. I should like to wish them well. My only criticism—a constructive criticism—of the White Paper is that it has not faced up to the restrictions and limitations, particularly of an international nature, under which those agencies will have to operate. The Secretary of State, in an intervention in the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), said that it was a matter of the law rather than resources, but I think that it is both.

The major commercial frauds of the '70s and '80s have shown up alarming deficiencies in our criminal codes which were drawn up before the explosion of modern technology, particularly in communications, and which have been found to be woefully inadequate to bring offenders to trial and to ensure that justice is done and is seen to be done.

The White Paper says in paragraph 3.2:

"Prevention is better than cure."

The difficulty in this country is that in combating the international criminal there is little preventive work of the kind that we see in other areas of crime. The reason is that the crimes are sophisticated and international. There needs to be a high degree of expertise in combating the commercial fraudster and, not surprisingly, it is not always available at local police force level.

The most welcome development in this country, in response to pressure for a more aggressive attitude in combating commercial frauds, was the creation by the Government of the fraud investigation group to concentrate more on the large fraud cases. The combination of experts from the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions should sharpen some of the weaker aspects of prosecution policy, but several limitations remain.

Although it is not admitted officially, it is a policy of the DPP not to bring actions against criminals where the person engaged in fraud is a foreign national and where his victims are also foreign nationals. Furthermore, the criminal may also escape the risk of prosecution in the country where his victims live because that country may not have jurisdiction to deal with a crime committed in this country.

It has also been reported that the police do not intervene when money involved in an overseas fraud is in a United Kingdom bank. In an unofficial response the DPP did not deny such suggestions but pointed out the difficulty of getting witnesses to come from abroad and the cost of doing so. In one case the DPP paid a witness to attend a fraud trial in this country. It put him up in the best hotel at great expense, only to find that the witness withdrew his allegations against the criminal. It transpired that the criminal had returned the money of which he had defrauded the witness and the witness, being satisfied, flew back to Germany. It is obvious, therefore, that having trials with overseas witnesses will cost a lot of money. Governments must be prepared to increase their budgets for prosecutions if it is their wish to make progress in this matter.

Notwithstanding the introduction of the fraud investigation group, the great fear on the limitation of prosecution policy is that not only will the lack of prosecutions attract criminals to Britain, especially to London and the City of London, but that their uninterrupted operations will eventually damage the probity of British financial institutions.

Some police officers believe that those engaged in international fraud are already aware of the situation and are preparing to capitalise on it. Anyone would be free to come to the United Kingdom, buy a company for a minimal sum, issue innumerable cheques and commit any other type of financial crime as long as no British residents suffered any loss. There is great fear that this country has already become a haven for such criminals.

What justification is there for this country to spend more money prosecuting other nations' criminals? The financial services in this country make a substantial contribution to the economy, contributing more than £4 billion a year to the balance of payments and employing a million people. Accordingly, I believe that the price for receiving such a tremendous benefit to the economy is that these areas of operations, particularly in the marine world, must be more thoroughly policed and that some of the resources derived from them should be put back into the policing of them.

Hon. Members may have read recently in the press that the notorious fraud which evolved around the sale of cargo of the Salem N and its subsequent scuttling recently came to a head when some of the perpetrators of the fraud were prosecuted in the United States. As one of the intended victims was a United Kingdom company, it is clear that the United States is prepared to prosecute perpetrators of fraud in this country, and we should adopt a similar attitude to other countries' criminals.

Many steps can be taken to help the prosecuting agencies in this country. There are loopholes in our law of jurisdiction. If two people operating in this country conspire to commit a fraud which takes effect wholly overseas, they have committed no offence over which the United Kingdom courts have jurisdiction. I am pleased to say that this point is now being investigated by the Law Commission.

Furthermore, if the country in which the crime was carried out has no extradition agreement with this country, the perpetrators of the fraud can cheerfully carry on with their business in Britain without fear of extradition or prosecution. However, our poor image in the extradition world is now being reviewed in the recently issued Home Office Green Paper on the subject of extradition.

On an international level, there are positive moves afoot, primarily by the United Nations committee for trade and development, which is considering sponsoring international conventions for jurisdiction and extradition to cope with the epidemic of marine fraud which is prevalent.

Only by true international co-operation will the international criminal be foiled. Sadly, there is no true international police network which can get to grips with combating the international criminal. There is, however, a glimmer of hope. Interpol, despite its glamorous image, has been little more than a communications link between national police forces. It was prevented from being anything other than that by French law, which prohibited the keeping of records. This law has recently been relaxed and it is now open to Interpol to develop an international rogues' gallery. I understand that it is proposed to instal a computer to handle such information. This is a substantial step forward in creating a greater degree of international co-operation in this sphere.

I hope that Government Departments, and particularly the Department of Trade and Industry, will make a positive thrust in all these initiatives to protect the investor. It is not enough to say, "If the victim or perpetrator of a fraud is a foreigner, it is not our responsibility". We operate in a truly international climate and there must be a much greater effort if we are to comply with the sentence in paragraph 1.2 of the White Paper, which says:

> "All should know that they are doing business within a system which is properly regulated, where fraudulent or dishonest conduct is prohibited".

It adds that people should know that this is > "a clean place in which to do business."

We still have some way to go before we can, with honesty, proclaim that. We are one of the, if not the, leading financial centres of the world and we must put our house in order.

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): When the House first debated this subject, on 22 November 1983 on the Second Reading of the Restrictive Trade Practices (Stock Exchange) Bill, many hon. Members, some of whom are taking part in today's debate, expressed grave reservations about the substantial changes that were taking place in the City.

The financial revolution had already started, even at that time. The development of financial supermarkets was already going on, and the technical divisions between the services which had traditionally been provided in the City by separate bodies were being broken down. The new technology had been with us for a long time and had established a completely different world in the transaction of international business.

New markets and services were being set up. I shall refer to only two. The unlisted securities market was already successful, although it was not a particularly regulated market. There has since been established the international financial futures exchange, which provides an essential service to traders, enabling them to hedge against fluctuating interest and exchange rates.

With those changes came the need for improved regulation. The introduction of dual capacity, or even treble or quadruple capacity, was creating a completely new situation, and never was there a time when improved regulation was more needed in the City.

Such regulation, in its purest form, just about worked when single brokers, single jobbers and single fund managers dealt with one another. If one broke the rules, more often than not the others would take action. Each had his own axe to grind, and if somebody else tried to blunt it the law of the jungle would usually provide the remedy; and there is nothing wrong with the law of the jungle in that type of situation. It works well. But how could such a system of regulation work if the broker was also the jobber, the fund manager and the bank? Clearly, it could not. Something new was required.

Until this week, the small broking houses alone appeared to have been complaining about what was happening, while their better-heeled big brothers had been signing up with the new financial conglomerates beneficial conditional sell-out contracts. This week, Barclays De Zoete Wedd, in embryo—because that firm does not yet exist—declared its hand, not because it was concerned about the future of the minnows but because, perhaps we should say, it was honest enough to declare that, in its view, the conflicts of interest with which the White Paper was concerned simply could not be avoided.

The Chinese walls, whatever they were, have already started to fall down. Indeed, I wonder whether they ever existed. Whatever they were, anything less like the great wall of China would be difficult to imagine. When the insurance market at Lloyd's has, for its own protection and that of its reputation, moved towards single capacity, and when the Prime Minister has said that she is implacably opposed to dual capacity in the legal profession—that is, between solicitors and barristers—if the financial services industry wishes to move irrevocably in the opposite direction, as it clearly does, it is indeed time for improved regulation.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is on record as saying that that is best done by allowing market forces to operate responsibly, without unnecessary restraints and in a way which promotes efficient and competitive business. A prerequisite, he said, for an internationally competitive industry was a clear, regulatory framework within which practitioners could deal with confidence and —the most important point—which safeguarded the interests of investors.

My right hon. Friend said on Second Reading of the Restrictive Trade Practices (Stock Exchange) Bill:

> "It is essential that if single capacity goes it is replaced by other protections, and probably the maximum openness and transparency . . . in dealings would essentially be among them".—[Official Report, 22 November 1983; Vol. 491, c. 190.]

Having read the White Paper, and having heard my right hon. Friend, we must tonight consider whether provision is being made for maximum openness and transparency in dealings. The White Paper is good on general principles, but the detailed rules are still to be settled because they are to be drawn up by the two new regulatory boards.

There are four main parts of the White Paper to which I particularly wish to draw the attention of the House. The first and most important is the duty on any investment business to disclose in advance any material interests. We have yet to settle what a material interest is, as a material interest to Merrill Lynch might not be one to the owner of 800 shares in British Telecom.

Secondly, the investment business must subordinate its own interests to that of its client. Thirdly, there must always be an adequate and reasonable basis for the making of investment recommendations. Fourthly, the failure by omission or mistake will be made the subject of criminal and civil liability and lead to the withdrawal of the right to trade. That latter point is important. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) described it as a draconian remedy, but it is one which the bodies concerned must be prepared to exercise, because if they are not the measure will become weaker than it would otherwise be.

Can we be sure, in the new world of financial conglomerates in which we shall have to live, that those close to the market are best able to ensure high standards of business conduct? I hope that they can, but we must not assume that they will. I note that the big investment businesses will have the right to appeal to an independent tribunal on disciplinary issues. I urge that a similar right be granted to those of their aggrieved clients who are not satisfied with the decision of the regulators.

I welcome the terms of reference of the Roskill committee which is examining whether trial by jury and the rule of evidence are appropriate for dealing with complex financial fraud cases. This has already been alluded to by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway). In cases of financially complex fraud, I wonder whether the traditional concept of the man who is charged being presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty is appropriate. This is a fundamental matter, but the Roskill committee might consider it. In such cases, the defendants are usually well-heeled individuals, and it would not be a terrible thing if the onus of proof were shifted more on to their shoulders than it is.

Criticisms of the White Paper are coming thick and fast, and I am concerned about them. The chartered accountancy bodies in England, Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland have recently said that they are worried about there being too much regulation. They have said that there must be a clearer definition of an investment business than there is now. Many firms of accountants are forming themselves into mini-financial conglomerates, and I wonder what their true motives are for questioning that aspect of the matter. I think that I can suspect what they are.

The British Insurance Brokers Association is concerned about the disclosure of commission. It is saying not that that should not happen, but that it will mislead the client as to the quality of the policies that it is selling. I should not have thought that this was an insurmountable problem. Surely it is not beyond the wit of the efficient salesmen whom the insurance brokers employ to explain to their clients what they are selling, while not detracting from that by admitting that there is a good commission in it for them at the same time. As a solicitor, I have never been faced with this problem, and my profession has always had the rule that if we receive a commission or another benefit from somebody as a result of recommending business of some sort to a client, we have to account to the client for it as part of our financial arrangements with him.

The arguments of Barclays De Zoete Wedd have to be tackled head-on. It has argued that the proposals are unworkable. It is clearly suggesting that the projected rules should be diluted so that the rule that a company should act in the best interest of a client is qualified in some way. As a solicitor, I find that extraordinary. Should people be relieved of the responsibility to act in their client's best interest, which is what Barclays De Zoete Wedd seem to be suggesting? Should they be relieved of the responsibility to disclose to clients what commission and other benefits they may obtain from a principal in broking? Should they seek to pretend that they are not really carrying on investment businesses when that is what they are doing?

Whatever the views of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about lawyers—and I know that he has some views, which he has expressed from time to time—I know that, as an honest man, he will accept that the legal profession has something to offer. Lawyers recognise a conflict of interest when they see it. It is clear enough. The concept of the conflict of interest has to be grappled with, and the financial services industry must be made to recognise it and accept that it is something with which it will have to deal. Therefore, I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to resist the lobbying of the special interest groups which want him to water down the commendable principles set out in his White Paper and to ensure that those principles are clearly reflected in the detailed regulations when they come into force.

I am concerned about the small specialist broker. He suffers many disadvantages compared with the financial conglomerates which are springing up all over the place, but he can provide the personal services which clients have come to expect. He has few difficulties with conflicts of interest, because he operates in a simple world and can see them clearly. If the conglomerates anticipate problems for themselves, perhaps this will enable the small man to compete more easily with them, and this would be no bad thing.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is in favour of competition. The maintenance of competition is another reason for the imposition of effective regulations on the financial services industry. Financial supermarkets must be made to conform and to conduct their affairs properly, as decent professional people have done for hundreds of years. Whatever changes have already taken place, and are still to take place, they must not and cannot relieve these institutions of their basic social responsibility.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I was interested by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield).

Normally, I find consensuses of the kind that we are seeing tonight deeply worrying because they usually mean that something is wrong. It may have arisen on this occasion because only one Labour Back-Bench Member has spoken so far.

Mr. Budgen: Do not encourage them.

Mr. Baker: I shall not do that.

I wish to apply to the White Paper one particular test that has not yet been applied—whether it assists to promote the development of the share-owning democracy. This process started in the 1950s, when many people of relatively small means became excited about the buying of shares, and became investors. The process came to a halt under the advances of high inflation, but it is now slowly on the move again, thanks to lower inflation and tax incentives introduced by the Government. The British Telecom share issue will have an effect as well. A system of practitioner-based regulation within a statutory framework is capable of assisting the process.

However, the rules must be clear and comprehensive and must be enforced firmly. I caution hon. Members against a system that is infested with lawyers because it will be too expensive and will definitely operate against the interests of the small investor. That is one reason why criminal penalties are necessary, and why self-regulation by self-regulatory bodies is also required.

We have discussed at length the two regulatory bodies proposed in the White Paper. I dissent from what seems to be the general view about that. After all, the two boards mentioned have different functions. Although they may be in the same building and although there may be some minor overlapping in their administration, I can see an advantage to the consumer in having boards or regulatory bodies that are closer to the affairs that they are supervising. In the balancing act that has to be performed between self-regulation and a central statutory control, I come down in favour of self-regulation and of more rather than fewer bodies. I was singularly unimpressed by the case put for having one body. The case adds up to it being tidier to have one body and easier for the public because they will know who to write to. Both of those things may be true but that is not a sufficient reason.

In practical and political terms, one such body is more likely to lead to an SEC. I was sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson), who spoke with great experience, did not make it clear whether he was in favour of an SEC or of just one central regulatory body. There is a difference. If anyone wants to see what power an SEC operates, he should look at the system in the United States. An enormous corpus of rules, a massive amount of paperwork and a huge bureaucracy are involved. The work for lawyers is phenomenal. As part of that, there is the supervision of the courts, which is very expensive and heavyweight. If it can be avoided, and if proper protection can be achieved for the investor, it is in the investor's interest that that should be done.

I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the Government have given us an assurance that they do not intend to go down the SEC road. I hope that that is so. But I also caution hon. Members against thinking that malpractices will not occur.

Mr. Ashdown: Perhaps I can press the hon. Gentleman further on that point. Like him, I gained the impression that the Secretary of State said that the Government did not wish to go down the SEC road. Yet even the Minister, when he questioned my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), seemed to think that a single board—which the Secretary of State has said that he would consider and might even grant—was the same thing. Is there not a good deal of confusion? On the one hand, it is said that a single board is the same thing as an SEC and, on the other, it is said that we do not want an SEC. Should not the confusion be cleared up?

Mr. Baker: There may, indeed, be some confusion. Some of those who support the idea of one board think that they are supporting a self-regulatory board, while others think that they are really supporting an SEC now, or in a few months time. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will clear up that point, because it needs to be clarified.

Malpractices will occur in any system. I was interested in what my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester said about the Lloyd's Bill, which I promoted. I shudder to think of the sort of Lloyd's Bill that we would have produced if we had been working in the hysteria of all the scandals that took place after the Bill had come into force. Nevertheless, I believe that the framework introduced by that Bill was sufficient to give people in Lloyd's the equipment with which to deal with the skeletons that have come out of the cupboard.

The system set out in the White Paper promotes a share-owning democracy, and so I give it a reserved welcome. I practise as solicitor, and therefore should declare that I have an interest in that my firm practises in this general area. The principle of a professional closed shop is essential to investor protection. We rightly do not like closed shops, but that principle is necessary in order to protect investors who do not know the ramifications of the investment that they are dealing with.

Investors can be protected by drawing a ring around a group of trades and requiring qualifications, in return for which those professionals are granted the privilege of earning their living within that ring. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) that the quality of the people involved is critical. I believe that the Stock Exchange is still an example of such a ring. When looking at the reforms that have taken place in the Stock Exchange, it is important that we do what we can to preserve the central market as an essential ingredient in investor protection. There is a danger of fragmenting that central market if the liquidity of the market is not maintained, especially in the run up to October 1986, when the Stock Exchange changes come into force.

I have some brief points to make on the White Paper, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will deal with some of them. First, will my hon. Friend give us some idea of the costs involved in the regulatory bodies? Secondly, I should like some clarification of the nature of the two boards or the one board, which he might be tempted to substitute if he listens to many of my hon. Friends. Will the board or boards be licensing or regulatory bodies? I hope that they will be licensing bodies. However, the White Paper is not very clear on that point.

Thirdly, page 10 implies that newspapers that talk about tips for shares will not require authorisation when they recommend share transactions. Although I am a great admirer of the press and yield to no one in that, I see no reason why it should be excluded. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will consider altering that. Fourthly, there is a reference to information technology. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) has already made an important speech about fraud. As information technology grows, so the types of fraud and the opportunities for fraud will increase. We do not have any idea of the widespread nature of fraud in the computer world as there is a lot of hushing up for reasons that concern, in particular, the banks and other institutions affected by them.

Finally, I should be interested to know how the City Panel on Takeovers and Mergers, which is a most effective body and perfectly capable of dispensing swift and informal justice, will relate to the boards set out in the White Paper. The City wants to be established as the financial centre of the world, and I see it as the nucleus of the development of the share-owning democracy that we all want to see.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I declare an interest in this subject as an adviser to a merchant bank.

Like other hon. Members, I support the approach in the White Paper. The document aims sensibly at a balance between statutory and self-regulation. If I make some observations on possible difficulties, it will be very much against a background of warm support for the White Paper's overall principle.

The Government are right to build on the success of self-regulation. It is right, too, that hon. Members should record their praise of the City's record in self-regulation. Of course there have been abuses—the City contains the same mixture of human frailty and virtue as is to be found in any other group of people in any other walk of life. Abuses are deplorable, but it is fair to observe that the City has a successful record in self-regulation. This is ultimately because practitioners in the City understand that it is in their best interests for the City to have a good reputation and to be regarded as a clean place in which to do business.

I believe that the majority of the scandals that have come to light in recent years have been in areas where the Department of Trade and Industry was responsible for policing—scandals with respect to Eurobond dealing, commodity trading and licensed deposit takers, all of which have taken place where self-regulation has been undeveloped in the City. The charge that the Department has too often been reluctant and slow to investigate suspicious circumstances may not be without foundation.

The White Paper acknowledges that there is a great deal to be said for self-regulation. Practitioners who belong to the culture understand the markets in a way that hon. Members or civil servants in a Whitehall Department cannot possibly do. In paragraph 5.2 the White Paper observes:

> "iv practitioners are best equipped to stop breaches of the rules and take swift and effective enforcement action".

That has already been demonstrated to be right.

I should like to put in a good word for Chinese walls. I am not sure whether that has been done so far in this debate. It is critical that we should protect investors from abuses arising from conflicts of interest. We must recognise that the developments that are taking place in the City, especially the emergence of new types of financial conglomerates, increase the ways in which conflicts of interest occur. The wording of paragraph 7.4—

> "The Government are not convinced that total reliance can be placed on Chinese Walls because they restrict flows of information and not the conflicts of interest themselves"— seems, however, to betray some unrealism. That statement implies that conflicts of interest can be reduced. I believe that we have to choose—we must either accept that we shall have financial businesses which are diversified and, therefore, carry with them potential conflicts of interest, or say that, for the sake of achieving a system in which the possibility of chicanery is substantially reduced, we shall not have such diversified financial institutions.

If we say the latter, we are going along with the policies set out in the NEC document produced some time ago by the Labour party, entitled "The Financial Institutions". We would be waving good-bye not only to the new types of so-called financial supermarkets which are emerging, but to the long-established merchant banks which for many years have combined under the same roof businesses dealing in corporate finance and in investment management and which have maintained stout and effective Chinese walls within their premises.

The task must be to ensure that the conflicts of interest, which could be removed only at the price of losing the benefit to investors and our national economy of having diversified financial institutions in the City, are clearly recognised, that appropriate standards of conduct are defined and observed and that effective sanctions are established. We must have Chinese walls, and we must ensure that they are high, strong and impermeable. The City has a great deal of experience in operating with Chinese walls. We should not disparage what has been achieved.

The chief executives of our financial institutions recognise that one of their most important responsibilities involves preserving the effectiveness of Chinese walls. No doubt, chief executives will increasingly be served by compliance officers, following the American pattern. That may be a good development. Those chief executives should also be supported in the execution of this key responsibility of external monitoring by the regulatory system which we are debating.

The wrong way, however, for the regulations to proceed in this is put forward in paragraph 7.5.iii of the White Paper, which refers to:

"a duty to disclose"

and says:

"This would, for example, require an investment business to disclose in advance any material interest which it had in a proposed transacton, the capacity in which it would act, the fees which it would charge, the remuneration which it might receive from other parties interested in the transaction and any connection which it might have with other parties interested in the transaction."

Such disclosures would break the existing Chinese walls and be completely impractical, because the market will not wait while such a rigmarole is carried out. It is better to have a Chinese wall and to make it work. We must remember that it is in the interests of the financial services to have a reputation for probity. That is the best guarantee.

I should like to refer to the structure which is adumbrated in the White Paper. Like other hon. Members, I hope that the idea of having two boards will be dropped. I suspect the the White Paper proposes two boards because the Government were responding to the City's lead last year. It is now fairly clear that the City realises that it made a mistake.

There are points of difference between the securities and investments side and the marketing of prepackaged investment vehicles. The concerns in common to both sides far outweigh, however, those points of difference. If there are two bodies, there will be problems of demarcation, duplication of staff and information bases and gaps of coverage and problems of reconciliation. The White Paper proposes that authorised unit trusts should be approved by both the SIB and the MIB. It is conceivable that those two bodies might operate differing criteria and standards so that it would not be possible completely to reconcile their dual requirements. I believe that it is sensible to bring the two boards together.

There will be problems in attracting sufficient high quality staff who understand the markets. The problem with secondments is that firms are commonly unwilling to send their best people on secondment; the problem with having permanent staff is that those staff will not be so closely in touch with markets as practitioners. Those people will be, not poachers, but people who have turned into gamekeepers.

Hon. Members have referred to the problems involved in securing effective lay and consumer representation. No doubt it will be possible to persuade senior business men to serve on these bodies as representatives of consumers. But it is far more difficult to see how the small investor can be represented. How can that be achieved in an effective way?

Much thought must be given to the substructure of self-regulatory organisations subordinated to the SIB. This is a matter for the SIB to work out. If, as I am sure we should, we are to establish the SIB, it is only right that it should have the time to work out those problems. I simply draw attention to some of the problems with which I think Sir Kenneth Berrill and his colleagues will have to grapple.

To those hon. Members who say that the policy of the White Paper leans too far towards self-regulation, I would observe that the White Paper leaves a very large role remaining for the Department of Trade and Industry and for other state bodies. The Department, for example, is to keep a check, via the Office of Fair Trading, on rule changes. Indeed, I wonder whether what is set out in the White Paper in that respect may not be fairly cumbrous. The Department is to check the practices of other countries and to make sure that we are in line with them in appropriate ways. The Secretary of State himself will lay down very specific conditions under which unit trusts are to operate, as described in paragraph 9.7.

There is to be a regulatory web which will consist not only of the Department of Trade and Industry but of the Office of Fair Trading, EEC institutions, the tribunal, the SIB and perhaps the MIB, self-regulatory organisations, other bodies associated with other legislation, and the courts.

I do not criticise the complexity of the structure, because I can see the case for incorporating each of the bits in the jigsaw. I would only say that here is a lot of supervision, many points of reference, and many sources of monitoring. Here is plenty of scope for institutional and bureaucratic rivalry, and here will undoubtedly arise not insignificant compliance costs. While I do not criticise, I certainly would not agree if anybody suggested that this is a laissez faire regime; it is not.

We should consider, while we are debating the White Paper, what sorts of firms and organisations will be subject to its provisions. The White Paper rightly states the importance of the principle of equivalence of treatment. Paragraph 3.2.vi states:

"If the law and the regulatory system are to be clear and fair there must be so far as this is possible equivalence of treatment between products and services competing in the same market. The law should not create artificial distinctions."

I agree with that. However, the White Paper then goes on to exclude — unless I have misread it — some very important categories of investment management from the general approach set out in the White Paper.

Among the categories excluded are self-managed investment trust companies, self-managed occupational pension schemes—chapter 11, on pensions, seems to be quite the weakest in the White Paper — and the investment management activities of companies engaged in long-term insurance business. Those are important anomalies, because those are institutions which loom large in the market, and they should not escape the net. Those who are employed in investment activities within such entities are no different from and are as much subject to the frailties of mankind and exposed to the same temptations in their dealings with the markets as those who will fall within the scope of the legislation as it is proposed.

I believe that there should not be pockets of exemption or privilege. The people concerned should be brought fairly within the ambit of the SIB's authority, and the practical way for such entities to proceed may be to form subsidiary investment management companies which themselves would be fully subject to the SIB.

With regard to enforcement and sanctions, the White Paper states that the boards will be enabled to make rules with the force of law and to ensure that businesses comply with them. Stress is laid on how the boards are expected to monitor and enforce observance, and on the point that enforcement should be vigorous, but the only sanction specifically referred to in the White Paper is the refusal or withdrawal of authorisation.

I suggest that there needs to be a middle range of sanctions; indeed, the White Paper says that. In paragraph 15.1 it talks of the boards having power to impose sanctions up to and including the revocation of authorisation, and there is reference to civil penalties for breach of the rules of the board. But the question of the middle range of sanctions—of penalties less draconian than the revocation of authorisation—is not explored or elaborated.

There may be legal and constitutional problems in empowering a body such as the SIB to impose fines. Possibly that difficulty could be met by making authorisation by the SIB subject to a contractual commitment by the firm authorised to accept a range of possible penalties. However it is to be achieved, it is important in practice that it should be addressed.

The tribunal is cursorily introduced in paragraph 5.11, yet it is obviously a very important part of the whole structure. It is described, indeed, as a "final determinant". Its powers are said to be analogous to those of the courts. But the status, the nature and the role of the tribunal are not discussed in that one short paragraph, and I hope that my hon. Friend, in winding up the debate, will be prepared to enlarge a little on what part the tribunal should play.

Still in the field of enforcement and sanctions, I should like to mention the takeover panel. The White Paper invites the comments of the City. It seems to me that the takeover panel should be praised for the success that it has had in its history in exercising what has been a moral rather than a legal authority. At the same time, we should note that it is operating in a fast-changing world. That is why we have the White Paper. The code is now under almost continuous review, and the approach of the takeover panel is becoming increasingly legalistic. We should also note the modern tendency of aggressive advisers and principals involved in take-overs to hit first and take rather lightly the panel's reprimands.

There are obvious difficulties in doing so, but I wonder whether we should now incorporate the takeover panel in the new regulatory structure, backed by statute, while seeking to preserve its flexibility and the speed of response which has been a good part of the reason for its success. It is right to provide this opportunity for self-regulation. The City knows that if it fails to take the opportunity now being held out to it, a heavier handed approach by the Government will be inevitable. The City has its chance, and I believe that it will take it. We should also do well to recognise that there will be no bouquets for anyone on the political side. The absence of abuse and scandal will create no sensation, but if we can maintain the absence of abuse and scandal, and create a framework of circumstances in which financial services in the City can continue to prosper and enhance their reputation and their contribution to our national well-being, that will be sufficient reward.

8.8 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): I want to make a single, wide and perhaps political point, as opposed to dealing with important points of detail.

I have a couple of interests to declare. I am a provincial barrister, so I am a parasite on the back of provincial solicitors. I am also married to a solicitor who intermittently practises as a conveyancer. I say that because I want to look for a moment or two at the large financial conglomerates that will be created after the big bang.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that there had been many changes and that we had come a long way. Indeed, we have come a long way.

On 27 July 1983, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) announced the agreement in principle between himself and Sir Nicholas Goodison, he said that he intended to safeguard the position of investors by the separation of the functions of brokers and jobbers, and he said that the Stock Exchange would continue the rules prescribing the separation of capacity of brokers and jobbers. Yes, we have come a very long way, and I want to say a few words about protecting the small investor, and particularly the provincial investor.

It is now quite obvious that there is a consensus trying to put forward the argument that the problems of conflicts of interest are exaggerated and can be overcome. On the one hand, there is the ministerial argument, the loyal, necessary ministerial argument, explaining that, while the Government were previously a firm supporter of the separation of capacity, they now believe that, by various rules, it will be possible to overcome the conflicts of interest. On the other hand, within the City, whereas before 27 July 1983 everybody explained that, from the point of view of the investor, the stockbroker was more a professional than an entrepreneur, and certainly more a professional than a bureaucrat, now it will be possible to achieve the advantages of all three worlds without the investor being troubled in any way.

It has to be said that the advocates of that new view had substantial inducements to persuade their audiences. There is hardly a person connected with the City who is not in some way involved in the changing status of the stock market. The big institutions are purchasers of parts of stockbroking firms, and they are purchasers at very substantial capital sums. The big stockbroking firms are all sellers and, again, they are sellers at very substantial sums. I have no doubt that if I had a million quid perilously near to going into my back pocket, I would become, if not a more persuasive advocate, at least a very persistent one. Indeed, they are very persistent. They keep arguing that those conflicts of interest can be overcome by a system of Chinese walls. They may be right—I do not know. As I said, I am putting forward this argument from the point of view of wishing to safeguard the position of the small provincial investor on the Stock Exchange.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) knows a good deal about the details of the way in which the markets are organised. He rather doubts whether Chinese walls will work. My right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) spoke rather guardedly about the advantages of specialisation, which I took to mean that he was also saying that he rather doubted whether Chinese walls would work. My hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield) is firm in his view that Chinese walls will not work. He is supported by the report in yesterday's edition of The Times, in the section devoted to finance and industry, in which we find that the proposed firm of Barclays de Zoete Wedd, which is a splendid amalgamation of a clearing bank, a stockbroker and a stock jobber, says that the proposals for Chinese walls are unworkable. As The Times said, the firm is busy getting in there to make sure that the rules are changed so that it can get the advantages of either weaker or lower Chinese walls.

I do not know whether all this is going to work out, but plainly the Government must be taking a bit of a risk. After all, they authorised the initial move — the deal that pulled the crucial few bricks out of the dam on 27 July 1983. The Government are desperately trying to reassure everybody that that initial move, which was refused by previous Secretaries of State, is wise. Let us hope that the risk comes off. There will be great reorganisations in the City. Perhaps the new rules will work. Perhaps the new rules for some form of self-regulation within a statutory framework will work. Let us hope that they do.

Those institutions will have severe problems. Let us take for a moment this tripartite body Barclays de Zoete Wedd. Everybody knows the nature of the clearing banks. They are largely bureaucratic organisations. On the whole, they lend money and carry out their services according to bureaucratic rules that are handed down through the regional offices to the branches. There is nothing wrong with that, but they are neither entrepreneurial nor professional bodies. Anyone who deals with them knows that he is not dealing with the same sort of animal as the stockbroker who may have been advising his family for two or three generations, and who knows a good deal about his background and the risks that he wants to take.

In the same way, de Zoete and Wedd are quite different organisations. Even more different will be those organisations that are now dominated by foreign money, with different attitudes towards business and different national attitudes towards the handling of money. Those institutions will take a bit of time to settle down. Let us hope that the Government are right in saying that there will not be major scandals or problems. However, it is a risk.

There is an institution in our society that provides some independent advice to the Widow Twankey — the perhaps ignorant provincial investor. That person giving the advice is, on the whole, the much maligned provincial solicitor. That person used to have a theoretically indefensible conveyancing cartel. Understandably, that was attacked by the Government. They have been successful in that attack. It was not primarily the Government who broke the solicitor's conveyancing cartel. What happened was that there was an over-supply of solicitors, because it is relatively cheap to educate a solicitor. As a result, the cartel was breaking anyway. It has now broken. I am informed that in the past two years conveyancing costs have fallen by 30 per cent.

How could this factor of independence — the provincial solicitor—have his position further eroded? It could be severely eroded if banks and building societies were able to undertake conveyancing not only on behalf of themselves but on behalf of their clients, the customers. I do not wish to offend the manager of Barclays bank in Wolverhampton, but I shall use him as an example for the sake of argument. The manager of Barclays bank in Wolverhampton could be organising the mortgage and conveyancing for both the purchaser and the seller of the house. For instance, Lloyds bank in the Midlands also has its own estate agency, the Black Horse estate agency. There would be an inevitable and serious conflict of interest because, when solicitors do the conveyancing, they warn people about the legal problems, but they also act as an independent source of financial advice. If the work of solicitors, particularly provincial solicitors, is taken over by about 15 of those mega-institutions, an important source of independent advice will go. That is most important to the small investor.

If the mega-institutions rip off some of the other institutional investors, they will not rip them off more than about twice. The institutional investors have plenty of ways to check the quality of the advice and service that they receive but the small provincial investor does not. I invite my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to read what I thought was a very good leader in last Monday's edition of the Financial Times. It dealt very well with this point.

When these mega-institutions have settled down, it is possible that different arguments will act upon my right hon. Friend's mind. Everybody knows that there was a dispute in the Cabinet about the conveyancing done by solicitors when the matter last came before the House. It is well known that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was on the side, as he saw it, of radical reform and more competition. He may wish to advance that case again. However, these very new institutions, with their untried system of regulation, ought to be allowed to settle down.

Although it may not be the most efficient system in the world, this independent professional advice is much valued by the small investor. The 7,500 principally provincial firms of solicitors act as a wonderful counter-balance to these large and untried mega-organisations. If we make the mistake of undermining the centres of independence represented by this large number of solicitors, I believe that we shall reap a terrible harvest if the City becomes infected with serious fraud. By the decision that they announced on 27 July 1983, the Tory Administration started all these changes and did not anticipate all that would happen. It would be very much in the Tory tradition to go slow on this issue and to make sure that we get it right before we put in train yet further changes.

8.21 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I apologise to the House for the fact that I shall be unable to be present throughout the debate, although I understand that my position is shared by some hon. Members.

There are possibly two good recommendations in the White Paper. I would not put it higher than that. Paragraph 10.9 says:

"an insurance broker entitled to commission from an insurance company for a particular policy should disclose that payment".

Paragraph 10.11 says:

"it should be made clear to the purchaser in every case that the agent is not holding himself out as offering impartial advice" when he is representing a company. Such provisions are useful.

However, I share the views of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) who drew to the attention of the House the difficulties and problems posed by financial conglomerates in whose hands there has been a vast concentration of financial power during the past 150 years. I believe that at the time when Ricardo was a Member of Parliament there were 350 independent retail banks. There are now four major banks which account for about 85 per cent. of all business. The attention of the House has been drawn to the difficulties and conflicts of interest which would arise if they were to handle conveyancing for both buyers and sellers in individual transactions.

I believe that the White Paper is inadequate. The Secretary of State could have done better if he had acted in association with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If we address ourselves to the wider implications of a framework for investor protection, it will involve a securities and exchange commission. I note that a claim is made in paragraph 5.2 on page 13 of the White Paper that:

"The main advantages of a system of self-regulation within a statutory framework are as follows:

i. it offers the best possibility of combining adequate investor protection with a competitive and innovative market."

The American market is hardly regarded as uncompetitive or as one which is not innovative. Risk capital in the United States is more readily available than it is in this country. That is not only because of the dynamism of the large internal market; it relates also to the financial institutions in the United States. Those institutions are subject to a Securities and Exchange Commission which has far more specific powers than the Government's proposals. They amount not only to a statutory framework but to the equivalent of what we call statutory powers. I believe that my hon. Friend will be dealing with this issue, upon which he has my support.

On the concentration of financial power, it is not simply a matter of what is happening between big and small financial institutions. The recent figures from UNCTAD show that 200 service companies — these are mainly financial service companies — account for one third of the world's gross domestic product. We are referring to financial institutions which are literally global in reach, just as the London stock market, the London insurance market and Lloyd's are global in reach. We should be operating not only within a framework of national or Community legislation but within a wider international framework within which the basic issues can be addressed and where savings — whether they be unit trusts or pensions—can be translated into investment, rather than simply providing a framework whereby money is made from more money on the speculative assumption that the growth of output and productivity in the world economy or in the British economy will ensure that those investments are safely based.

When these matters come back in the form of specific legislative proposals, I believe that it should be possible for there to be not only protection in the case of pension funds for individuals but a protection that is wider than the bland reference to caveat emptor or to the buyer protecting himself or herself. The Government should make it possible for local authorities or for trade unions to invest either the whole or a proportion of their pension funds in this country so as to create jobs here. One has to consider the spreading of risk. It would not be a sound financial investment for employees to invest only in their own companies, even if those companies enjoyed the stability of Imperial Chemical Industries or the General Electric Company. At metropolitan authority level it is not only wise but a very sound investment in one's own future to ensure that a proportion of the savings from one's earnings are invested in the regeneration of industry in some of our inner city areas. The Government have not dealt with this issue. I lament the fact that the Government's provisions make it extremely difficult for local authorities to ensure the investment of pension funds in their own enterprise boards or in the promotion of industrial activities which could regenerate inner city areas.

I support the remarks of the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) who regretted that household insurance is not dealt with in the White Paper. There have been reports of major commercial insurance companies red-lining inner city areas where burglary and theft rates are higher than the national average. That is a matter of grave concern. Giant financial conglomerates, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West described them, can spread their risks across the country as a whole. If there is any justification for the domination of the market by companies such as Commercial Union, Royal Exchange, and so on, it should be that by spreading the risks they also spread the cost to themselves rather than imposing higher rates on people living in inner city areas. Many people in areas such as mine simply cannot meet the ever-increasing rates for reinsurance.

Some leading insurance companies are also delaying payment of claims in inner city areas for considerable periods. I have been told that a person putting his foot through a garage roof in Surrey can expect to receive a cheque probably within 48 hours and certainly within a week without any inspector calling whereas claims from residents in inner city areas are subjected to evaluations, re-evaluations, delays and procrastination. Caveat emptor may be very well, but the buyer is in a very unequal situation vis-a-vis the major insurance companies. Buyers cannot bargain with the companies about the terms on which the service is to be provided—I understand that one leading company has simply decided to reduce if not fail to renew certain types of inner city insurance—but the companies are bargaining about the terms and the times within which the service will be provided.

Finally, on pension funds and investment, I urge the Government to bear in mind the effect of the liberalisation of exchange controls, to which they so casually and even flippantly refer at the beginning of the documnent as "a boon". Paragraph 2.6 states:

"The Government have taken action to improve the climate for enterprise. Price controls have been ended. Controls over dividends, foreign exchange transactions and lending on hire purchase have been dismantled."

In fact, since the controls on foreign exchange were ended £50 billion has left this country for investment abroad in the industrial modernisation of our competitors. That is some 10 times the amount of investment in British manufacturing industry in the same period. The White Paper is sub-titled

"A new framework for investor protection."

But the the ultimate framework for investor protection is a framework which protects our own investments by investing our own funds in our own industry and economy. If the Government do not address themselves to that, and if they cannot ensure that the financial institutions are really accountable to people in this country, they will pay more than a financial penalty when they come to the polls.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues and also Professor Gower not just on the White Paper but on the excellent work behind it. The debate has been calm without any of the heat or games of musical chairs that occurred yesterday. Too often, the heat generated fails to serve the nation as we claim to serve it. Today's debate, however, has been almost as calm as some people regard company law. Some even regard it as boring. I disagree with that view, but I have to declare an interest as a company lawyer. The debate has also been a far cry from what Professor Clive Schmitthoff described as the panic-stricken Parliament which, early in the history of company law, repealed the South Sea Bubble legislation.

The White Paper brings up to date our recognition of the sophistication of the modern city, its institutions and its new products as well as an appreciation of the dangers for the unwary or inexperienced investor. The Government have a duty in this area. They have done more perhaps than any other Government in history to promote individual investment, bringing millions of people into share ownership. Those holding investments for the first time may wonder what it is all about. One thinks of the people who perhaps fell prey to some of the clauses in the British Telecom prospectus because they did not read it carefully enough. Having offered people that temptation to invest, the Government must now lead and guide them in the ways of investment and of the City. There is nothing frightening about the City or the world of investment except ignorance. In that respect the White Paper does a great service, especially to new shareholders.

In today's world there is a greater interest in the world of investment and financial matters. Television programmes have never been better. The "Money Programme" has reached new highs of late because more people watch and criticise programmes of that kind and the television companies want to reach a wider audience. The Times Portfolio, too, has brought many people into daily contact with the Stock Exchange share list. Not having won a penny so far, I wonder about its usefulness in my area and I certainly have no interest to declare in that respect.

The White Paper hits the nail right on the head when it states:

"Regulation cannot eliminate risk. Profits and risk run together. Investment . . . entails taking deliberately considered risks"

but that we need

"to reduce the scope for losses resulting from fraud, or from the concealment of risk."

In that context, I welcome the requirement for increased publicity in many areas, especially in relation to the independence of advice, and particularly with regard to commissions. The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) is absolutely right. We need to know about the independence of advice to assess whether it is tainted by the prospect of commission. It does not matter if an adviser receives a commission, so long as it is both disclosed in percentage terms and quantified in amount. That is a strong and very welcome provision in the White Paper.

Professor Gower, in his excellent and most readable book on modern company law, reminds us that publicity is the most potent safeguard against fraud. For the benefit of my colleagues in the alliance, I should point out that I believe that that observation was originally made by Gladstone. Nevertheless, it rings well in Professor Gower's book. Publicity is indeed the most potent safeguard against fraud. That is why the phrase "open and above board" means so much, especially for those who trust in self-regulation.

The main question, however, must be whether the White Paper has got it right. As a chartered accountant specialising in company law, I am often accused of wanting ever more company law. I am indeed a member of a small and passionate band of people who believe that a copy of the new consolidated Companies Act should be placed in every hotel bedroom, if only to encourage sleep. That is one of my little quirks. I believe that there is a need for guidance, not for too much legislation. Too much legislation leads to eradication of legislation through boredom and ignorance. If there is too much law people ignore it, and if it is too difficult and costly to ensure that the law is enforced people turn away from it.

The White Paper provides for a statutory framework within which professional self-regulatory bodies will work. I believe that that is the right balance. It keeps the law to a minimum. I mentioned earlier that Parliament's first venture into company law was in 1696, against the abuses of stockbroking. That law was brought in because it was desperately needed. Law has been created as it has been required and not always in panic, as in the case of the South Sea Bubble. The process can go too far, but I believe that the White Paper creates the balance and the trust that is needed in self-regulatory bodies. I believe that that trust is well placed. I should declare an interest as a member of three self-regulatory bodies. All three happen to be exempted by these provisions. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that.

Self-regulation has stood the test of time. However, coupled with the trust that self-regulation has to command, there must be a rigorous enforcement of the regulations and a powerful and public back-up by the Government in the form of actions for personal compensation or even criminal behaviour.

There must be no quiet, gentlemanly deals when the regulations are breached. There must be full public exposure of those who break the responsibilities of trust which they have undertaken, and who lower the standing of their colleagues and damage the public's faith in them. The exempted bodies, too, if they breach the trust that we put in them, should be accountable.

Law is needed to give guidance to those seeking to invest, those who actually invest and those who seek to live off the proceeds of investment. Some people want more and tighter legislation. Some believe that the Stock Exchange is no more than a glorified betting shop, with better clothes and better accents. They are wrong, because they do not understand the benefits that derive from betting shops. Without on-course and off-course betting we would not have the bloodstock industry which is one of our great export earners. Without the Stock Exchange, there would be no encouragement for the private investment that is vital for a healthy economy.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: It is late at night, and my hon. Friend may be tired, if not somewhat temperamental. However, is he suggesting that the Stock Exchange is no more than a glorified betting shop? If so, as a chartered accountant, he should go back to his textbooks.

Mr. Hanley: It may be late, but I do not feel temperamental. Perhaps my hon. Friend is tired and that is why he did not quite hear what I said. I said that some people feel that there is little difference between the two institutions. I denied that suggestion vehemently. Without a healthy Stock Exchange, and healthy brokers and jobbers working within it, there would be a tremendous failure of private investment. We need private investment. We need a healthy and well-regulated Stock Exchange. I believe that the White Paper will create it.

I welcome many parts of the White Paper. I welcome the freeing of unit trust restrictions, separate clients' accounts for money and the disclosure of commissions. I do not share the fears about the two bodies, the Securities and Investments Board and the Marketing of Investments Board, which some hon. Members have expressed. In his excellent speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) outlined the problems of the two bodies. I believe, however, that setting up those two bodies will be the best way to get the regulatory process off the ground. The White Paper clearly allows for the two bodies to become one if the demand and the need are there. That admirable flexibility is a trait of the White Paper.

I have a few regrets. I am sorry that cold calling has not been banned. I believe that a cooling-off period is the best way of dealing with cold calling in matters such as hire purchase credit transactions, where the person at home can assess the value and the cost of the product, and the total liability. It is difficult to assess long-term undated investment contracts and I therefore think that cold calling in that sphere should be banned.

Unsolicited telephone dealings should also be banned. These are not mentioned in the White Paper. Telephone calls by those seeking to sell financial services are an intrusion in private life from which more and more people are suffering. At best, the practice is an annoyance; at worst, it is a personal threat.

I also regret the lack of wider lay representation within the regulatory framework. I regret the lack of an independent body to deal with complaints by investors. There should be, perhaps, an independent ombudsman or observer to deal with the many complaints that are bound to arise over the years. Many complaints from members of the public will not be the result of misdealing. The losses will be the result, not of deliberate fraud, but merely of the pitfalls of investment. The news that the investor has simply had bad luck might be better received if it came from an independent adviser rather than from someone directly involved in the investment business. There is no guaranteed profit in investment.

Despite those few regrets, I welcome the White Paper and the legislation that will flow from it. The legislation will be modest, but its importance will be great.

8.46 pm

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): I should declare a somewhat tenuous past interest. Many years ago I was a junior employee in the corporate finance department of a major merchant bank. Years later, I emerged as one of its smaller customers. The latter experience was considerably more enjoyable.

I welcome the White Paper as an imaginative and constructive initiative that will serve the City well if it aspires to continue as one of the world's foremost financial centres.

Like other hon. Members, I wish to talk about Chinese walls. Earlier in this Parliament, when my right hon. Friend was able to tell us that the council of the Stock Exchange had come to terms with the desire of the Director General of Fair Trading for fundamental reforms in the operation of the stock market, it was inevitable that the pace of change in the City would quicken. Minimum commissions would have to go, and dual capacity would become a fact of life; the number of mergers that crossed specialist City lines would increase and the foreign finance houses would rethink their strategy for the London market. There have already been many signs that the City is on the move.

Against that background, it was essential that there should be a thorough review of the changing structure of financial services and of the need to protect the private investor, the investment institution and the corporate trust market. In a state of rapid change, the City needs to demonstrate that a practical and effective regulation exists that has the confidence of its own practitioners, domestic and foreign, of all its customers and, of course, of Parliament.

The White Paper does much to point the way to an appropriate system of regulation. The Government's welcome intention to introduce legislation fits in well with the many other steps that they have taken since 1979 to improve the climate of enterprise and competition in this country. The White Paper has special credibility because it recognises the growing use of new technology in the City and the emergence of new market mechanisms such as the unlisted securities market and futures trading.

The day of the financial conglomerate, or financial supermarket, has arrived, bringing with it dual capacity. We must strike a careful balance between the dangers of over-regulation and those of leaving every investor vulnerable to market abuses.

One area of the White Paper requires further amplification. The White Paper touches only fleetingly on the core of one of the City's principal bases—merchant banking. I am thinking especially of the inter-relationship between the huge sums quoted in invested securities and the advice given by merchant banks to corporate customers whose securities are at least in part the object of that huge investment — in other words, Chinese walls. It is surprising that there is no attempt in the White Paper to highlight the modus operandi of the merchant banks. I do not think that the merchant banks are mentioned at all. The leading merchant banks, especially the acceptance houses, run billions of pounds worth of investors' money under their own management in the form of pension funds, unit trusts and private accounts. They also provide corporate financial advice, and many of them have active banking departments putting together commercial credits. They therefore fish with three or more lines in the same pond.

The new conglomerates will have even more lines in the pond. Some people in the City ask what would be the reaction of an investment institution — say a pension fund—if it was approached by the department of such a conglomerate which makes the price in, for example, ICI, and is persuaded by that department to take a line of 1 million shares, only to hear the next day that the same conglomerate's corporate finance section is announcing a rights issue for ICI. We shall see what happens—it is bound to happen sooner or later.

It is said that some 50 investment managers in the City now run 65 per cent. of all of the funds under management, and many of them are attached to major merchant banks. No doubt they are expert and responsible, but we cannot escape the fact that, Chinese walls or not, they come under the same parent company umbrella as the City's leading corporate finance practitioners. Although not every merchant bank with a large investment department is necessarily prominent in corporate finance, the converse is true. No merchant bank which takes a leading role in corporate finance does so without its own large investment department, and the placing power that such a department brings. For all the arm's-length arrangements which merchant banks might honourably devise, the influence that they can exert as lead underwriters is in direct proportion to their unquestioned ability to take a large piece of the underwriting in any market exercise. That is not necessarily a bad thing as we need the investment muscle of the large City underwritings — the recent example of British Telecom springs to mind.

Bearing in mind the fact that the price of a share on an offer for sale, or the price at which a rights issue is pitched, or the exit price of a share in a takeover offer—which is of real interest to every investor in those shares, small or large — is fixed by the corporate finance advisers in merchant banks which, very likely, have large equity positions of their own in the company concerned, it cannot be right to set aside the possible conflict of interest.

The White Paper acknowledges that problem implicitly in paragraph 7.4, and it is right that the subject has been given greater emphasis in today's debate. The White Paper also refers to the regularising of offer documents. I understand that, at the moment, there is no requirement on a merchant bank adviser to state in the notes to an offer document what number of shares that bank's investment department holds in the company which is the subject of that offer document, unless it holds more than 15 per cent. Nor is there any requirement, when fixing a merchant bank's fee for a corporate finance transaction, to throw any light on the bank's equity interest, directly or indirectly, in that client company.

I know that corporate finance fees are subject to their own magic formula. I suspect that it is simply a matter of what the market will bear. It boils down to the ability of that merchant bank to get an underwriting under way. That comes back to its placing power and therefore to its investment department. So much for Chinese walls. It should be remembered that all those fees are of at least indirect interest to every shareholder in the company concerned. My fear is that, unless forthcoming legislation probes more deeply into the potential conflict of interest between corporate finance advice and investment management in the same organisation, there will inevitably be circumstances in which the ordinary investor is given a raw deal by what amounts to the City's own brand of collectivism. That will lead to demands for an end to self-regulation, and the end of imposition of an SEC-style operation. That would be a retrograde step.

I should like to direct a question to my hon. Friend the Minister concerning paragraph 13.9 of the White Paper, which is about section 209 of the Companies Act 1948. The White Paper says:

> "The objective is to ensure that the 90 per cent. majority whose assent to a take-over enables the minority's shares to be acquired is genuinely independent of the bidder".

As a principle, that makes a great deal of sense, but I should like to give an example. If a company acquires up to 14·9 per cent. of another company in the stock market and, acting in concert with other parties, builds up a stake of 29·9 per cent. and sits on it, when it bids for the offeree company, it will be bidding only for the outstanding 70·1 per cent. of that company as it has effectively previously taken the other 30 per cent. out of the trading arena for some time. If the proposed change means that the company must then bid for the 90 per cent. of the remaining 70 per cent.—another 63 per cent.—that will bring the acquired total to 93 per cent. of the company before section 209 can come into play.

If that is the right interpretation, my right hon. Friend is making an excellent proposal. However, I draw his attention to the subsequent interests of minority shareholders if they should wish to draw attention to affairs in the company by requisitioning an extraordinary general meeting. I understand that the Companies Act now requires that an extraordinary general meeting can be called only if 10 per cent. of the shareholders want it. If, as a result of changes in section 209, there will be an outstanding balance or minority of just 7 per cent. of the shareholders, does my hon. Friend think it right that they also should have the right to requisition an extraordinary general meeting if they want to highlight various aspects of the company's operations?

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister has borne with me during that rather convoluted question. I look forward to his answer. Like other hon. Members, I hope that he will think more carefully about Chinese walls.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I feel humble and grateful for being allowed, as the only stockbroker to have been in the House throughout this long day, to say a word on this financial paper which so affects the Stock Exchange. I am sure that it is proper that those who have discussed the matter first shall be the last to be considered.

Changes are obviously necessary and we are living in a time of change. Lloyd's has been changed, as have estate agents, building societies and banks. Even solicitors are being asked to change. Needless to say, the sole group with a great interest and which affects the country and has not been asked to change is barristers. They are not being asked to change their habits, which are so expensive and which afflict and affect the country, because the House, and that other House along the corridor, is bulging with barristers. Perhaps they will be harried into a new world in due course, along with stockbrokers, solicitors and accountants. The sooner they are, the better, because it is there that the change is most needed if those people who seek justice are not first to court financial ruin in protecting their reputations or their businesses.

With the Government hurrying along because of promises rashly given about the future of the City and modern technology and communications now at the speed of light in a worldwide sense, it is right that the City of London, which in my view has always accepted change in the sense that it has usually led that change—and it is still the centre with the greatest name for integrity and inventiveness—is willing to join in the changes of the world. If the City of London does not compete, it will undoubtedly die, and, happily, it is in no mood for that.

We should be aware of some of the implications of the White Paper which the City as a whole and certainly I think has much to commend it. It is not a matter of the City being worried that commission rates will be changed. It is of course right in today's world that people should be able to challenge and to deal with a broker or an agent of their choice so that they can negotiate commission. I hope that when a Bill is presented there will be discussions with the Stock Exchange and the City in general of what is best for the people. This means the small investor. The big investors throughout history, like all big men, whether they be barons or landlords, have always been able to take care of themselves. When people like David Hopkinson of M & G, one of the greatest originators of the unit trust industry, and Cholmeley Messer of Save and Prosper—two great companies that have stood astride the growth of the unit trust business and for its small investors—say that they doubt whether any of the proposed changes, including the reconstitution of the Stock Exchange, are in the interests of the private investor, at our peril do we ignore the warning.

It is not just self-interest. If to be self-interested is to be at fault, the House would be ever silent and in darkness, for all hon. Members are in Parliament to comment upon one interest or another. The great interest that all hon. Members are here to debate is that of the people at large.

One matter that worries the Stock Exchange and the City is that the Government, in their anxiety to rush into the new world, are showing a complete lack of willingness to support the Stock Exchange against the fragmentation of the central market. They have refused, I think regrettably, to make sure that, when the change-over takes place, it happens in an orderly manner. I believe that it will be disastrous to the future stability of the market if the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry continues to stand on one side and does not allow an orderly transition to ensure a true stability in the market.

I believe that we are now entering a period of a framework that is made for the thundering herds of finance. It is not made for the small flocks. It is made for the great conglomerates and those who in my view will become a kind of supermarket of the financial world.

In the debate in January, I commented that, although one welcomes change, the worst outcome is that power might be concentrated in the end in a few great hands. We have now built up in the country a system of four great banks. As we are now proceeding, I believe that we are likely to end up with four great constitutions which will stand astride the financial world, and that people will be able to deal only through their grace and favour.

We are now entering a period of dual capacity. It cannot be right for a man to be able to act as an agent and a principal, because when times become difficult I do not see how integrity will survive that.

We can talk of Chinese walls, Hadrian's wall or any other walls. That can be done when markets rise, because everyone makes profits and everyone is happy, just like a children's party where everyone gets a prize. But markets will fall again. The whole basis of life is an ebb and flow of prosperity and division. When they fall 100 or 150 points, what price then our Chinese walls? They will be looked upon as walls of glass, because people are willing to believe only what is in their own best interests. If it applies to politicians, why not to those with their own financial interests?

I prophesy that dual capacity will cause more trouble and heartaches, and that my betters who have paid ridiculously fancy prices for City firms and stockbrokers, when we have nothing to sell but our expertise and reputation, will find that they have paid too much for too little and that it will take them too long to recoup their losses.

Those who have sold will have to justify the prices which people have paid. That is how integrity will be endangered. How will the small investor be protected under such a system? The big man will be fine, because his feet will be firmly planted on the ground. But if the investment world is to mean anything, it should mean something for the small and average investor.

If a dual capacity firm is suddenly willing to sell shares, then, as with a man who protests his honesty, one should quickly hide the silver. Instead of a willingness to sell something, why not keep it to pass on to their clients? That can only lead to mistrust.

Many people believe that dual capacity is a great danger to the integrity of the City. They should wait until the next bad market and see how things stand then. It is all very well to be asked to keep to rules, but such rules should be made not of string but of steel wire. If the City is to retain its integrity, it must prove that such integrity is soundly based, as it has been up to now.

The passing of stock from one internal pocket to another must be unacceptable unless deals are declared there and then, from whom they are sold and for whom they are purchased. It is not that the City of London fears changes in commission, rather that one must be able to prove one's integrity. At present, one man is a dealer or agent and another is a principal. Now that all these conglomerates will come in, we must be much more careful that the rules are more solid and visible.

It now seems that the Government securities market will be part of this blancmange which we shall try to pin to a wall. In America, four firms have gone to the wall trying to give the so-called Government a so-called better deal. They thought that they had gone bust for $58 million, and were therefore bought in. In fact, the sum turned out to be $540 million, and they are still counting. Small movements of money make vast differences in profits. Hon. Members should think on that.

In the end, hon. Members are responsible to the people who elected them. When we start to create precedents it is like an earthquake causing cracks into which men can disappear. If we create the precedent of giving an outside body, however quasi-governmental it may be, the right to disagree with the House about an appointment, we will make a great mistake.

This is not personal. The present Governor of the Bank of England and I are friends and, I hope, will remain friends. I am concerned about the principle. Principals know no friends bar those that they represent. However much good may be in the proposed legislation, there should be a provision in it about consultation. There should not be a provision whereby the House gives to an outside body the right to say that unless it agrees the Government may not appoint.

Parliament is paramount. No man who is not elected should have the right to say nay to the House. Let us stick by that. Whatever else may be wrong with the proposals —and there is much right in them—what cannot be right is to surrender one ounce of power. Once Parliament makes one exception to the rule, another Parliament may say that, because the pass has already been sold, it can be done again and again. Outside bodies may consult as much as they wish but in the end only Parliament can consent.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): The debate has revealed a perhaps surprising degree of consensus about the White Paper. Although, as I hope to demonstrate, that does not preclude significant differences of emphasis and perhaps different conclusions, it is possible to give a guarded welcome to the White Paper, and I add my voice to those who have already done so. I believe that that is possible because both the Government and the City have moved substantially over the last year or two towards the position which I and my hon. Friends, and some other hon. Members, have held for some time.

The starting point for the debate, as I think was recognised by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), was the concern about the level of fraud in the City. That concern prompted the invitation to Professor Gower to write his report. The concern was directed not only at the level of City fraud but at the consequences that it had on investor confidence in the City. It also raised major question marks over the satisfactory nature or otherwise of the supervision that was exercised in the City. We have seen one institution after another damaged. Lloyd's was one example. Perhaps the most recent example was the Bank of England as a result of the Johnson Matthey affair.

The Government may be in the process of grappling with these problems. Certainly they are trying to ensure that frauds are brought to the light of day and that the transgressors are properly dealt with and brought to court, but so far the record has been extremely discouraging. The Roskill committee may produce remedies for the admitted difficulties of bringing complicated matters to court for jury trial. The fraud investigation group may be more successful in obtaining evidence of fraud. I think that the Government Front Bench is at one with me—certainly replies to me suggest this—but in the meantime grave damage is still being done to the reputation of the City through the consistent failure to bring to court those who have clearly committed criminal offences of substantial dimensions.

I hope that I shall be forgiven for making the political point that many on the Labour Benches will contrast that ineffectiveness with the zeal—the excessive zeal, one could say—with which the Oxford police rounded up some of the most defenceless and vulnerable people in society to prosecute them for trivial social security frauds.

Given that we recognise the need for dealing with City fraud, we support both the Gower report and the White Paper in their attempt to provide a statutory framework for all those carrying out investment business.

Another major factor underlies what is happening in the City and should illuminate what is in the White Paper, and on this point I offer a more robust voice than has been heard so far today. Ever since Professor Gower was asked to write his report, a frantic degree of change has set in in the City. That degree of change can, for convenience sake, be said to have begun when the Secretary of State's predecessor did his deal with the chairman of the Stock Exchange.

I think that I have the support of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) in saying that that deal, when it was done, was seen as a means of buying time, of preserving the status quo, so that the institutions, in particular the Stock Exchange, could phase in what by then were recognised as inevitable changes. Nobody quite foresaw the speed with which the changes would suddenly materialise once it became clear that the keystone in the arch, the minimum commission, would be removed at a foreseeable and specific date.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gould: I gather that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) is also claiming prescience in this matter. As soon as that change was foreseen, it became clear that single capacity would go, that the rules against outside purchasers would go and that an immense rush for change would take place.

We are speaking, not of something in prospect, but of events which have taken place and are occurring now. I obtained from the Stock Exchange today a list of over 50 major members who have been subject to purchase from outside the Stock Exchange. Thus, it has already happened on a major scale, with outside purchasers buying jobbers or purchasers and, in some cases, both.

That impetus to change has been reinforced by the tremendous new activity of foreign institutions in the City of London. That, in turn, was produced by the removal of exchange controls in 1979. Whatever its merits or demerits, that factor alone has created a wide open capital market in London, and that is now just one part—one time-zoned part, as it were—of an international market.

In addition, we have had the technological changes to which hon. Members have referred. They have meant that, through electronic communications, information can be transmitted in seconds around the world. The result has been a huge change, which has not necessarily yet been grasped, even by those who are most directly affected by it.

We now have the prospect—positions have already been taken up in anticipation of what is to come—and even the certainty that the City of London will never be the same again. It will be dominated by huge international financial conglomerates which will do everything. As I say, they have already bought jobbers and brokers, they are themselves in the business of offering investment management and advice and they offer the whole range of financial services. As the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) made clear, the possibilities for conflicts of interest within those conglomerates are immense, and I shall return to that point.

In addition to that element of change, as hon. Members have pointed out, all sorts of new business is being developed at a rapid pace in the City.

The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) paid particular attention to the futures markets. Even this week, the Baltic Exchange introduced a new futures market in international freight futures. There are prospects of futures markets in diamonds, ecu's and all sorts of things. In addition, there are new developments which are less welcome. Some attention is being paid to what are called boiler-room operations, operating out of centres such as Amsterdam, where hyped over-the-counter deals are being offered to British investors who, unless they are extremely careful, will be taken for a ride. There is little in the White Paper to suggest that we have got to grips with that problem, although it is a different one.

The nature of bodies such as the Stock Exchange will change fundamentally, both internally—I look forward with some interest to the outcome of the substantial battle to be resolved on 4 June—and in relation to other institutions and other operators in the market. That is because some major operators, if one is to take at face value what the Stock Exchange says, will be excluded—the major Japanese institutions, for example. Others will choose to be outside the Stock Exchange. We have already seen Robert Fleming making a market in electric shares and the Stock Exchange looking to the Department of Trade and Industry for some support in that matter.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: The Department told it to get lost.

Mr. Gould: That shows that we are in a new ball game. If that is true of the Stock Exchange, how much more true is it of other potentially self-regulating organisations which are not as well-established as the Stock Exchange; for example, the National Association of Security Dealers and Investment Managers? I say that not to denigrate NASDIM but simply as a matter of fact. If the Stock Exchange is to be rocked to its foundations in this way, how will NASDIM and self-regulatory organisations yet to be established fare in the face of the massive changes?

I do not believe that the Government, the White Paper, or even some elements in the City, have grasped the scale, the pace or the unpredictability of the change that is taking place. The old safeguards have gone. There is no point in looking back, as I suspect the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) was tempted to do, to the old clubby atmosphere, the old institutional safeguards and the old self-regulation, which passed, to the satisfaction of some, as adequate protection.

In a vast open international market, dominated by major institutions, all of which are competing fiercely with one another, with no loyalty to any interest other than their commercial interest, that old system is far less appropriate. In those circumstances, as the hon. Member for Selly Oak pointed out, the small private investor will simply be squeezed out.

To some extent, the City has not recognised that this new situation will change the whole nature of the business which the City institutions will be doing. In the past, the City offered expertise in a particular sector, different bits of information, continuing relations with clients, bits of gossip put out here and there; in other words, the ability to provide personalised, specialised advice to particular people in particular circumstances. That is no longer to be what the City should offer. If that is what it does offer, it will be swept away. What will now be at a premium in the City is speed, efficiency, the power of the institution, price competitiveness and the comprehensiveness of the services. All these are quite different from anything that the City has so far contemplated or seen itself as offering to its clients.

In those circumstances, the investor will no longer rely on his knowledge of the person with whom he is dealing, the relationship that he has built up or the assurances that he is given. What he needs above all, if he and his interests are to be protected and if his confidence is to be maintained, is to be able to identify legally enforceable rules, and the institutions and mechanisms that enforce those rules. That, therefore, requires the maximum amount of disclosure and transparency and the greatest possible separation of interests.

We are talking about increased competition, but, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, that is not to be regarded as an alternative to regulation. To some degree, the Governor of the Bank of England has featured in this debate, and he recently suggested that he saw competition as meeting the tasks which regulation might fulfil. I simply do not accept that. In the new situation which I have attempted to describe there is an even greater need for regulation.

In that highly competitive situation, the small investor in particular will need such protection. Self-denying ordinances, in-house guidelines and Chinese walls will not be enough. I have often asked about the origin of the term "Chinese wall". I have never been given a satisfactory answer, but it conjures up a picture of one of those self-standing partitions or silkscreens through which one cannot see but can hear everything. I rather doubt that that is adequate.

I have an example which illustrates what we may be faced with and how the City does not yet grasp what will be required of it. I tabled some questions concerning the allegation that members of the team at Kleinwort, Benson who handled the BT share issue had themselves dealt in those shares. I was eventually given an answer in which it was conceded that that had, indeed, happened. The Minister's explanation was that those involved were in a different position from civil servants. Some of the financial journalists said that, because of the limitation on the number of shares to be allotted, the most that any individual could make was a few hundred pounds, but that was an inadequate response.

We are concerned with a matter of principle and with a prime example of the sort of conflict of interest that will bedevil the City in future unless adequate steps are taken. I cannot accept the argument that a few hundred pounds is only a small amount and does not really matter. In future, Kleinwort, Benson, for example, may not be operating within those constraints when dealing with another share issue, and there may well be the real possibility of substantial sums of money being made. But that is not the real point. The point is that we have a City institution offering financial advice and expertise to a major client for a fee, while at the same time dealing in the market. That sort of thing gives rise to great unease and to justified scepticism about the extent to which self-regulation in the City will do the job required of it.

There is now a clear and pressing requirement for the utmost simplicity, clarity and directness. The White Paper has simply missed an opportunity. It is remarkable that it has gone as far as it has done. Assuming that there will be one board rather than two, I suspect that the White Paper sets up what ultimately looks like a statutory commission. In some ways it is a rather clever device for propitiating the City. Perhaps I am not doing the Secretary of State any favours by blowing his cover, but I think that that is what he is up to. Ultimately, even the cosmetics which may be involved get in the way of that overwhelming requirement for the maximum simplicity, directness and clarity.

To judge from the proposals in the White Paper, it is clear that to some degree we are offered, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East said, a hybrid structure and a muddled compromise. Almost every hon. Member who has spoken, and almost every institution in the City, has condemned the proposal for two boards. With one or two exceptions, people agree about dropping that idea in favour of one board, but even then we are left with a remarkably complex structure.

I should like to reinforce some of the telling points made by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon. Let us consider the situation of an insurance company which also manages pension funds. It may well be required to obtain authorisation from the Securities and Investments Board or the Marketing of Investments Board. It will be under the supervision of the insurance division of the Department of Trade and Industry. It will have to be authorised in some respects by the self-regulatory organisation—whatever it will be—which will regulate that part of the industry. The company may wish to obtain direct authorisation from the one or two boards which will then exist. On top of that, there will be the appeal tribunal, the Office of Fair Trading, the EEC and all the other institutions and rule-making bodies to which the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon referred. That is far too muddled, complicated and messy. It is certainly not what is required in the maelstrom of change with which we shall be confronted.

We entirely agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Selly Oak about the veto power of the Governor of the Bank of England. The hon. Gentleman referred to powers of appointment, especially in relation to the MIB. This illustrates yet another objection to the Bank of England's involvement in this matter. As some hon. Members have said, the Bank of England is hardly appropriate as a supervisor in any capacity. It is a major client of the City. It is already involved as an interested party. The Bank of England can hardly be expected to exercise major supervisory functions.

Hon. Members have referred to the number of lay or independent members of the board. I hope that the Secretary of State will read the debate and note that we hope that investors and consumers — not just professional practitioners — will be represented on the SIB. Appointments to that board have not yet been announced.

I believe that Professor Gower would wish to highlight another weakness in the structure proposed in the White Paper. The delegated powers which will be exercised by the boards will not, in turn, be available to the SROs. The control exercised over individual firms and practitioners will be extremely diffuse and indirect. That is an aspect which we shall want to examine carefully when the legislation comes forward.

When we see the detail of the legislation, we shall consider its scope, including the types of investments that will be covered. A rather curious recommendation in the White Paper would allow unrestricted unit trusts to be sold in certain circumstances to clients on a "know-your-customer" basis. That is an extremely dangerous provision, because of the element of subjectivity involved. Much will depend on the detail of what is meant by "operating as a business". That is of considerable interest to the trustees of pension funds and to accountants, as I am sure the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr Hanley) would confirm.

How tight will the disclosure rules be? We already know that major problems arise from within the Stock Exchange. Reference has been made to Barclays de Zoete Wedd and Barclays' objections to the Stock Exchange's suggestions. This morning I telephoned Barclays and asked whether I could see a copy of its paper. To my surprise, I was told that, although the paper was widely reported in the newspapers, it was confidential and I could not see it. That hardly augurs well for the type of disclosure that one will expect from City institutions.

There are disputes about which insurance brokers should be required to disclose information about their commissions and what information should be disclosed. We shall need to see the details, but I alert the House to the fact that we start by supporting the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) in looking to equivalence of treatment. Strong arguments against that would need to be made before we would wish to displace that principle.

Aspects of the City often cause us great concern. The Opposition are often suspicious — this suspicion goes wider than this side of the House—that too often City institutions are more concerned with churning money rather than ensuring that that money is put in places where it will serve the national interest.

We in the Labour party are also extremely concerned that the internationalisation of the City will make it much more difficult to look to the City as an instrument which will serve the policy of a national Government. [Interruption.] Yes, of a Socialist Government, by all means. A Socialist Government—elected, as it will be, after the next election—will be a national Government.

We also believe that the City, as an influence on macro-economic policy, often exercises a malign influence. It is not the City's fault. Its preponderance as an element in policy making gives it an unfortunate influence on the direction of that policy.

The Opposition want to see a City which prospers, which is efficient, and which is effective. If there is business to be done — and clearly there is a growing volume of business—let it be done in London. That is our position. We wish to see the City, in its own interests, functioning as effectively as it can. Therefore, in the interests of the investor—that is, of investor protection — and of the City itself, it is vital that we get an adequate structure in place. We believe that that requires us, in the end, to look very clearly and firmly at a statutory commission.

I believe that the Secretary of State will regret that he did not take the opportunity of going directly for what I think everybody concedes is the ultimate answer to the problem. It is inevitable that there will be City scandals over the next couple of years. Even on purely political grounds, I think that the Secretary of State will rue the fact that he failed to take the opportunity. Given that it is inevitable that we shall move to a statutory commission, it means that it will be left to the next Labour Government to put it in place.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) for the guarded welcome that he has given the White Paper. I am not sure whether he takes a radical or a conservative view of the changes that are taking place in the City. I listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman. He was a bit happy on the one hand and a bit unhappy on the other, but it was cautious support for the White Paper. I shall deal later with his suggestion that he has blown our cover on the question of Securities and Exchange Commissions.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), in his reply to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, said that he found unanimity on a number of matters and agreed with the framework of law that the White Paper is proposing. We welcome that. He mentioned particularly the fit and proper test, the question of licensing or authorisation of firms trading in financial services, the conduct of business rules, compensation for investors, and matters of that kind.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman and my right hon. Friend set the debate off on the right tone. It is clearly a matter of importance to the country and the economy as a whole, and I am glad that the House, in debating the White Paper, has taken the matter seriously and not in a particularly partisan way.

I was asked about the dematerialisation of shares—getting rid of the physical documentation. The White Paper, when it refers to this, talks about new technology developed by the Stock Exchange, code-named BETA. I could not say precisely what the letters stand for, but it has to do with the electronic transfer of stocks and shares. It will require changes in company law and in the Stock Transfer Act 1963. It will certainly provide a more efficient method that will suit many—if not most—people dealing in securities.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to an important point in terms of investor protection, using the expression "beaming in" of advertisements or invitations from other countries into the United Kingdom. He will recollect from the White Paper that it will be an offence to advertise in this country, in any shape or form in any publication produced in this country or any radio broadcast in this country, financial services that are not authorised—in other words, that do not come under the investor protection provisions that the White Paper outlines.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman was the first to ask, "Why not have a commission?" Contrary to his remarks, I should like to say that the decision against the commission was based not on United States experience, but on our desire to build on our own strengths and the strengths of the existing institutions in this country. The United Kingdom generally has a good reputation on self-regulation, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, but the present system is not comprehensive. There are gaps. Some financial products are not included at the moment—for example, futures contracts. Hence the proposal for a new system, based on our own experience—but it will be comprehensive. The United States' experience is quite different, as is their constitution, their need for federal agencies to cover the whole of the United States, their legal system and, indeed, their experience of self-regulation and investor protection.

We are delighted to have the support of my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) for the White Paper. He was concerned about weaknesses in dealing with international fraud. That is a serious problem. It requires more and better international co-operation than at present. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I travel abroad and discuss these matters, we are conscious that Governments and agencies in other countries are seeking better co-operation with ourselves and trying to make sure that information about those who escape to other jurisdictions or those who think they can get insider information in California and phone a broker in Switzerland, who might place the order in London, can be passed from one jurisdiction to another.

Coming back to domestic matters, my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton made a plea on behalf of the insurance brokers, I think in part for the protection of the word "broker", which is part of the Insurance Brokers Registration Council legislation. He also made a strong plea for the inclusion of non-life insurance to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State responded. We are concerned with this area but non-life insurance is not defined as an investment in the White Paper. In so far as irregularities with regard to non-life insurance may arise now and in the future, I suggest to my right hon. Friend that that market is not entirely in the hands of intermediaries. At the end of the day the insurance companies themselves underwrite the business. They control or have the capacity to control the market. They can lay down, in a form of self-regulation, and in co-operation with the IBRC and the British Insurance Brokers Association, rules of conduct copying as much of the White Paper as they please, but doing so on a voluntary, self-regulatory basis, remembering that the companies themselves do the underwriting.

If any broker in this country were to break rules that were agreed on a comprehensive basis by IBRC and by the companies, they would refuse to do business with him. That would bring him, if not exactly into line with the proposals in the White Paper, close to what we are trying to achieve for investments. Perhaps my right hon. Friend and others in the insurance business will consider such an approach.

Sir Edward du Cann: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for responding at such length to that point. The matter gives many people in the profession great anxiety. Will my hon. Friend be good enough to listen to further argument on it in due course? There is plenty of time before the Bill is drafted.

Mr. Fletcher: I am happy to say that not only will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I listen to argument but that the Marketing of Investments Board organising committee will. It is considering such matters and has as one of its members the chairman of BIBA, Mr. Alexander, who is very experienced in all those matters.

My right hon. Friend referred to tied agents. We are aware of the difficulties. We do not wish to be unfair as between tied agents and independent intermediaries on disclosure, but if there appears to be unfairness we shall consider the matter. For accountants, lawyers and others there will be a different kind of authorisation, but they will not be exempt from disclosure.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) wants a statutory commission but, despite my request, he was reluctant to press the case. I find that people want to "sloganise" about a statutory commission but nobody will say why there should be such a commission. It seemed to me that the hon. Member was talking about the commission in just the same way as he might talk about the alliance. Nobody presses its case and it remains two separate bodies.

Mr. Tebbit: We shall have better liaison.

Mr. Fletcher: My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) also referred to the existence of two bodies. The Marketing of Investments Board and the Securities and Investments Board, whatever marriage may take place in the future, will live together in the same premises and will share a common staff and common services. The chairman of the one will be a member of the other in order to ensure that there is a considerable degree of integration.

My hon. Friend also asked whether a draft Bill could be considered in a Special Standing Committee. The difficulty is the constraint upon time, but there has at least been consultation on the Gower report and the White Paper. This debate forms another method of consultation. During the preparation of the Bill we shall be more than willing to listen to ideas and suggestions. I wish that such a Bill could be discussed before it comes before the House, but one has to be realistic about the constraints upon time, in particular when we are dealing with such a large and significant Bill.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) suggested that the Government were uncertain about whether there should be self-regulation or a commission. Perhaps I should explain how the Government arrived at the proposed structure. I know that it will be of particular interest to my very alert Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark). The hon. Member for Dagenham might also be interested in this, in view of the fact that he thought he had blown our cover.

As to how the structure came into existence, in response to a request from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the financial sector considered the matter and expressed willingness to adopt self-regulation. However, it, like the Government, realised that self-regulation must be comprehensive, that it must cover the whole market from one end of the country to the other. For it to be made compulsory for traders statutory backing is required.

These boards are private sector bodies. Those proposing the Securities and Investments Board, though not the Marketing of Investments Board, asked the Governor of the Bank of England to appoint its members. This, as a private sector body with its own constitution, it was perfectly entitled to do. However, when it came to giving statutory backing to these private sector bodies, my right hon. Friend naturally and correctly said that a number of accountability matters must be considered before giving statutory backing. He did not believe it to be right to delegate statutory powers to a private sector body over which he had no powers of appointment. Therefore, rather than that the Governor should intervene in the actions of my right hon. Friend, the reverse is the case. My right hon. Friend is intervening by using his parliamentary powers to appoint the members of the board of a private sector body. Therefore, it is not the Governor who is referred to in the White Paper but the Secretary of State.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister should clear up the point whether a single board, if it should come into existence, will be a de facto commission. When he was questioned by the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) about his position, he seemed to suggest that he took the view, which was supported by many of his own Back Benchers, that that was the case. He cannot argue against the commission and then agree that it might de facto come about by means of a single board.

Mr. Fletcher: I went into that explanation because it was being suggested that I somehow supported the idea of a commission, which I certainly do not. I was pressing the hon. Member for Stockton, South to make the case for a commission, but he either could not or would not do so. That aspect of the debate, however, will doubtless continue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson), in an excellent speech, rightly stressed the importance of futures markets. He will know that the new self-regulatory Association of Futures Brokers and Dealers is preparing to operate in that area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester and others mentioned the takeover panel. We are anxious to take advice on that. The panel is working extremely well and we have asked it to consider how it envisages its future, whether it can best work on its present self-regulating basis or whether in some respects it should come into the statutory framework that is being designed. It is a very delicate question and we are most anxious to get it right.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester also, I believe, referred to golden parachutes. That aspect is covered in paragraphs 13.9 and 13.10 of the White Paper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield) was concerned about specialist brokers. I believe that there is a future for small, specialist firms and that many people, not least private investors, will still wish to deal with the local firms or individuals they know best. As for the larger firms, I assure my hon. Friend that no matter how big the dealers or the markets they will have to conform with the legislation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) asked about the cost of the board. The answer to that is that we do not know. The organising committees are working this out. The boards will certainly not be cheap, because they have a very important job to do, but as the market will also be paying for them I am sure that they will keep their costs reasonable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) opened up the debate on Chinese walls in some detail. Happily, he began in a very constructive way by supporting the idea. He believes that they can and do work, whereas my hon Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) is more sceptical. My hon Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle asked a long question about the Companies Act to which I should like to reply in writing to ensure that I get it exactly right.

My hon Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) rounded up that part of the debate about Chinese walls by making it clear that he was against them, which did not surprise me in the least. He also took the opportunity to defend the solicitors' monopoly and solicitors' rights in a number of ways. If any lobby is represented really well by my hon. Friend, it is the legal lobby, as we are all very much aware.

We are not saying that there will be no serious problems or malpractices, whatever system of self-regulation is adopted, but we believe that the boards will protect the investors, especially private investors, by means of compensation and that they will be able to move quickly —more quickly in our view than a commission—in clamping down on fraud and malpractice.

I was grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) for his expert support for the proposals in the White Paper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak was kind enough to say that the White Paper had been well received. I am not surprised, however, that some people in the City and elsewhere—I refer not to my hon. Friend but to those to whom he referred—are not entirely enthusiastic about it. It would be an odd document if no one even uttered any words of caution about how the legislation may work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak said that the Government were rushing the City into a new world. We have given the City three years in which to prepare for the changes that are taking place. The City and the chairman of the Stock Exchange assure us that they expect to be able to meet that programme of change and, indeed, to beat it by at least two or three months. That being so, my hon. Friend may have been somewhat too conservative about the ability of his own profession to meet these requirements.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: It is always comforting to hear Ministers talking in that way. However, the City is not encouraged if, when it asks for help in making sure that everything is orderly, the Government seem reluctant to stop the fragmentation that is doing so much damage. The Government love competition more than anything else —so do we all—but does not my hon. Friend agree that the fragmentation will be damaging?

Mr. Fletcher: It could be, but I do not believe that it will be. I accept my hon. Friend's point. What matters is that, until the new legislation is in place, the Stock Exchange should provide the main safeguards for the investors. Clearly, we would expect that the vast bulk of securities trading will continue to be done through the Stock Exchange. There is a small amount of off-market trading. That must not threaten the orderliness of change and the safeguards for investors.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: It does.

Mr. Fletcher: At the moment it does not threaten the changes that are taking place.

Mr. Gould: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fletcher: My hon. Friend asked me a question. We do not answer hypothetical questions, but we do not think that what he fears will happen.

The hon. Member for Dagenham expressed the view that the small private investor was being squeezed out. He misses the main achievement of our policies.

Competition is a spur to change. Competition under a comprehensive system of investor protection is in the interests of the small private investor. It provides the proper investment climate. We are moving away from the time when only a tiny proportion of the population had the opportunity to buy or sell shares or to come into contact with stockbrokers. Already a number of large retail organisations, as well as banks and other institutions, are preparing to provide financial services from one end of the country to the other so that people will be able to buy shares and financial services in a way not envisaged a short time ago. We welcome this development as an aspect of wider share ownership and a way of making people more aware of how wealth is created, where jobs come from and what makes the economy tick.

It is because of the deregulation or revolution—whatever one chooses to call it—that is currently taking place in financial services that we think the financial services industry itself will benefit, that investors will benefit, and that the United Kingdom will take its true place beside New York and Tokyo as one of the premier financial and investment centres of the world.

Mr. Tim Sainsbury (Hove): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INSURANCE (FEES) BILL

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered; reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 58 (Third Reading) and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

South Trafford District Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

9.59 pm

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): In all the years that I have served in this House, this is the most convenient time at which I have had an Adjournment debate. My previous Adjournment debates have taken place in the middle of the night and I have had to apologise to the Minister who replied for keeping him out of bed.

I have a sad story to tell about a hospital and a series of broken promises and delays. This is not the first Adjournment debate that I have had on the subject. I made the case for the south Trafford district hospital on 30 June 1980. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) was then the Minister responsible. He said that a decision on the new hospital would be reached with all possible speed.

One year later, almost to the day, just to keep the Ministry on its toes and to remind it of the happy occasion, I went to see my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan), who was then a Minister in the Department of Health and Social Security. He agreed to consider proposals for the new hospital which he was about to receive. In October 1981, the scheme was accepted by the Department and the regional health authority. Approval in principle was sent to the Department in July 1982 and a deadline of December 1982 was set for a response. In November, the Department replied that further work was required on the document and the regional health authority agreed to purchase the site. However, the Department and the Treasury could not agree without any firm scheme being included in the capital programme.

In April 1983, at the formal review of capital schemes, the regional health authority could not guarantee a place in the programme and its previous acceptance of a start in 1987-88 was not confirmed. In October 1983 we seemed to get some cheering news. We were told that the hospital had provisionally been put in the programme for the 1988 financial year and that the Treasury had approved the purchase of the site. Many of my constituents believed that at last the new hospital, which had been promised for so long, would come into being. There was an element of mystery at that stage because the regional health authority did not act as the regional team of officers appeared to have doubts about whether the new hospital would ever materialise. That was when outline regional strategy was being prepared by the regional health authority and alternative schemes, which would be less expensive in capital terms, were being considered. At the beginning of 1984, the regional officers began to suggest that the new hospital should be reappraised. That appraisal used only capital costs as the basis for considering alternative options and what became known as the Wythenshawe option was first put forward.

In September 1984 we were told that the appraisal showed that, on the criterion of capital costs, a development at Wythenshawe was cheaper than building a new hospital in south Trafford. The Trafford health authority felt that other considerations should be taken into account, such as accessibility, convenience for patients and many other non-financial criteria. It also thought that the capital costs of proceeding with the Wythenshawe development had been disguised to show the proposal in a more advantageous light. It is clear that Trafford health authority was not exactly jumping with joy.

In November 1984 the regional health authority agreed to reconsider the scheme and promised a full option appraisal by February 1985. As a result, it was discovered that there was little cost difference between the two main options, the new hospital in south Trafford and the Wythenshawe option, when all the non-financial benefits, capital and revenue costs were fully taken into account. Despite this, the regional health authority accepted that the appraisal was marginally in favour of the Wythenshawe option, and decided that it should proceed.

I believe that the views of the population of south Trafford do not seem to have been taken much into account by the regional health authority. We have been waiting for years for a new district hospital that would provide, among other things, services for the elderly and for mental illness, services which are desperately needed in the south Trafford area.

Trafford community health council has over the years supported the plans for a new hospital. It has tackled successive Secretaries of State in seeking a decision on the new hospital because it knew that the new hospital was central to the strategy for the area. Despite all the exhortations to come to a speedy conclusion, little progress has been made.

As I have mentioned, the regional health authority decided on a full option appraisal. These options went to the community health council on 14 January with a request for comments by the end of January, in other words, in just over two weeks. I was told that a medical staff member who attended a recent public meeting in Sale, a man who is a consultant with the Sale and Brooklands hospital, announced publicly that consultants were asked for their opinions on 19 February, six days before the regional health authority took the decision. I feel that the regional health authority could well ask itself whether its record on consultation was satisfactory.

Prior to the meeting of the regional health authority, Trafford community health council presented a resolution asking it to defer a final decision until it had had an opportunity to discuss the situation with the chairman and members of the regional health authority. This request was rejected on the ground that further delay was considered inadvisable. Considering the delays that have stretched over the years, I should have thought that a request for a delay of a few weeks was not asking too much. A project that has dragged on for years could not be deferred for a short time in order to hear and assess the views of the residents of south Trafford.

Because of the concern of the local people, the community health council decided that it would hold a public meeting on 20 March. I am told that the meeting was well attended. It is unfortunate that nobody from the regional health authority was present to put the authority's point of view. If somebody attends and puts forward a point of view, even though many people in the audience may not necessarily agree with it, at least the point of view will be heard.

In fairness, I think that there may have been some misunderstanding. I am told that the chairman of the community health council and a deputation are to meet the chairman of the regional health authority on Friday 26 April to put their view and that of the local residents to him.

[Sir Fergus Montgomery]

As a result of the public meeting, the community health council is anxious to have some answers to what it regards as vital questions. First, it wants to know whether the proposals will meet the needs of the people in south Trafford. The community health council has done a great deal of homework. I am told that inpatient activity under the revised intentions shows an increased work load of approximately 15 per cent. While the provision of additional ward accommodation is covered under capital proposals, it is not clear whether support facilities—catering, pathology, radiology, physiotherapy and so on—would be capable of coping with the additional work load without extra capital input. The proposals presume no extra capital requirement.

There is a further complication because of the situation that has developed in the south Manchester health authority which has, I think the American expression would be, an overspend situation. There is a great deal of publicity in our local newspapers about the cutting of services in the South Manchester health authoriy area. Two decisions—one local, the other regional—have coincided. The vital question is whether the capital intended for south Trafford will merely be absorbed.

There is also the question of acceptability to the people of south Trafford. This is tremendously important. They must be consulted on things which are of great importance to them, such as hospital provision. In all fairness, I do not think that the appraisal took account of acceptability to the general public because of "the difficulties of obtaining any firm founded statement of views in the time available".

The people of my area certainly know the answer now. Public opinion, the community health council and the Trafford borough council have all come out strongly in favour of a new district hospital. The Wythenshawe option has very few friends in my constituency.

Do these proposals meet the needs of south Trafford? It seems that the proposals for mental illness provision have again been referred back to the joint working group. This is of enormous concern to the community health council, not only on the grounds of service provision but also because it could affect the basis of the financial considerations of the appraisal.

That brings me to the $64,000 question in respect of which I hope my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary can give some illumination. The people of my constituency desperately want to know whether the Wythenshawe option has been definitely decided. If that is the case, is there any appeal? There is a desperate need to know exactly what has happened over hospital provision in the south Trafford area.

Linked with this are the futures of certain small hospitals in the area, over which there are question marks, particularly the sale of Brooklands war memorial hospital. That hospital was built by public subscription and has a tremendous record of service to the people of the area. There are strong local feelings about it. In fact, I have received more letters on keeping the Brooklands war memorial hospital open than on any other hospital in the area. Many people have spoken with enormous sincerity about the tremendous care that their relatives received in that hospital. They feel that if it were to close, it would be an extremely black day for the area.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to say that no final decision has been reached and that the voices of the local people will be heard before a decision is finally made.

10.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I can begin by reassuring my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) that no final decision has been taken, certainly none which has been formally notified to myself and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health.

My hon. Friend and his constituents must of course have their say, and that must be listened to. Just as it is critically important that hospital closures are looked at properly and closure decisions taken only when they are of benefit to patients, so, too, with the approval of new hospital building programmes. Heaven knows they are expensive enough and take long enough to complete. Once begun, we are locked in for a considerable time. We in the centre are determined that decisions shall not be taken until the voice of everyone has been fully and reasonably heard and every conceivable option looked at.

Once a new integrated district authority hospital has been built, and once the first foundation stone is laid, the die is inexorably cast in terms of service development, not just for 10 or 20 years, but for probably half a century, so long is the lead time, so massive the capital investment and so substantial the impact on the pattern of patient services in the area. I fully recognise that this is a momentous decision for the people in my hon. Friend's area.

No one could have been more assiduous than my hon. Friend over the years in bringing the needs of south Trafford to the attention of successive Ministers of Health. I heard what my hon. Friend had to say about an Adjournement debate with the then Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young). He and I between us have dealt with an adequate number of Adjournment debates on this and similar issues over the last three or four years. I am only sorry that the decision which my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale wanted on a previous occasion is still in the air.

It is very difficult for my right hon. and learned Friend and me in the Elephant and Castle, as the men in Whitehall, the faceless people who are not known in Trafford and who do not know Trafford, to take decisions about major capital building programmes in the region. Those decisions have to be taken locally, within a regional framework, by people who understand the local community, who know what makes the north-west tick and who understand the needs of the people. While we have a legitimate and proper interest—if we did not show that the Public Accounts Committee would be after us very quickly—we could not logically be expected to decide exactly where new hospitals are to go. If we took upon ourselves that unlikely role, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale and others of my hon. Friends would want to know why on earth the men from Whitehall were making decisions when they did not understand local conditions.

There is a slight problem in that my hon. Friend rightly brings the issue to the high court of Parliament, where matters are finally decided, and to the Department of Health and Social Security, where the actual decisions are taken, but we cannot, except in a residual way, act as more than a benevolent long-stop until such a row breaks out that no local decision can be taken because the people in the region cannot agree. In the end, hospitals have to go somewhere. In the end, the location pleases some constituents because they have a hospital in their immediate area, and it does not please other constituents because they do not have a hospital in their area. There is no way in which we can put a large integrated district general hospital every five or 10 miles across the land. We could not afford to do so and, indeed, we do not need so many. Those are the difficulties in which we find ourselves when we listen to the proper appeal that is made on behalf of the constituents of my hon. Friend.

I told the House at the outset that no proposals by the North Western regional health authority had yet been submitted to Ministers for consideration. The matter is still in the formative stages locally, though Trafford district health authority has shown a clear preference among the options open to it for dealing with the health problems in the south of the district. My hon. Friend will be aware of that. However, that preference is subject to certain conditions which have been referred to the regional health authority for investigation.

The members of the regional health authority and the district health authority will be keenly interested in what my hon. Friend has said this evening. They will read what is reported in the local newspapers and, perhaps more importantly, in the pages of Hansard. As a demonstration of their determination to take a balanced view, Sir John Page, the admirable chairman of the regional health authority, whom we are pleased to see fully back to health after his recent illness, has offered to receive a local delegation. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health has also been approached by my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale on the issue and I understand that he will hold a meeting with representatives of Trafford community health council in the near future to discuss the issue further.

It does not need me to tell the House, and particularly my hon. Friend, about the nature of Trafford. It is a well populated area with a major general hospital in the north of the district and with the southern part of the district cut off by the river Mersey, which makes communications between north and south difficult. The local community in the south are served by a number of small hospitals for minor acute and geriatric services, and by Wythenshawe hospital in south Manchester for major services. Therefore, the task facing the district health authority is to rationalise services in the south of the district and to make them more cohesive.

Changes in the NHS—rationalisation, and, from time to time, the closure of old buildings, some of them worn out and inappropriate for modern clinical uses—do not mean cuts. They simply mean that things are changing. Throughout the country the NHS is changing, with the biggest building programme that the service has seen since 1948, with more than £1 billion worth of major hospital schemes being designed, planned and built.

The Government are striving hard, with hard-earned taxpayers' money, to make up the damaging and slashing cuts on the NHS that occurred between 1976 and 1979, when the IMF sent in its men to bail out the British Government. Cuts made over three or four years in the NHS represent a huge chunk out of the building programme. We are just catching up. We are running hard to make up the lost ground of those disastrous years of the last Labour Administration.

That is the national picture. The picture in Trafford is also far from gloomy. The local newspapers, if they care to report this debate and anything that I say, might note that at present Trafford residents have more money spent per person on their health services than the people of any other district in the north-western region. The residents of Trafford find it easier to obtain inpatient hospital beds than do most others in the region, including many living in teaching hospital districts, and Trafford does not have a teaching hospital.

We are trying in the north-west to do what we can for the Trafford district, while moving historically deprived districts such as Blackpool and Bolton, both of which I have visited in the last year, closer to the level of quality and service that Trafford enjoys. This year we are spending an extra £8 million on the health service in the north-west. That is a cash growth of about 11 per cent., and the North-Western regional health authority's capital allocation is again this year the second highest in the country.

While, therefore, my hon. Friend is rightly pressing us for action and decisions, and while his constituents wish to have the hospital provision that he has represented to us, both wishes must be set against the considerable success story that can be told about the NHS in the Trafford district, just as it can be told of other districts — Watford, Abingdon, Oxford and any other randomly chosen constituencies to which one might refer.

A challenge faces the planners in Trafford and in the region. How can the excellent local health service which Trafford already enjoys be enhanced in a way that releases resources to improve the lot of deprived districts as well? They must ask themselves whether it is right to ignore the fact that patients seem to prefer to go to Wythenshawe hospital. I shall give way to my hon. Friend if he feels that I do not have that right. I do not know the area and I have reported the position as I am advised.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: It is not the reaction that I have been getting. Wythenshawe is not the easiest place to get to from south Trafford. It is easy if one has a car, but many people do not. Nor is there the best of bus services on that route. The Wythenshawe option has been extremely unpopular in the area.

Mr. Patten: I stand corrected by my hon. Friend and I am glad that he intervened to make that point.

There are two options. One is the Wythenshawe option, and the other is to build a new hospital in south Trafford. The Wythenshawe option involves further developing that hospital to provide district hospital services for south Trafford. Over the past 15 years, Wythenshawe hospital has been developed as one of the three teaching hospitals associated with the University of Manchester.

My hon. Friend said that the Wythenshawe option was meeting with considerable local opposition, and I hear and believe what he says. On the other hand, I have been advised that some local people regard this as not much more than a stop-gap measure, even if it should go ahead. It is preferred by the district health authority, subject to satisfactory arrangements being made for the mentally ill patients in south Trafford. It has said that, should the Wythenshawe option be adopted, management should be transferred from south Manchester, with its unfortunate cash problems, to the Trafford health authority, and the regional health authority has to consider all these points when it looks long and hard at these problems.

It is difficult for us to decide from the centre. My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale can see that it is difficult for me and for my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health, before we have concrete proposals before us, to attempt to adjudicate on problems which have to be sorted out locally. I emphasise that representations can still be made to Sir John Page, the chairman of the regional health authority, about the totality of services to the people of south Trafford. Those representations should still be being made, and I was pleased to hear from my hon. Friend that in only two days' time one further meeting is to take place between local representatives and the regional chairman.

This debate has been valuable because I have been able to learn more about the problems of the district. I listened carefully to the points that my hon. Friend made. I and my right hon. and learned Friend will be able to consider these options when they are put to us if they are put to us in the form in which my hon. Friend has suggested that they will be.

If my hon. Friend and his colleagues and constituents of all and no political parties, the community health council, the borough and everybody else feel that consultation has not been carried out as well as it should have been, I take that seriously. In running a modern health service, the people whom we are trying to satisfy are not politicians, Ministers, trade unionists or the people who work in the NHS, but the people who consume the products of the NHS—the patients. My hon. Friend's constituents are the consumers of the products that we are labouring hard to improve.

If my hon. Friend feels on reflection after tonight and the meeting on Friday that there has been something seriously wrong with the consultation process, I happily give him the undertaking that I shall discuss the reopening of the consultation process with the regional chairman so that everybody feels that their views have been taken into account.

We also need a decision soon. This has been the subject of meetings and Adjournment debates, with more meetings to come. We need a proper decision, taken against the background of full and proper consultation, as soon as possible. I shall be giving that message firmly to the regional health authority.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Life Assurance Policies

1. Mr. Hirst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has received representations recently from the Life Offices Association, and the Associated Scottish Life Offices, about the eligibility of life assurance policies for tax relief; and if he will make a statement.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): Representations have been received on this question. The Government have been advised that eligibility for relief depends on whether an enforceable contract had been established before 14 March 1984.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for his reply. Is he aware that there is concern in a number of life offices at the attitude that the Inland Revenue appears to be taking in seeking to disallow tax relief on policies which had been transacted with life companies before the midnight deadline on 13 March 1984? Does he agree that much of that flurry of new business was occasioned by an unfortunate and improper leak by a Treasury official? Can he assure me that the Inland Revenue will adopt a trusting and fair approach towards tax relief on these policies?

Mr. Rees: I understand the concern expressed by my hon. Friend, but it is not for me to speculate about the reasons for what he described as this "flurry of new business." The Inland Revenue is charged with the duty of enforcing the law as this House, with the upper House, enacts it, and is bound by the provisions of the last Finance Act. If there are cases where the facts may be a little in doubt and my hon. Friend feels that it would be helpful for the matter to be ventilated, no doubt he will write to me giving details.

Personal Taxation

2. Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the total tax liability and national insurance contributions payments of those people earning less than half the average wage.

Mr. Peter Rees: As a result of the changes announced in the Budget, employees earning less than half of average earnings will pay about £270 million less in employees' national insurance contributions in a full year and about £400 million less in income tax.

Mr. Chapman: I appreciate and welcome the significant reduction in tax liability for those on modest means, which works at about 15 per cent. less tax liability for somebody earning only £80 per week. However, will my right hon. and learned Friend use his good offices to ensure that in future Budgets priority is given to the unification of income tax and national insurance contributions, particularly since national insurance contributions are no longer really based upon the contributory principle, so that those of modest means are given the most help?

Mr. Rees: I am sure that the House is indebted to my hon. Friend for his calculations, which demonstrate the lengths to which my right hon. Friend went in his Budget to assist those on modest incomes. The amalgamation of national insurance contributions with income tax is a wider question and raises a whole range of issues. I am bound to reassert that we attach importance to the insurance principle. However, there may well be administrative advantages to be gained from the idea which my hon. Friend has trailed, and the Government will no doubt look at it. There will be ample opportunity to consider the matter after the computerisation of schedule E and cases 1 and 2 of schedule D and the Green Paper on transferable personal allowances.

Mr. Pike: If the Government have sincere intentions to help those on modest and low incomes, how do they justify the reduction of 23 per cent. in income tax for those on the top rate band in 1979? Would it not be better for the Government to take more positive action? What they have done is still insignificant for those on modest and low incomes.

Mr. Rees: I do not know how the hon. Gentleman defines modesty, but I should have thought that taking 800,000 people out of tax, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor managed to achieve in the last Budget, was a significant achievement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that raising tax thresholds, reducing national insurance contributions for the lower paid and maintaining child benefit are the best ways to protect the lower paid and reduce the poverty trap?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend proposes a beguiling mix. Perhaps this is not the approprate moment to go into the details, but I am sure that my hon. Friend and I find common ground in thinking that the raising of tax thresholds will make a great contribution to the cause which she and I have at heart.

Dr. McDonald: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that whatever relief the changes in the national insurance contributions offer to some of the low-paid, because they are ill-thought out they encourage employers to hold wages down and create three new poverty traps at £60, £90 and £130?

Mr. Rees: As I have said, the major contribution to the alleviation of the poverty trap will be taking a range of people out of tax altogether. Indeed, 10,000 people who were on means-tested benefits will be taken out of tax, and that is a positive contribution. None the less, as the hon. Lady points out, to the extent that one moves up, one shifts the problem, but I hope that over a period, as we have carried through a sustained policy of raising tax thresholds, we shall make a considerable contribution to the problem, the solution of which she and I have at heart.

3. Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the efficiency of personal income tax work in Inland Revenue tax offices; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) on 24 January 1985.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Minister aware that many are now concerned that the work in the district tax offices will largely fall apart before computerisation is brought into effect? Does he accept that delays in replying to letters are now measured in months and that hundreds of thousands of people are paying the wrong tax because of delays in end-of-year PAYE reviews? Is the national state of work in the tax offices better or worse than this time last year, and how might things stand in six months time?

Mr. Hayhoe: The number of letters that are outstanding nationally is some 4·8 million. I should quickly emphasise that only about one in four of those are communications from the general public. I know that the hon. Gentleman has been particularly worried about the position in Yeovil, but he will know that there have been substantial improvements there in the past six months. The number of letters that had been outstanding for more than 14 days was then 11,000, and that has now been reduced to 7,500, despite a rather virulent infectious virus in the Yeovil tax office.

Mr. Alexander: Is there not an alarming trend for income tax personnel to leave their jobs, often to work in the private sector for accountants, where they show people how to pay less tax? Has my hon. Friend any plans for increasing their job satisfaction, apart from introducing commission incentives, which I assure my hon. Friend would be repugnant to almost everyone in Britain?

Mr. Hayhoe: I well understand my hon. Friend's final point. I have seen the rather alarmist headlines in the newspapers about the alleged brain drain of Inland Revenue tax inspectors, but the challenge, opportunities and rewards of the private sector have always been an attraction to tax inspectors, and the number of those who have been leaving the Civil Service in recent months is not all that much greater in percentage terms than in the past. Nevertheless, that trend is of concern and separate discussions are taking place between my officials and the Association of Inspectors of Taxes and I hope that some helpful movements will appear from those discussions.

Johnson Matthey Banking

4. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to receive the report into the affairs of Johnson Matthey Banking.

6. Mr. Skinner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with banks and other institutions regarding the Johnson Matthey Bankers rescue; and if he will make a statement.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): My right hon. Friend expects to receive the results of the review of banking supervision at about the end of next month.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not clear that, despite official bank monitoring, this bank made some stupid loans, often completely unsecured, which are now having to be covered by the indemnity guarantee arrangements? As it has been proven that a relationship existed between some of those who were lending and some of the borrowers, which must have had some bearing on the terms of which the borrowings were made, why has not the City fraud squad been brought in to carry out a full and detailed investigation so that justice in this case can be seen to be done? The public demand that justice is done in this matter.

Mr. Stewart: It is clear that Johnson Matthey Bankers indulged in some extremely unwise and imprudent lending. I am advised that investigations to date do not suggest that the collapse was due to fraud.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not time that we had a law that applied to everybody, not one for City crooks who operate in the casino economy and another for the rest of the population? Is it not a fact that this bank not only engaged in lending money to people who were organising lavish parties in the City and trips abroad, but that its activities have resulted in the taxpayer having to pay at least £75 million to bail it out? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the report on the subject, which has been sat on since February, should be revealed to the public at large so that every taxpayer who has had to help bail out this uneconomic unit, Johnson Matthey Bankers, has an opportunity to see all the sordid details involved in the case? Is he aware that Mrs. Thatcher—[HON. MEMBERS: "Order."]—the Prime Minister has had a letter from me for a month asking for the report to be published but has refused to answer it? It is time that the Government came clean—[HON. MEMBERS: "Too long."]—about all their friends in the City.

Mr. Stewart: I am afraid that I cannot respond to the hon. Gentleman's correspondence with other members of the Government. As for the various points that he raised in his supplementary question——

Mr. Skinner: We are talking about £75 million.

Mr. Stewart: As for his general questions——

Mr. Skinner: The whole thing stinks.

Hon. Members: Say that outside.

Mr. Stewart: I must advise the hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Skinner: I will say it outside.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) asked a supplementary question and should be prepared to listen to the answer. I am trying to hear what the Minister has to say. Mr. Stewart.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) misunderstands the position in relation to the taxpayers' money, to which he referred frequently during his supplementary question. The decision to rescue Johnson Matthey was made by the Bank of England, and voted money has not been involved in that. There is an agreement for an indemnity between the Bank of England and the commercial banks. The report to which he referred was commissioned by the Governor of the Bank of England, who has felt that it should not be published because it contains commercially confidential information.

Mr. Meadowcroft: On what criteria does the Minister support bailing out banking in this way and according preferential treatment to its errors? On what criteria does he support the cover-up of the report, which details the reason why public money needs to be spent in this way?

Mr. Stewart: I have already answered the question about public money. That is a decision for the Bank of England. The Governor made it clear at the time that Johnson Matthey Bankers was saved from liquidation because of the potential impact on the gold market. It is not for me to make a judgment about decisions which the Governor might make in hypothetical circumstances about other institutions. In this case, that was the basis on which the Governor made his decision.

Mr. Blair: Do not the public have a right to know exactly what took place in relation to Johnson Matthey, so that they can pass judgment on the Bank of England's decision to bail the bank out? In saying that public money is not involved, the Minister is making a wholly artificial distinction between the funds of the Bank of England and taxpayers' money. In answer to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), the Minister has just accepted that Johnson Matthey engaged in imprudent banking practice. When are we to be told the details of that imprudent banking practice?

Mr. Stewart: I am not drawing an artificial distinction about public money. On the question of information about what is happening, investigations are still under way. I cannot yet say what information can be made available or in what way.

In announcing to the House in December the establishment of the review of banking supervision my right hon. Friend made it plain that he would report on it to the House as early as possible, and would report on any prospective changes in legislation.

Falkland Islands

5. Mr. Dalyell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much has been paid out of the Contingency Fund for expenditure related to the Falklands.

Mr. Peter Rees: Since 1982-83, £13 million; all of which has been repaid.

Mr. Dalyell: Which fund pays for the catapulting escalation of the cost of the airport from £215 million to £360 million, according to The Sunday Times, or £430 million, according to the Sunday Post? What does the Treasury think about that?

Mr. Rees: The Treasury always regrets escalation of costs. The charge will be borne by the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Stokes: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that honour demanded that we should repossess the Falkland Islands, and that the cost was secondary? The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) seems quite incapable of understanding that point.

Mr. Rees: I accept my hon. Friend's proposition about honour. As Chief Secretary to the Treasury, I cannot be entirely indifferent to questions of cost, but I believe that on this occasion the money was well spent.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman satisfied that we are getting value for money in spending hundreds of millions of pounds on 1,200 folk 8,000 miles away?

Mr. Rees: I am, and the Government's judgment on the matter has been endorsed many times by the House.

Inflation

7. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the current level of inflation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Over the 12 months to March 1985, the retail prices index increased by 6·1 per cent.

Mr. MacKay: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that that figure does not take into account the latest increase in mortgage rates? Does he agree that that increase was premature and misguided, bearing in mind the way in which interest rates elsewhere have fallen since then?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right to say that the most recent increase in the mortgage rate does not come into effect until — I believe — 1 May and that it is therefore not included in those figures. As I made clear at the time of the Budget, we expect inflation to be above 6 per cent. for the next few months before falling to 5 per cent. by the end of the year and below 5 per cent. next year.

Decisions taken by building societies on interest rates are a matter for them.

Mr. Wainwright: As to the Chancellor's financial strategy against inflation, does he find appropriate the present combination of the money growth rate and the exchange rate, or in what direction would he wish to see it adjusted?

Mr. Lawson: I do not have it in my power to determine the exchange rate, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware, but I have some influence over the level of interest rates. As he is a distinguished member of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Government's policy is, taking exchange rates and interest rates into account, to maintain a steady downward pressure on inflation.

Mr. Squire: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the growth rate in the economy this year is among the highest, if not the highest, in Western Europe? Does he regard that as coincidental and commensurate with our existing rate of inflation?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. The reduction in inflation has assisted the steady growth which we have secured for nearly four years. We have had four years of steady growth at 2·5 per cent. and expect 3·5 per cent. growth in the current year. That is likely to be the highest rate of growth in the European Community and, to judge from the first quarter figures in the United States, it might be higher than growth in the United States as well.

Mr. Fatchett: When does the Chancellor expect to achieve the Prime Minister's forecast of inflation? When will it be down to the Prime Minister's figure?

Mr. Lawson: In due course.

Mr. Powley: Although we all agree that it is important to maintain and, if possible, reduce the present level of inflation, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is just as important to compare our rate of inflation with the rates of our competitors and ensure that our level of inflation is below theirs, thus putting our industry and commerce in a better competitive position so that we may improve our exports?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. It is essential, for many reasons, to get inflation falling steadily and to get it as low as possible. One of those reasons is the rate of inflation experienced by our competitors. It is interesting to compare our rate of inflation now with the average rate of 15·4 per cent. a year throughout the lifetime of the Labour Government.

Mr. Haynes: The Chancellor says that he has no power over exchange rates, but he has power over inflation. When will he fulfil some of the promises which he keeps making when he travels the country — [Interruption.] Why do Tory Members not keep quiet? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that industry cannot plan for the future with inflation bobbing up and down as it is? The right hon. Gentleman may laugh, but the levels of inflation show that he is the worst Chancellor that the country has ever had.

Mr. Lawson rose——

Mr. Haynes: I have not finished yet. When will he retire to the plush area of Blaby and insignificance so that we may have somebody in his post who knows what to do?

Mr. Lawson: I am most grateful for the plug that the hon. Gentleman has given my constituency. Blaby is indeed a place well worth visiting and I hope that he will do so. As for the rate of inflation, during the period that I have been Chancellor it has been a good deal lower than for a long time, including under a Labour Government when it was 15·4 per cent. on average and never for one month reached its present level.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that increased productivity helps to keep inflation down? In that respect, does he agree that, since 1980, our productivity has increased by 3 per cent. a year—a far better performance than during the 1970s? Does he agree also that it is important to maintain that improvement for the fight against inflation?

Mr. Lawson: The growth in productivity, especially in manufacturing industry, is extremely welcome and it has a major impact on the country's competitiveness. That is important. On the whole, the economy is doing extremely well. There are two areas of great concern and they are not unconnected. One is the level of unemployment, about which I and all of my hon. and right hon. Friends are anxious — there are measures in the Budget designed to help with that—and the other is the level of real wage increases and wage costs per unit of output, on which we are not doing as well as our competitors.

Mr. Terry Davis: Is there any level of unemployment that is not unacceptable in the pursuit of the target of 3 per cent. inflation?

Mr. Lawson: It is a matter not of what level of unemployment is acceptable or unacceptable, but of what measures are best calculated to bring down the rate of unemployment. This is a problem not just for the United Kingdom but for the whole of western Europe. I am confident that the policies that we are pursuing are best calculated for that purpose.

North Sea Oil and Gas

8. Mr. Flannery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the revenue from (a) North sea oil and (b) North sea gas in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 respectively.

Mr. Hayhoe: Total tax take from North sea oil and gas production was £1·4 billion in 1979 and rose to £10·3 billion in 1984. I shall arrange for a table showing the figure for each year to be printed in the Official Report.

Mr. Flannery: We have just listened to waffle from the Chancellor. Is it not unbelievable that this massive bonus to the Exchequer, which no other country in Europe has had, has been frittered away on unemployment benefit instead of being put to use to rebuild our economy? Is it not unbelievable also that the Government carry on trying to pretend that it is not their monetarist policies that first led us into, and then kept us in, the great difficulty in which we now find ourselves? Why do they not admit that having had this bonus they have failed to use it properly, that there is a downward slide and that there is only one way out of that—another Government?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman should talk such arrant rubbish. That can be proved by looking, for example, at our overseas assets. During the time that oil revenues have been coming in we have reduced our borrowings overseas and built up our assets, in the term of this Government, from £12½ billion to £75 billion. Those are profit-bringing assets, and will bring income to this country for many years and generations ahead.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a danger in overdependence on the revenue from one particular finite source? Would not the taxation policies of the Opposition lead to greater danger?

Mr. Hayhoe: I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend.

Following are the figures:

Total tax take from North Sea oil and gas production

	£ billion
1979	1·4
1980	3·3
1981	5·9
1982	7·0
1983	8·8
1984	10·3

Income Tax (Self-assessment)

9. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to introduce self-assessment for income tax payers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Self-assessment will be among the matters to be discussed in the Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation, along with other possible long-term developments.

Mr. Baker: Is my hon. Friend aware that where there is a proper audit system, as in the United States of America, the system of self-assessment works very well? Is he also aware that the two main advantages are, first, that delays are reduced and, secondly, that administrative and staff costs for the Revenue can be dramatically reduced? Will he examine such a system most carefully?

Mr. Hayhoe: This question will form part of the Green Paper and I hope that there will be widespread public debate on it. Such a system would have some of the effects to which my hon. Friend has referred. He may have seen what Mr. Roscoe Eggar, the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service in the United States, was saying towards the end of last year, when he was arguing that a change to something more like the British system would mean that tax payers would be spared 97 million hours in return preparation and untold amounts in preparation fees. There is a down side, in that extra administrative burdens on individuals would flow from a system of self-assessment. I agree with my hon. Friend that it requires careful consideration to get the overall balance right.

Mr. Barron: Is it not more likely that self-assessment will lead to a growth in the number of accountants in high streets, and is that not a form of privatisation?

Mr. Hayhoe: Self-assessment in the United States has led to a considerable amount of professional advice being sought by the individual taxpayer.

Sir William Clark: Does my hon. Friend agree that as it is essential to have a public debate on the forthcoming Green Paper, it would be a good idea to set up a Select Committee to look into this question and take evidence in public?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has heard that suggestion. That would be a matter for him rather than for me.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Minister agree that there is an equal case for the Secretary of State for Social Services to introduce self-assessment for those receiving supplementary benefit if self-assessment for PAYE taxpayers is introduced?

Mr. Hayhoe: That will not figure in the proposed Green Paper on personal taxation.

Budget (Job Creation)

10. Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many more people he expects will be employed by the end of 1986 as a result of the changes in national insurance contributions announced in his recent Budget.

Mr. Lawson: I expect the changes in national insurance contributions, which will take effect from October, to lead to a significant increase in jobs over the following two years.

Mr. Eggar: Has my right hon. Friend noted that independent forecasters have shown that the changes will bring about an increase in employment by as much as 350,000? Should not this change be widely welcomed by all those who are determined to reduce the unemployment statistics?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the welcome that he has given to these measures. I believe that they have been widely welcomed by both sides of the House, except for a small minority who seek to make party political capital out of them. There have been a number of outside estimates — some of 150,000, some of 160,000 and some higher. Those increases are in addition to the employment created by the expansion of the community programme, which was announced in the Budget, and the proposed development of the youth training scheme. The changes will reduce unemployment over the same period by between 150,000 and 200,000. I am sure that all hon. Members will be pleased to know that during the past two years the number of people in work has risen by well over 600,000. Nothing like that has occurred in any other European country.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Chancellor accept the assessment by Sir John Hoskyns, the Prime Minister's former adviser, that the way in which the Chancellor has introduced these changes will lead to a loss of 10,000 jobs in senior levels of industry?

Mr. Lawson: I shall not sign up on any figure at all. It is clear that, taking the whole of the national insurance contribution changes into account, the net effect will be a significant increase in employment. I am sure that the whole House will welcome that.

Mr. Terry Davis: When will we get real figures for employment based on a count, instead of the Chancellor's estimates?

Mr. Lawson: The figures that are published are the best estimates that the Government are capable of making. Many of my hon. Friends believe that the figures exaggerate the position. Many of them believe that some people in what is known as the black economy are in work but are drawing unemployment benefit and are therefore included in the figures. Nevertheless, we go by the normal published figures.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

11. Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the final outturn figures for the public sector borrowing requirement for 1984-85 to be available.

Mr. Peter Rees: The provisional estimate of the PSBR for 1984-85 of £10·1 billion — equivalent to 3·1 per cent. of GDP—was published on 18 April.

Mr. Yeo: Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that no less than one quarter of the public sector borrowing requirement last year was attributable to the effect of the Scargill coal strike? Does he agree that without that effect interest rates would be substantially lower, thus considerably benefiting all mortgage payers?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend is correct to draw attention to this dimension of our national affairs. The latest and best estimate of the cost of the coal strike is £2·75 billion. That has certainly had an effect on interest rates.

Interest Rates

13. Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for reducing the level of interest rates.

Mr. Lawson: The Government's policy is to maintain monetary conditions that will bring inflation down. Short-term interest rates will be held at the level needed to achieve this. However, my hon. Friend will have noted that in the five weeks since the Budget base rates have fallen by 1½ per cent.

Mr. Latham: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that although short-term interest rates will obviously have been affected by the extraordinary fluctuations in the exchange rates during the past few days and weeks, it is still the Government's general objective, in the interests of industry and employment, to reduce interest rates as much as possible as market conditions permit?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is correct. That is one of the reasons why we have consistently followed a policy of having a low public sector borrowing requirement. This year's PSBR is predicted to be as low as 2 per cent. of GDP. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that any reduction in interest rates must be consistent with what is necessary to maintain downward pressure on inflation.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer take note of the fact that when the pound is low interest rates rise rapidly to a high level, but that when the pound is high they do not come down anything like as rapidly? What can he do to rectify that asymmetry?

Mr. Lawson: There has been a rise in the sterling exchange rate since the Budget, but, as I pointed out a moment ago, in the five weeks since the Budget there has been a fall in short-term bank base rates of 1½ per cent.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the proposals now being trailed by the Labour party in advance of next week's council elections — issuing blank cheques left, left and left — will undoubtedly have the effect of increasing interest rates enormously as a result of the impact that they will have on the public sector borrowing requirement, and that therefore these hollow and spurious promises are a disincentive to employment?

Mr. Flannery: Of course the right hon. Gentleman agrees.

Mr. Lawson: Of course I agree with that, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) said with his usual prescience. It is well known throughout the country that the Labour party is the party of inflation. As if that were not bad enough, inflation invariably means higher interest rates.

Mr. Blair: Is the Chancellor aware that his answers on exchange rate and interest rate policy have all the clarity of a riddle from the delphic oracle? Is he aware, as all parts of industry are saying to him, that what is punishing is the level of interest rates combined with uncertainty and instability in our exchange rate policy? Is it not time that we listened to those in industry who are trying to succeed, rather than to those in government who have patently failed?

Mr. Lawson: The great thing is that there is certainty about the Government's policies. That is what the Opposition do not like. For six years we have consistently stuck to the policies which we said in 1979 we would bring into force. They have succeeded in bringing down inflation and in us having the highest level of output, the highest level of productivity, the highest living standards and the highest level of investment ever.

Medium-term Financial Strategy

14. Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet the Governor of the Bank of England to discuss medium-term financial strategy.

Mr. Lawson: The Governor and I regularly discuss financial developments in the context of the medium-term financial strategy.

Mr. Gould: Is it not now clear that, according to that medium-term financial strategy, the only way to stop inflation rising, as it is now doing, is to maintain monetary and fiscal policy at its currently damaging and tight level, and that the price of that is ever-increasing unemployment? Is the Chancellor, for that reason, prepared to seek an escape from the dilemma created by his policies?

Mr. Lawson: There is every intention of maintaining strict monetary and financial discipline. That has secured a reduction in inflation to the lowest level since the 1960s and the longest period of sustained economic growth since the oil-price explosion of 1973. As for the correctness of those policies, I do not have time to give an economic lecture now, but the hon. Member may be interested to read the recent communiqué issued after the OECD ministerial meeting in Paris a few days ago, which gave unequivocal endorsement from the whole of the industrialised world to policies of the kind which we in this country and many other countries are pursuing. The Labour party alone is out of step.

Mr. Forman: In discussions with the Governor of the Bank of England, has my right hon. Friend considered the possibility of keeping to a constant public debt-output ratio, so as to make more room for tax cuts in the near future?

Mr. Lawson: The debt-income ratio is one of the matters which we consider carefully. One cannot regard it as a unique indicator of the appropriate PSBR. It is one of the factors that we take into account.

VAT (Charities)

15. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had in relation to the impact on the publications of charitable organisations of value added tax on advertisements.

Mr. Hayhoe: The answer is none, Sir.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware that the initial survey by the Charities Act Reform Group suggests that, on the basis of last year's advertising, the cost to charities will be £1·2 million? That may not be a significant sum for the Government, but it is a hugely significant sum for charities. Will he therefore reconsider exempting charities from VAT with regard to advertising in journals?

Mr. Hayhoe: There is not a charge of around £1 million in connection with the question which the hon. Gentleman asked, because he was talking about the impact of value added tax on the publications of charitable organisations—that is, things like church magazines and year books for charities. Anyway, such year books were taxed before the Budget. I rather suspect that the hon. Gentleman got his question all wrong.

Mr. Stern: In the context of my right hon. Friend's recent Budget, is my hon. Friend the Minister aware that, as against the costs which some charities will suffer as a result of the imposition of VAT on advertising, many, albeit often different, charities will greatly benefit from the increased relief to be given for charitable covenants?

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend is right. On the wider question, extending VAT to newspaper and magazine advertising will mean that charity advertising will attract tax of about £1 million, but the help given to charities in the other measures which my right hon. Friend introduced in his Budget will certainly substantially exceed that amount.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 25 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not time that the right hon. Lady came off the fence and said that the British Government will be represented in Moscow for the celebrations there of the 40th anniversary of the end of the war? While she is about it, will she tell the United States President that for him to visit a cemetery in Germany where SS mass murderers are buried is deeply insulting and offensive to the memory of their victims, and is no less insulting and offensive to all those who fought in the last war to destroy Nazi tyranny?

The Prime Minister: We shall probably be represented in Moscow by Her Majesty's ambassador. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's comments about the German cemetery, I am not responsible for the actions of the United States, but I have considerable sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Ian Lloyd: My right hon. Friend will recall that in his much discussed speech on the strategic defence initiative the Foreign Secretary disinterred the significant maxim that political decisions should not be pre-empted by the onward march of technology. Since, when we look back over the past 25 years, we find that so many major decisions, not least on the problem of unemployment, have been pre-empted by technological or scientific advance, which has been underestimated, has not my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made an unanswerable case for the installation of an office of technology assessment here to serve this Parliament in exactly the same way as such an institution serves the Congress of the United States?

The Prime Minister: I did not read my right hon. and learned Friend's speech in quite that way, but I am not sure that such an office would advance our cause very much. My hon. Friend is absolutely right—one cannot stop the march of technology. We have to use it, adapt it and indeed embrace it if we are to keep in the forefront of industry and in the forefront of events.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister tell us precisely why she decided that this morning's Cabinet meeting should not even discuss the proposals by the Secretary of State for Health and Social Services to end the state earnings related pension scheme, to get rid of family income supplement, not to uprate child benefit and to make many other changes which amount to a retrograde step for poor people and, indeed, for many people on average incomes?

The Prime Minister: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will agree that it would be better not to reach conclusions before discussions have taken place, which is what he seems to have done.

Mr. Kinnock: I agree that it is always wise to be cautious in these matters, but, as this review has been taking place for 13 months, is it not the case that next week's county council elections have far more to do with the delay than anything else? If the Prime Minister—as the official statement says—is tying up a few loose ends, around which necks will she tie them?

The Prime Minister: Unlike the Opposition, we discuss before we reach conclusions. Unlike the Opposition, on social security matters we like the details to be worked out before they are made public.

Mr. Maclean: What message will my right hon. Friend give to the ratepayers and electors of Cumbria, where, during the past four years, a Labour-controlled council has squandered its reserves and is threathening a rate increase next year of 70 per cent. to finance its profligate spending?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, Conservative county councils have put up their rates by far less than have Labour county councils, and that is a good message for next Thursday.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Is the Prime Minister aware that the Transport and General Workers Union is the largest union in the country and that its general secretary is one of the most influential people around? As the Leader of the Opposition is a member of that union and is sponsored in the House——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are disscussing the Prime Minister's official engagements for today. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will direct his question to that matter.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: As the national executive committee of the TGWU is today considering whether a re-run of the ballot will be held, will the Prime Minister, during the course of her day, encourage the Leader of the Opposition to break his craven silence on this matter, which is reminiscent of his silence on the miners' dispute, and join us in hoping that the TGWU——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that hon. Members will address themselves to matters for which the Prime Minister is responsible.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I am asking the Prime Minister whether she will today join us in welcoming a re-ballot for the general secretaryship of the TGWU, and asking that it should be run under independent supervision. Does the right hon. Lady agree with that?

The Prime Minister: I am not responsible for many of the things that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The excellent changes in ballot rules, with which I am sure he will agree, come into force this October, under legislation passed by this Government.

Q2. Dr. McDonald asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 25 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Dr. McDonald: How can the Prime Minister expect the service sector to provide jobs when Lord Weinstock has said that there will be nothing for the service sector to service, given that the right hon. Lady's sado-monetarist economic policies have cut manufacturing investment by one-third and output by 9 per cent. since 1979, and created a trade deficit in manufactured goods of more than £3 billion last year? When will she listen to those with more experience in successful business than herself and change her policies?

The Prime Minister: In fact, as distinct from opinion, manufacturing employment has been falling since 1966. Indeed, the shift from manufacturing to service employment has already taken place and is entirely compatible with an expanding economy.

As Lord Weinstock is very well aware, it is possible to have a flourishing manufacturing sector even though it employs fewer people. Indeed, he has occasion to know that the General Electric Company's profits were £670 million last year, despite 15,000 redundancies during the past three years.

There will inevitably be fewer people employed by the current amount of manufacturing. We need a flourishing manufacturing sector, but that is not related specifically to the number or people employed in it, as Lord Weinstock is very well aware.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, despite all the efforts that the Government have made, the poverty trap and the unemployment trap are worse than ever, now embracing nearly half the working population? Will she assure the House that the social security review and subsequent measures will be combined with a taxation review to create an overall co-ordinated system whereby nobody who pays tax receives benefit, and vice versa, to try to ensure that everybody is better off working than not working?

The Prime Minister: I have great sympathy with my hon. Friend's objective that everyone should be better off when working than when not working and receiving supplementary benefit. He will be well aware that that was the purpose of the Budget brought in by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which will raise threshholds by twice the amount warranted by the inflation rate, and reduce the rate of national insurance contributions, particularly for the lower paid.

Mr. Donald Stewart: What action does the Prime Minister intend to take following the criticism in the annual report by the Civil Service Commission of the recruitment of highly paid managers from private industry at a time when the service is rent by dissatisfaction over low pay?

The Prime Minister: The detailed information in the Civil Service annual report shows a reasonably satisfactory picture overall, although there are specific areas of difficulty. That experience is, of course, often shared by other employers. I understand that the 4·9 per cent. pay offer has been accepted by one of the Civil Service unions.

Q3. Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 25 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the widespread concern about the long-term cost of the state earnings related pension scheme? As this scheme brings virtually no benefit to workers on two thirds or less of average earnings, does my right hon. Friend agree that if the Government are to succeed in their aim of ensuring that the social security budget is used to help those in real need the best thing that the Government can do is to terminate the scheme and apply the savings to increase the basic state pension?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, there are problems with any scheme which is run on a pay-as-you-go basis under which the contributions now are used for benefits given now, although many people think that they are accumulated for benefits to be provided later. I shall, of course, take my hon. Friend's views into account when the matter is discussed.

Mr. Ron Lewis: Will the Prime Minister today recall her early upbringing, her Sunday school days and her father's insistence that the fourth commandment should be honoured? Is she, as the Head of the Government, going to besmirch her father's memory by bringing in legislation that will help to consign the sanctity of the Sabbath day to the scrapheap?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate the hon. Member on the ingenuity of his question. That is a matter for the House. The report will be brought before the House for debate and the several matters, including the jobs which would be created by Sunday opening, will be taken into account. I hope that the hon. Gentleman might even think that that is a relevant factor to be taken into account.

Mr. Cormack: May we take it from the Prime Minister's last reply that there will definitely be a free vote when the Government introduce legislation on Sunday trading?

The Prime Minister: That we shall decide nearer the time, but I hope that my hon. Friend will consider the report and all its consequences very carefully.

Mr. James Hamilton: The Prime Minister continually boasts about the success of her monetarist policies. Is she aware that redundancies in two more factories in my constituency have been revealed to me this week? Bearing in mind that revaluation in Scotland and the fact that the increases in rates will cause further closures and redundancies, will she tell the House what she intends to do about the situation, before she tells the Tory party conference in Perth?

The Prime Minister: With regard to further redundancies, especially in manufacturing industry, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that we can continue to increase production with fewer people employed. That is one of the problems of a technological revolution. As for the rate burden, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that part of the increase is due to the very high spending of Labour councils, which are much higher spenders than Conservative councils.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 29 APRIL—Second Reading of the Finance Bill.

TUESDAY 30 APRIL—Second Reading of the Insolvency Bill (Lords).

Consideration of Lords Amendment to the Films Bill.

Consideration of Lords Amendments to the Town and Country Planning (Compensation) Bill.

Remaining stages of the Industrial Development Bill (Lords).

WEDNESDAY 1 MAY—Until about Seven o'clock a debate on a motion to take note of the 25th Report from the Committee of Public Accounts in Session 1983-84 on financial assistance to De Lorean Cars Ltd. and of the Northern Ireland Department of finance and personnel memoranda on that report.

Second Reading of the Coal Industry Bill.

THURSDAY 2 MAY—Remaining stages of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill.

FRIDAY 3 MAY—Private Members' Bills.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman.

The so-called star wars initiative will clearly be mentioned in the foreign affairs debate later today, but does the right hon. Gentleman accept that we still need a full-scale debate in Government time on that specific subject, which is of direct interest both to this country and to our allies?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also continue to bear in mind the need for debates in prime time on the report of the Commission for Racial Equality on race relations in Britain and on the threatened closure of one third of Britain's skillcentres?

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the tragic death of Welsh medical student Phillip Jones, who contracted aplastic anaemia after taking part in drug experiments, emphasises the need for legislation in that area? Do the Government intend to take urgent action and to bring appropriate proposals for legislative change before the House?

Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a debate on the televising of the proceedings of this House as quickly as possible, so that I and many other right hon. and hon. Members will have the chance to vote for the televising of our proceedings as soon as possible?

Mr. Biffen: On the last point, I appreciate that the televising of our proceedings is a matter of general interest in the House and should be the subject of further debate and decision. That would clearly need to be related to the current experiment in another place, and we shall be in touch through the usual channels.

On the tragic death to which the right hon. Gentleman referred in relation to medical experimentation, I shall inquire of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and be in touch in due course.

I note the interest in debates on racial equality and on skillcentres and I suggest that we may be in touch through the usual channels on that.

On the right hon. Gentleman's first point, the subject that he described in shorthand terms as the star wars initiative will certainly be relevant to today's foreign affairs debate, as was made clear in exchanges last week. I recognise his interest in a full-scale debate on the matter, but that will have to be considered through the usual channels.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): In view of the unnecessary, disruptive and somewhat Luddite action taken by several of its employees, can we have an early debate on the future of the Post Office? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, where a monopoly exists, it needs continual justification, and that the House should therefore have the opportunity to decide whether some organisation or organisations would better serve the interest of the public in carrying out our postal deliveries?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a very important point. Obviously, he will have noted from this afternoon's business statement that no provision has been made for a debate upon the topic of the Post Office. However, I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the issue that has been raised.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Is the Leader of the House aware that it is most unreasonable to propose for the business on Wednesday a debate on De Lorean Cars Ltd. when there has been no consultation upon that suggestion with any Northern Ireland Members, and when the Province is concerned in a local election?

Mr. Biffen: I very much regret that the discussions that I would have wished do not appear to have taken place —through misunderstanding, I have no doubt. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will agree that the issues raised by that topic go far wider the the Province itself. None the less, I shall be in touch with the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will it be next week or the week after that my right hon. Friend will be able to enlarge upon the previous semi-assurances that he gave, that the House would debate the multi-fibre arrangement before Ministers announce their negotiating position on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot be as specific as my hon. Friend would wish, but I should like to underline my anxiety that there should be a debate on the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The Leader of the House will be aware of the mounting concern in Yorkshire and other textile areas on the subject that has just been raised by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham). In view of that concern, can the Leader of the House be more specific than he has been and give a definite undertaking that there will be a debate on the multi-fibre arrangement at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Biffen: Certainly, it is my concern that there should be a debate. It is just that I cannot be specific in terms of the time scale that was mentioned.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): In view of the importance of the report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs on Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong, and the implications that it has for the Hong Kong people and Government, for the British Government's immigration policy and, most important of all, for the refugees themselves, will my right hon. Friend give us a promise that at some stage we shall have a debate on that report?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly consider the point that has been raised by my hon. Friend. I do not want to give an encouraging reply now that I shall disavow later. However, that is also a topic that will fall within the ambit of this afternoon's debate.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): When the Leader of the House contacts the Secretary of State for Social Services about the Leader of the Opposition's question on drug trials, will he tell him that the drug company should play no part in those trials, that they should be completely independent, and that volunteers have the right to full information about the drugs in question and all the risks involved?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to the point concerning drug companies that has been made by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Further to the Leader of the Opposition's question about a debate on the televising of Parliament, will my right hon. Friend resist his announced intention of discussing the matter through the usual channels, particularly because it has been well known for many years that the Opposition Chief Whip has been doing his utmost to prevent that eventuality? Will my right hon. Friend keep the Front-Bench fixers out of this and let the will of the House of Commons speak for itself, as we all know that there is a majority for televising now?

Mr. Biffen: I think that the will of the House will be expressed ultimately, and it will do so with total lack of inhibition. I am surprised that my hon. Friend should ever entertain the thought otherwise.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Will the Leader of the House arrange time for a debate on the report of the Services Committee on overcrowding and the lack of facilities for hon. Members and staff?

Mr. Biffen: I shall bear in mind the right hon. Gentleman's request. I cannot give an immediate undertaking, but I know that he has raised an issue which is of real importance to all hon. Members.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): In view of the increasing damage which is being done to the education of pupils throughout the United Kingdom by the teachers' dispute and the increasing inconvenience to their parents, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for an early debate to take place upon the dispute? Will he also arrange an opportunity to discuss the deplorable strike of schoolchildren which is taking place today?

Mr. Biffen: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the schoolchildren's strike is a most bizarre and deplorable episode. He will see from the business that has been announced that no provision has been made for a debate on the subject, but I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science to the point that has just been raised.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): So that the debate on the multi-fibre arrangement can be meaningful, is my right hon. Friend able to make a commitment that the Government will not reach a decision on the matter until the debate has taken place so that the views expressed during the debate can be taken into account?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot make that commitment, but I accept at once the importance of the timing of the debate relative to the negotiating position that is struck within the European Community.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Is the Leader of the House aware that yesterday's meeting of the Select Committee on Scotland to discuss with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities the very important issue of rating and public expenditure began 20 minutes late because not one single Conservative Member of Parliament was present to make a quorum? Will he, as the Leader of the House and the senior Conservative Member in terms of the management of the House, ensure that a letter of apology is sent to the convention? More importantly, will he look at the membership of the Select Committee and ensure that it properly reflects the political make-up of Scotland rather than the political make-up of this House?

Mr. Biffen: Proceedings in Committees are not, I think, matters for which I answer each Thursday afternoon. However, the wider point about the composition of the committee is a matter of long-standing controversy, and I do not believe that anything I say this afternoon will resolve it.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Will my right hon. Friend send a message today to the Ministers who are responsible for negotiating the multi-fibre arrangement that they should no longer delay a debate upon the matter in the House because, if they do, they will be conducting negotiations upon which the House has had no opportunity to express its opinion? The House is becoming very impatient, and I hope that my right hon. Friend and the Ministers will make it possible for us to have a debate next week.

Mr. Biffen: I note at once, and sympathise with, the proposition that the House should have a debate before the ministerial negotiating position is finally resolved.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Has the Leader of the House seen the headline in today's edition of The Standard, "Cabinet in Shambles"? Since it is a Conservative newspaper, it is no doubt an accurate assessment of what happened this morning in Cabinet. As the argument appears to be between the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who wants the social security bill to be slashed by £4,000 million, and the Secretary of State for Social Services, who wants to settle for a cut of £1,000 million, would it not be appropriate for those Ministers to come to the House next week and make a statement defending their posture? In the meantime, will the Leader of the House say which side he falls on?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman and the Tory press make a natural partnership. This matter was dealt with this afternoon in a most authoritative fashion by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I do not feel, therefore, that it would be appropriate for me to add one word to what she said.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): In the light of the report in today's edition of the Daily Express that the puffed up poseurs of the European Assembly are about to grant themselves immunity from arrest, could my right hon. Friend say clearly and unambiguously that it will not happen here?

Mr. Biffen: I have not had the advantage of communing with the Daily Express, so I am in no position to make an authoritative retort. I would not have thought that it came in any sense within my sphere of responsibility, but it sounds to be an excellent story.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): What has the Leader of the House to say to those 4,000 young people who have been led out of Liverpool schools this afternoon by a Member of this House, causing chaos and anarchy in many of the schools in Merseyside and resulting in a great deal of unrest and unnecessary disturbance? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that there is a need for a debate on this important issue and the associated issue of the youth training scheme, about which many young people feel strongly?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that that point was raised by his Social Democratic Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). I cannot add much more in reply to him to the response that I gave to his hon. Friend.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Will my right hon. Friend do his best to ensure that our Polish allies, for whom we originally went to war and who played, among other things, such a distinguished part in the battle of Britain, are not excluded or forgotten during the commemorative service on 8 May? Are we to have a further statement on that subject?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly refer to the relevant Ministers the point that my hon. Friend raises, which I know evokes a powerful echo elsewhere in the Chamber.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Will the Leader of the House consider the article on the front page of Labour Weekly, which says clearly that the Comptroller and Auditor General, Gordon Downey, has clearly accused the Government of increasing rates in authorities around the country by £3,000 million? Will he have a word with the Secretary of State for the Environment who has written to me this afternoon, taking 12 days to do so, denying my local authority a meeting with him, not to negotiate but to discuss the real problems that Sheffield is having because of the Government's rate-capping measures and the problems that that inner city now has, with over 50 per cent. unemployment? I hope that he will prevail upon the Secretary of State to have a meeting, or at least to have the matter discussed in the House of Commons, because it is extremely important, particularly to those rate-capped authorities.

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that it is my role to be marriage broker between the editor of Labour Weekly and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, but I shall draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the points which have just been raised, having the relevance that I know they do to Sheffield.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): In relation to the need to renew the multi-fibre arrangement for knitwear and textiles, can my right hon. Friend assure the House that he is aware that not only will the matter be debated in the EEC by the Council of Ministers next week or the week after, but also that the MFA under which we at present operate will shortly come to an end? Will he tell the House that we will have a debate on this matter so that opinion on both sides of the House can be sounded before our Ministers go to Brussels or wherever?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes in his own way the point that has been made several times this afternoon, the force of which I fully recognise — that the House of Commons should have a chance to debate the multi-fibre arrangement before Ministers take up a negotiating position.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Is the Leader of the House aware that it just is not good enough to tell hon. Members that we shall have a debate on the multi-fibre arrangement after the Government have made a decision on renewals? Is he aware that the Government have already lost 1·8 million jobs in Britain since 1979 and that another 300,000 will be lost if they close down the textile and clothing industries?

Mr. Biffen: The textile industry has gained considerable strength in Britain by the way in which it has been able to obtain joint action across the Floor of the House. The hon. Gentleman's remarks are highly contentious and misleading and they misrepresent what I said. That so, I still recognise the importance of the point that he was trying to make.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): In view of the considerable importance of decisions in education policy, particularly in relation to measures to deal with unemployment, can my right hon. Friend offer us the prospect of an early debate on the Government's excellent White Paper entitled "Better Schools"?

Mr. Biffen: Certainly not in the immediate future, but I shall bear in mind my hon. Friend's point on the importance of that subject.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, while we may differ on the causes, hon. Members on both sides of the House condemn football hooliganism? Many of my hon. Friends believe that it is Right-wing inspired activity based on unemployment, deprivation and hopelessness. Nevertheless, will he join me in condemning the building of electric fences at Chelsea or any other football stadium? Is he aware that that must be the ultimate condemnation of the failure of the Government's law and order policy? Will he, in this less than busy period, find time for a debate on this subject?

Mr. Biffen: That is exactly the type of debate which has much to commend it for the Adjournment. I suggest, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman might care to try his luck in that direction——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I shall try to call all those hon. Members who have been rising up till now. Mr. Galley.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): My right hon. Friend in arranging the business of the House is always sensitive to the needs of the varying nations that make up the United Kingdom. We seem to spend a considerable time dealing with matters relating to Scotland, Wales and Ulster. Will he accept the claims of other parts of the country which regard themselves as nations within the nation — particularly Yorkshire, the premier region of the nation —and arrange a debate in the near future on Yorkshire matters?

Mr. Biffen: It just adds unnecessarily to the contentions of this place if one seeks to assert that Yorkshire is a nation rather than a proud and sometimes successful cricketing county. I am afraid that I can offer no prospect in the immediate future of a debate on regional policy or on Yorkshire in particular, but I shall bear in mind the point that my hon. Friend so eloquently makes.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): In view of the growing disquiet in all parts of the House about the level of hon. Members' expenses and about the employment and conditions of research assistants, will the Leader of the House accept that it is far too long to wait another three years for a debate on the subject? Will he arrange one urgently?

Mr. Biffen: I will bear in mind the point that the hon. Gentleman makes.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): In view of the report of the Select Committee on Social Services on community care for mentally ill and mentally handicapped adults, and the large number of signatories to early-day motion 515, please may we have an urgent debate on the subject?

[That this House, noting the widespread interest in the issue of care for the mentally ill and mentally handicapped in the community following the publication of the report of the Social Services Committee on this matter, calls for an early debate on the recommendations and implications of this report.]

Mr. Biffen: No provision has been made for such a debate in the business that has just been announced. Fairly soon we shall be in the phase of parliamentary life which is dominated by the Committee stage of the Finance Bill, which is taken on the Floor of the House, so I am afraid that I cannot be optimistic about the prospects for such a debate.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The right hon. Gentleman may recall that I recently asked him to use his influence with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Education and Science to show them that the industrial action which the teachers are now taking is qualitatively far more intense than any similar action taken by them on any previous occasion, and that it will be prolonged. Will he ask them to arrange a debate on this important issue so that some new money can be put on the table, separate from any reassessment or restructuring— [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] — so that the immediate wage increase which they need urgently can be given to them? The other issues can then be discussed after that.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has elaborated points of policy which he will not expect me to underline and support from this Dispatch Box. I shall refer his request for a debate to the relevant Ministers.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): In view of the disclosure this week that more than 165,000 tonnes of food, including substantial quantities of high quality beef at 40p per pound, are being sent to the Warsaw pact countries, and in view of the further disclosure that British Ministers do not have a right of veto over the sale of food at even lower prices, does my right hon. Friend agree that we must have a debate soon on the vast amount of British taxpayers' money that is being used to prop up the economies of the Warsaw pact countries?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes that request on the afternoon of a foreign affairs debate. I shall, of course, make the point to the Ministers concerned that perhaps Community subjects should be considered separately from the more general approach to foreign affairs. However, I cannot be optimistic about an early debate, in view of all the other demands that are being made on the time of the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does the Leader of the House recall that during a previous business question time I urged him to call on the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Prime Minister to explain from the Dispatch Box why, in the rescue of Johnson Matthey Bankers, the Government expended £75 million of taxpayers' money and gave tax reliefs to depositors who were taking part in the rescue in the sense that they were offsetting the bad debts of the company? The right hon. Gentleman told me that he would pass my message on, but there has been no response so far either from the Chancellor or the Prime Minister.

We thought that the Leader of the House had some clout in the Cabinet. Today we witnessed the spectacle of the fifth ranking Treasury Minister, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, at Question Time refusing to give an assurance that the report on the matter would be published, although the fraud squad was involved, money was expended and the taxpayers had to bail out the bank in question. Are the Government embarrassed by the charge that they have nationalised a bank, that they have handed tax reliefs to depositors and that, despite squalid dealings in the City, they are not prepared to face the music in the House in the way they should?

Mr. Biffen: I gather that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is not entirely happy with Treasury Ministers' answers. I will refer his discontent to them.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): Is there any reason why the new format agreed by the Services Committee for the presentation of Prime Minister's questions has not already been applied? Every publication of the Order Paper costs the House and the country £1,000. Will the new format be applied as quickly as possible, preferably next week?

Mr. Biffen: I think that my hon. Friend served with me on the Committee that considered the matter; I will look into it.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): May I press the right hon. Gentleman further on the question of a debate on the strategic defence initiative? Given the expressed views of Mr. Richard Perle and General Bernard Rogers, and the apparent differences of emphasis between the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary, is it not unsatisfactory to suggest that that subject could be raised in the course of a general foreign affairs debate? Is it not important that there should be a separate debate in Government time, as quickly as possible, on that crucial defence matter?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman may recollect that last week the question was asked whether or not that topic would be relevant to today's debate. It was confirmed that it would be. If he feels strongly about the subject, and is lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope that he will make his speech during the debate. A request has been made for a separate debate but that must be a matter for discussion through the usual channels.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Bearing in mind the grave state of education in many British prisons and its importance in the rehabilitation of prisoners, may we have an early debate on prison education, preferably within the context of revised and renewed prison rules that would strengthen the position of education.

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the importance of that topic, but I can see no likelihood of an early debate in Government time. My hon. Friend may like to take such chances and opportunities as he has as a private Member.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): As the Leader of the House is aware, the Prime Minister has received the recommendations of the review body on nurses' and midwives' pay. Will there be a statement next week, before the elections? If not, will the right hon. Gentleman use his considerable influence within the Cabinet to ensure that there is no reneging on the implantation of the recommendations of the independent body?

Mr. Biffen: I will certainly draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the points made by the hon. Gentleman both about the timing of any announcement and about its quality.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): In the light of the Prime Minister's flattering comments today about Lord Weinstock of the General Electric Company and in view of the fact that GEC has shed over 1,000 jobs in my constituency in the past two years, should there not be a debate upon Lord Weinstock's stewardship of the company and the future of the engineering industry as a whole?

Mr. Biffen: I have to say that there is no prospect of such a debate in Government time in the near future. As the hon. Gentleman has such a keen constituency interest in the matter, he may care to try such opportunities as are available to him as a private Member.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Leader of the House thinking of ways in which the House could commemorate the anniversary of VE day on 8 May, either in terms of a particular subject for debate or some other event?

Mr. Biffen: No, but I will certainly bear in mind any representations that the hon. Gentleman may make.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why does the Chancellor refuse to answer questions on Johnson Matthey Bankers in person? Why does he always appoint junior Treasury Ministers to do so.

Mr. Aitken: He made the first statement.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to make a statement?

Will the Leader of the House convey a request from hon. Members that, when we table questions, the Chancellor answers them, because there are some people in the City who want to hear what he has to say himself?

Mr. Biffen: I have no reason to believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has dealt with the House in any discourteous fashion in this matter.

Budget Council

3.59 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to report to the House on the outcome of Tuesday's Budget Council in Luxembourg.

After meeting a delegation from the European Parliament, the Council considered the proposals contained in the Commission's letter of amendment No. 3 to the 1985 preliminary draft budget.

An essential feature of the draft budget is its provision for the United Kingdom's 1984 1 billion ecu abatement on the revenue side of the budget. This will take place when the own-resources decision has been ratified by all member states.

On the expenditure side, the Council agreed an additional provision of 1·955 billion ecu for agricultural expenditure. The total figure agreed for agriculture in the 1985 budget is consistent with the Commission's price proposals for 1985.

The Council increased food aid appropriations by 26 million ecu to compensate for changes in world grain prices to ensure the fulfilment of commitments on levels of food aid made at the Dublin European Council in December. In the light of the Brussels European Council's agreement in March, provision of 70 million ecu was entered into the reserve chapter 100 for integrated Mediterranean programmes.

In response to a request from Belgium, the Council agreed in conjunction with the Commission to re-examine estimates of the VAT tax base for 1985 in each member state to verify the accuracy of the existing figures. The results will be reported to the Council in due course.

Consequent on decisions taken by the Budget Council, the total supplementary finance required in 1985 in excess of the Community's own resources is 1·981 billion ecu. This figure is nearly 1 billion ecu lower than that originally requested by the Commission. In accordance with the conclusions of the Foreign Affairs Council on 17-21 March, the Budget Council confirmed that this supplementary finance of 1·981 billion ecu would be made available in the form of non-reimbursable advances through an inter-governmental agreement. I will place a copy of the text in the Library as soon as the definitive version is available.

I made it clear that payment by the United Kingdom under the inter-governmental agreement would be dependent upon the prior approval of Parliament. This is recorded in the text of the agreement. Member states' contributions to the inter-governmental agreement will be related to their VAT rates in the Budget. Based on the estimated United Kingdom 1985 VAT share of 21·34 per cent., the United Kingdom's gross contribution will be some 423 million ecu. This will be partially offset by additional receipts and our remaining net contribution will qualify for the two thirds Fontainebleau abatement.

The Council concluded by establishing a draft budget for 1985 and sent it to the European Parliament.

The agreement provides a realistic basis for the 1985 European budget and is a satisfactory outcome for the United Kingdom. The overall figures for agricultural expenditure and for the inter-governmental agreement were lower than had been sought by other member states, and the net cost to the United Kingdom will, as a result of the Fontainebleau mechanism, be significantly less than the net cost of last year's inter-governmental agreement.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Will the hon. Gentleman admit that he did not very much want to make a statement to the House on this important issue, and that he wrote to one of my hon. Friends saying that these matters would be dealt with by written answer? Will he admit that it was only pressure from the Opposition that ensured a statement on these fundamental issues?

Does he agree that the statement conceals more than it reveals? Is it not clear, for example, that the £630 million rebate which was agreed at Fontainebleau now has strings attached, and that the British and other Parliaments will have to agree to the increase in the VAT ceiling before the rebate is paid? That rebate was not originally subject to linkage of any kind, and repeated statements by the Economic Secretary and other Ministers were made to that effect as late as January this year. Will he admit that, rather than give the anodyne statement that he has made?

As for the non-reimbursable advance of £250 million which is to be paid in 1985, will the Minister give an unconditional guarantee that we shall not have to make further payments such as that this year? When is the matter to be debated? Does he agree that that is not likely to be until the autumn and that we shall not get the rebate until the inter-governmental agreement and the agreement on the VAT ceiling is reached and that Community funds will then be running out? Will he admit that a gun will be held at the heads of Members of Parliament when debating the issue at that stage?

Will he admit that two thirds of the payment will not be returned during the year, but that it will reach us towards the end of 1986? Will he also admit that, although some will be returned, we are still paying £80 million more towards farm spending this year? That is one of the features which the statement conceals.

Is it not clear that the proportion of farm spending in this budget has increased from 67 per cent. in 1984 to 74 per cent. — yet more money going on quite wasteful farm spending — and that that makes nonsense of the claims that farm spending has come under control? Even the Commission's proposals made that clear when it proposed a 3·6 per cent. cut in cereal prices when, in view of last year's cereal harvest, it should have been 5 per cent.

Is it not clear that there is no real intention to curb or control farm spending? Does the Minister agree that the Prime Minister's abject failure at Fontainebleau to guarantee that the principles of budgetary discipline form a legal part of budgetary procedure has now proved disastrous? Does he agree that there is no hope of achieving budgetary discipline without fundamental reform of agricultural policy and that he and the Government have long ago abandoned any attempt to do that?

It is quite clear that the Economic Secretary acquiesced to increased farm spending. Does he agree that his statement is grossly misleading because he initiated cuts in the Commission's proposal for increased food aid? How does he justify that disgraceful contribution in view of the worsening famine in Ethiopia and the Sudan and the fact that 5 million people are now at risk? How can he agree to pay rich farmers more and refuse aid to the starving, for that is what he did when he proposed those cuts?

How can the Government——

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We have a very important debate ahead of us and many hon. Members want to take part in it.

Dr. McDonald: To conclude — how can the Government agree to a budget that contains 74 per cent. spending on agriculture and only 5 per cent. each on the regional and social funds, when there are 15 million unemployed in the European Community as a whole, of whom two fifths are under the age of 25, and of whom one fifth of the overall total are found in the United Kingdom? How can the Economic Secretary justify his acquiescence in such a budget?

Mr. Stewart: I find it difficult to agree with anything that the hon. Lady said in that lengthy question. The Opposition requested an oral statement and I was glad to agree to make it. The suggestion that the British delegation had initiated the so-called cut in food aid is completely wide of the mark. The proposal for the inclusion of such a figure in the agreement of the Budget Council was made on the recommendation of the Presidency, and I was perfectly willing to support the proposal put forward to all member states.

The hon. Lady suggested that part of my statement concealed the real implications of the agreement of the Budget Council, because I had somehow agreed to new strings being attached to the 1 billion ecu rebate for the United Kingdom. That is not the case. It was made clear at Fontainebleau that the arrangements for the United Kingdom abatements would follow the introduction of the new own-resources decision in the Community and that is the position as it remains. All that was discussed and settled at the Budget Council was the mechanics by which this would happen in relation to the draft 1985 budget.

The hon. Lady then spoke about further payments in 1985 under the inter-governmental agreement. A number of member states proposed that the amount in the agreement should be left open-ended, but I made it plain that the United Kingdom could not accept any such proposal and that the Commission would have to find other savings if it found itself in need of money at the end of the year.

The hon. Lady also asked about time for a debate. I remind her that the Budget Council that I attended on Tuesday was the first reading only, and there are several further stages, both in the European Parliament and the Council, before the budget can be adopted. No doubt these matters will be debated when the questions are settled.

She asked about the return of the two thirds Fontainebleau abatement in respect of this year's IGA. It was agreed at Fontainebleau, and it is the only practical method of operating this, that the abatement should affect the VAT payments for the United Kingdom in the following year, so the abatement will apply in 1986.

The hon. Lady concluded by suggesting that the Government had failed in their attempts to introduce new systems of control and discipline in the finances of the Community. I entirely reject that assertion. The need for further expenditure this year is due to the excesses of the past and not to anything that has been decided on the 1985 budget, in respect of which the budget discipline arrangements did not apply.

The hon. Lady says that a fundamental reform is needed. That is what we achieved, and I would have thought that she would support us in what we have done.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): What argument is there for any increase in agricultural expenditure when we already have such obscene surpluses in the Common Market? What effect will this proposal have on protectionist pressures in the United States?

Mr. Stewart: On the second part of the question, the composition of the agreement on price fixing in the Agriculture Council was the most relevant part for competition with the United States. I shall have to ask my right hon. Friend to address his question to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. As to the agricultural surpluses, the difficulties that the European Community has faced during the transitional period between Fontainebleau and the introduction of new own resources, if agreed at the beginning of next year, is that there has been an accumulation of surpluses in intervention because previous price fixing was too high. Undoubtedly, that created pressure on the budget during last year and this. We have been able to maintain a tight restraint on the budgetary expenditure of those years, which has played an important part in discouraging the Commission from putting forward proposals to increase these surpluses in the future.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): What is the timetable for the ratification of the own-resources decision? What is the background to the Belgian request for verification of the accuracy of the VAT tax base? Rather more specifically, which countries wanted a higher inter-governmental agreement and agricultural expenditure?

Mr. Stewart: A number of countries, including Germany, Ireland, France and others with a strong interest in agricultural expenditure, were anxious either to leave open the sum in the IGA or to insert a higher figure. The Belgian request was a technical question about the relationship between estimated figures for the national VAT base during the course of the year and the outturn, because the Belgians felt that their estimates have tended always to overstate the position. It is merely a request to the Council and the Commission to look at this as a pattern to see whether individual member states have such a continuing problem from year to year. The amount of VAT paid by each member state is always adjusted so that the actual figure in due course agrees with the amount paid.

As to the ratification of the own-resources decision, the intention is that that should be achieved before the end of the year, but the actual timing of its implementation will depend upon parliamentary and other procedures in each of the member states.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): My hon. Friend said that the size of this request for moneys depended on the Commission's proposals for agricultural prices being adhered to. What assurance can he give us that the stance taken by the Federal Republic on cereal prices will not affect us adversely, and that we shall not be asked for yet more money later in the year? Where does my hon. Friend believe that the Commission's savings in other areas will come from, to avoid the request for yet more money later in the year?

Mr. Stewart: The implications of the German request about cereal prices are still under discussion in the adjourned Agriculture Council meeting, and it will meet again in a few days' time to take that further. I made it clear both to the Council and to the Commission that the United Kingdom expected that if there was any unexpected overrun on agricultural expenditure beyond the figures that we have been considering, they should deal with that by a number of means that would not require member states to provide more funds during 1985. One of those— [Interruption.] Perhaps I may answer the question. One of those would be by the opportunities for market management within the stock disposal programmes. Another would be by the allocation of underspend, which normally takes place from year to year and is evidenced in the closing months of the year. In the last resort, it may be that if there was a shortage in the last few weeks of the year, it would have to be deferred into 1986. I am not prepared to accept in the Budget Council that the figure is flexible in the light of the decisions of the Agriculture Council.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to protect the other business of the House and I intend to allow questions on this statement to run until half past 4.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Is it not a fact that the treaty of Rome requires the budget for any one year to be within the own resources for that year? In view of the 2 billion ecu non-reimbursable advances under a future international agreement, are not those resources going into the funds for 1986? Does not that fact question the legality of this budget? Does not the budget risk being declared ultra vires?

Mr. Stewart: I would need to ponder the legal questions behind the hon. Gentleman's point. That point certainly does not raise any doubts about the legality of the budget. It has been the normal practice every year for certain year-end adjustments to be made. Indeed, that is the only way in which business can be done. During our discussions on the inter-governmental agreement last year, I explained on a number of occasions that it was not against the treaty for member states to contribute exceptionally finance that could be used for budgetary purposes.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is it not rather insulting to the poor that, at the same time as we are discussing reductions in supplementary benefit for poorer families, the Economic Secretary is reporting that we are agreeing to a 1 billion ecu overspend this year, to a further increase of 25 per cent. in real terms this year and to an increase in the percentage given to agriculture? Does the Economic Secretary not agree that what he has announced as Government policy makes it abundantly clear that we are kidding ourselves if we think that there is a possibility of a reform of CAP?

Mr. Stewart: No, we are not kidding ourselves about that. Both the financial and the agricultural guideline measures that have been agreed will have a profound influence. One of the reasons why Agriculture Councils have proved so difficult is that the Community has had to face up to restraint on agricultural expenditure. I do not know how my hon. Friend gets the figure of a 25 per cent. increase in real terms next year. Even if the 1·4 per cent. ceilings were introduced, it would apply only to the VAT part of the own resources of the Community. Allowing for the United Kingdom's abatement, the average will be below that.

It has been the Government's objective during these negotiations to constrain the growth of agricultural expenditure. That is the whole purpose of the budget discipline arrangements that have been agreed. The funds which have been required during the European budget years 1984 and 1985 reflect the failure and lack of a system of effective budget discipline in the past.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): How much thought did the Council give to the influences that led to increases in world grain prices? How certain can we be that this decision will not lead to similar problems?

Mr. Stewart: Changes in world prices can work in both directions. Increases in world prices narrow the difference in costs between world prices and Community prices, and therefore the costs of intervention disposal. These matters are under continuous review by the Commission. The Commission makes adjustments in the light of changes.

Mr. Marlow: As the Government are rightly jealous of public expenditure, what benefits will the British taxpayer obtain from the expenditure of another £240 million of his money? In the past we have bailed out extravagances. If we bail out extravagances this time, how will we stop them in future? What will be our net contribution? What procedures will be put before the House so that we have an opportunity to stop this lavish and imprudent rake's progress? When will that be done?

Mr. Stewart: I have already said that this is the first stage in the budgetary process. The proceedings were delayed from autumn last year when these matters would normally have been settled. The Government will put proposals in due course when the budget can be adopted and the United Kingdom's abatement is guaranteed. A substantial part of that extra £240 million—about half, although it may be more—comes back to this country automatically through Community policies from which British citizens and taxpayers benefit. Under the Fontainebleau agreement, we shall receive in abatement two thirds of the balance. That will mean that our net contribution in respect of the inter-governmental agreement is likely to be below £40 million. This compares with more than £50 million last year. The inter-governmental agreement total this year is about double last year's, but there will be a smaller net contribution from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Will the Economic Secretary confirm that agricultural spending in the Common Market next year will be able to increase by at least 15 per cent. and will still be within the financial guideline which the Secretary of State negotiated on this country's behalf? Is it not disgraceful that, on top of the increases this year, there could be a further substantial legitimate increase next year too?

Mr. Stewart: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's figures sound correct. To obtain a figure comparing next year's agricultural expenditure with this year's, we must wait until this year's budget is settled. We have not had a budget for next year, but it will have to conform with the agricultural guideline. Under that guideline, agricultural expenditure is related not to the increase in own resources but to the increase in the own-resources base, which will be increased by a smaller figure.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): Is my hon. Friend aware that many will welcome his statement and the fact that long-standing disagreements about resources can be replaced by constructive discussion of the real purposes behind the European Community, the creation of the conditions of prosperity and employment and, above all, the maintenance of democracy and peace?

Mr. Stewart: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for that statement. I believe that many hon. Members will welcome it. I sometimes think that the House spends too much time dwelling on the negative aspects and the problems involved in our membership of the Community and does not recognise that the Community is important to us with respect to a number of our policies.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the Commission originally proposed 65 million units of account to preserve the real value of food aid to Third-world countries? Will the Economic Secretary confirm that he, or one of his colleagues, pressed for the lower figure of 25 million or 26 million units of account? Will the hon. Gentleman explain what the difference means in real terms of food aid, granted that, depending on the dollar exchange rate, it could certainly amount to some 150,000 tonnes of grain which would, therefore, not be available to Third-world countries suffering from drought?

Mr. Stewart: No, I shall not confirm any of those points.

Mr. Holland: I am not surprised.

Mr. Stewart: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to make those assertions, he is perfectly entitled to do so. I have already explained that the figure put forward by the presidency was agreed by all member states, including the United Kingdom, as a realistic amount to meet the price changes that had been occurring. A number of member states, including the United Kingdom, pointed out that the price basis on which the Commission made its original request was not substantiated in any way that would enable the Council to assess its validity. When the figures were put forward, it was the consensus of member states that the figure suggested by the presidency was the proper one.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Instead of my hon. Friend giving his critics a ticking off for concentrating on the negative aspects of the announcement, will he explain what on earth are the positive aspects of the decision to increase agricultural spending in the EC? When the Common Market is spending more than £20 million a day dumping and destroying huge surpluses, how on earth can one think that it is constructive to put still more money into increasing agricultural spending?

Mr. Stewart: Like my hon. Friend, I have the strongest aversion to providing extra money for the accumulation of agricultural surpluses in the EC. It so happens that the finance in the 1985 supplementary provision is mainly in respect of accumulated surpluses from past years. Under the existing arrangements of the Community's finances, those surpluses must be disposed of. A cost is incurred in relation to the disposals. That is a problem from the past, and we are determined that it should be reduced in the future. I do not propose to explain in terms of today's announcement about the inter-governmental agreement that any of that money is designed to encourage the increases of such unnecessary surpluses in the future.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Has the Minister noticed that the leader of the SDP is not using his bully-boy tactics today to get to the Dispatch Box on this question? He was one of the people, amongst others in the SDP and the Liberal party, who clamoured to get Britain into the Common Market without a vote. We now see the result of that. Does the Minister accept that it is a rather strange philosophy for the Government, who say that Britons are not allowed to borrow money to finance jobs, somehow to lend money to the Common Market? They give it £240 million in a credit-card economy system to get back £630 million, if we are lucky. Is it not time that the Government made it plain that if those rules can apply to the Common Market and it can borrow money to survive, British manufacturers and others and the 4 million out of work in Britain should have the same opportunity so that our economy can expand and the unemployed can find work?

Mr. Stewart: I shall not attempt to respond in detail to the hon. Gentleman's comments about financial figures. I shall repeat, in case the hon. Gentleman was not listening, that the net cost of the agreement to the United Kingdom is not £240 million but less than £40 million. He might also recall that the leader of the SDP was a member of the previous Labour Government who achieved nothing in terms of the reform of the Community's financial system. It is disgraceful that the Labour party is now criticising the Government for having brought about necessary reforms in the agricultural and financial arrangements for Europe.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Is my hon. Friend aware of the admiration felt by many people in the House at the patient way that he and other Ministers have negotiated with our colleagues in Europe so that we are beginning to achieve some kind of discipline over expenditure? Did he examine the disbursement side of the budget, in particular in relation to food aid? Many of us are becoming worried that the Commission, although being given authority to spend, is not spending the money and delivering the food to those who need it in accordance with his wishes and those of our country?

Mr. Stewart: I thank my hon. Friend for his generous remarks. It is a matter of concern that food aid provided through the Community should not be unduly delayed. I draw his attention to the remarks that I and a number of other hon. Members made about that subject during the debate on the Court of Auditors' report. We have been successful in having the Court of Auditors' report considered at ministerial level in the Community. That is an important step towards achieving a better administrative system for the implementation of the agreed food aid.

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR MONDAY 13 MAY

Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. Richard Ottaway
Mr. T. H. H. Skeet
Mr. Timothy Wood.

BILL PRESENTED

COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Secretary Walker, supported by Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Peter Rees, Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith, Mr. David Hunt and Mr. Alastair Goodlad presented a Bill to make new provision for grants by the Secretary of State to the National Coal Board in respect of group deficites and further provision with respect to certain grants and payments by the Secretary of State under the Coal Industry Act 1977: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 131.]

Foreign Affairs

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

4.33 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): When I opened the last full day's debate on foreign affairs during the debate on the Address in November, I told the House something of the work that we were doing to secure agreement in a number of important areas.

I am glad today to be able to remind the House that since then we have concluded the agreement with China on the future of Hong Kong; implemented the agreement with Spain and Gibraltar; set in place the measures to reform the European Community agreed at Fontainebleau; and continued to secure for Britain a leading part in the search for stable relations between East and West.

Those are all major achievements. Each is the fruit of careful preparation, and determined pursuit of British interests.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North) rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall not give way. I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's impatience, but he must allow me to develop my speech for a moment or two.

As we dealt with the many grave international problems that confront the world, we held fast to the ideals and values which this country has long cherished: peace, democracy and freedom. We have sought through dialogue and negotiation the common ground on which to build. We have not minimised the differences with countries of different ideologies and outlook, but we have sought to identify the interests that we share with others and to build on those. It is a role that this country is well equipped to play.

At the same time, we have represented British interests worldwide. The recent visit by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to six Asian countries, including five members of the Commonwealth, underlined the importance that we attach to our relations with Asia, and gave powerful support to Britain's commercial interests.

That is the basis upon which we are approaching the many foreign policy questions that hon. Members will wish to discuss today. I shall not try to cover every one of them myself. My hon. Friend the Minister of State will be ready to deal with further points raised during the debate.

Mr. Robert Hughes: I am grateful to the Foreign Secretary for giving way. There is an area of the world that he has not mentioned in which developments are taking place rapidly—Namibia. He may recall that the last time he made a foreign affairs speech I asked him whether he would deal with Namibia. He said that he would refer to it later. When he came to it in his speech he simply said that the issues of Namibia were complex and would have to be dealt with. In view of its importance, we need, expect and demand much more from the Foreign Secretary.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Member should have had the patience to wait until a later stage in my speech, when I shall be ready to deal with Namibia. I encourage myself with the view that my resistance to his first intervention was entirely justified by the later exchange.

[Sir Geoffrey Howe]

As I said in November, the greatest and most important challenge facing the foreign policy-makers of the West is to find a way of establishing stable, peaceful relations with the nations of eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. I have not changed that view. Indeed, I have been strengthened in it.

As the House knows well, this is a year of important anniversaries. On 8 May, in Westminster abbey, we shall mark the conclusion of conflict in Europe and the far east. The week after, I shall join my Austrian, French, American and Soviet colleagues to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the Austrian state treaty. Later in the year we shall mark the 10th anniversary of the Helsinki agreement, and the 40th anniversary of the United Nations.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Sharpeville.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is an anniversary that the hon. Member can celebrate for himself.

The Government approach the anniversaries that I have mentioned as an opportunity to give thanks for 40 years of peace in Europe, to recall the great work of post-war reconstruction and the reconciliation that has been achieved between the peoples of Europe.

When I visited eastern Europe a couple of weeks ago, I was vividly reminded, as must other hon. Members be who go there, just how European those countries are. At all my meetings with the Governments of eastern Europe, both sides have recognised that we belong to different alliances, but we have recognised as well that we are fellow Europeans, with similar cultural traditions and common roots.

That recognition finds expression in the Helsinki final act, and it will find it again in the follow-up meetings taking place this year at Stockholm, Ottawa and Budapest. Whatever our differences—and they are still substantial — we shall continue to emphasise those interests, traditions and values that are common to all the peoples of Europe.

We look to the future in the hope that the present unnatural division between the peoples of Europe will diminish in importance and eventually become a thing of the past.

The United Kingdom has a distinctive part to play here, because we have historic links with all the peoples concerned. In many cases, those links have been tested by the fires of war. That was why for me it was no ordinary experience to stand, as I did a couple of weeks ago, by the grave of Father Popieluszko, mindful of the large Polish community in the United Kingdom, surrounded by a large crowd shouting, "Long live Britain," and to remember that this was the same country for which we went to war in 1939. The Polish word was "Anglia", which can be translated as either "Poland" or "Britain."

In Poland, as in all my meetings in eastern Europe, I underlined the sincerity of the West's search for security at lower levels of armaments. I made plain our commitment to the negotiating process and the pursuit of genuinely balanced and verifiable agreements. Again and again I stressed that NATO is a defensive alliance. I left them in no doubt about our own concerns, but I tried to allay their misgivings about the policies of the West.

I draw two main conclusions from experience of these exchanges. The first is that it is both possible and essential, without compromising British or Western positions, to conduct regular, wide-ranging exchanges with the Governments of the Soviet Union and eastern Europe.

We have made it plain that we shall not hesitate to take firm measures where our national security is concerned. But our continued vigilance in that respect is entirely compatible with our determination to seek better relations with the Soviet Union. To be genuine and lasting, any improvement must be based on consistent and predictable action where the essentials of that relationship are concerned. I hope that a line can now be drawn under recent events and that we can devote our energies to the key international questions confronting our two countries.

My second conclusion is that if we are to be true to ourselves—and true to the spirit of Helsinki—we must make plain our concern about the inadequacy of the performance of those countries on human rights and human contacts. The human spirit cannot for ever be shackled by censorship, by frontier posts or by walls. For that reason, I made sure that in my visits to eastern Europe I met a wide range of people—and I am sure that in doing so I had the support of the whole House.

We must face the fact that the search for mutual security for East and West is bound to be a long haul. We shall need patience and tenacity, but it is the goal to which this Government are firmly committed.

A key element in the search for improved relations is arms control. This Government will remain loyal to their principles and to their allies. Our strategy is built on firm foundations: resolute commitment to the defence of British interests, if they are threatened; respect for treaty obligations; and the rigorous pursuit of security at a lower level of arms.

That is why we welcomed most warmly the resumption of the arms control negotiations at Geneva. We attach the utmost importance to those negotiations and strongly endorse their key objectives—ending the arms race on earth and preventing one in space.

In all my talks in eastern Europe I was reminded of Mr. Gorbachev's recent statement about the Soviet Union's intention to freeze deployments of intermediate nuclear weapons. In all of them I pointed out that that proposal is not new.

At the same time, I stressed the fact that the Soviet Union has now deployed 414 SS20 launchers, each with three warheads. NATO, by contrast, has deployed less than one third of that number of single-headed cruise and Pershing missiles.

On that basis, Mr. Gorbachev's proposal was essentially a restatement of previous positions. It would perpetuate the present imbalance in the Soviet Union's favour.

That is why the latest Soviet proposal falls short of what is needed. When Mr. Gorbachev was in Britain before Christmas, the Prime Minister and I made it clear to him that attempts to drive wedges between the Allies are, and will remain, futile. We made it equally clear that it was no part of our purpose to divide their alliance. Neither side looks at the other through rose-tinted spectacles, but both sides should recognise their shared interest in maintaining peace and security at lower levels of armaments. That is why we were glad to receive Mr. Gorbachev in this country and to have wide-ranging talks with him.

We must continue to encourage the Soviet Union to perceive the mutual advantage in serious and constructive negotiations: negotiations at the conference table, not at the press conference; negotiations conducted for real, and not for show. I am sure that the whole House would want me to reaffirm that a serious, businesslike approach by the Soviet Union to the Geneva talks would be welcomed and reciprocated by the Western Alliance.

On the general question of nuclear weapons, about which I have been saying a few words, the issues are undoubtedly complex but to some extent they are already familiar. When we turn, however, to the prevention of an arms race in space—the second element at Geneva—the issues are not only complex, but present new problems. That is why we must take care to see them in the correct perspective.

One point that immediately stands out, but is often overlooked, is the extent of the wide-ranging space research programme which has been conducted over many years by the Soviet Union. In view of the considerable scale of these efforts, I find it hard to understand how the Russians can realistically argue for a unilateral ban on United States research, which is rightly designed to respond to their own.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Of course we acknowledge that both the Soviet Union and the United States have done a great deal of work on anti-satellite weapons. However, before the Foreign Secretary leaves the so-called strategic defence initiative, surely he will acknowledge that we are talking about a massive new technological development—an escalation of the arms race quite different from the anti-satellite weapons which the Soviet Union and the United States have at present.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That, once again, encourages me in my resistance to further interventions. Before I leave the strategic defence initiative I shall certainly have something to say about that.

It is against the background of the massive Soviet research that the Prime Minister and President Reagan agreed at Camp David last December on the four crucial points which are the foundation of Her Majesty's Government's position—first, that the United States and Western aim is not to achieve superiority but to maintain balance, taking account of Soviet developments; secondly that deployment of active defences would, in view of treaty obligations, have to be a matter for negotiation; thirdly, that the overall aim is to enhance, not undercut, deterrence; and, finally, that East-West negotiation should aim to achieve security with reduced levels of offensive systems on both sides.

It is on that understanding that we give our full support to current United States research into strategic defences. Given the long-established and comprehensive programme of Soviet research, we cannot afford to concede to them a potential monopoly in this area. Moreover, current treaty obligations specifically allow for these efforts on both sides to continue; indeed, it is difficult to see how any verifiable agreement about constraints on research could be achieved.

But, while research continues, it is clearly recognised on both sides of the Atlantic that any steps towards deployment must be a matter for the most careful consideration. The Prime Minister made that point in her historic address to the United States Congress on 20 February, when she emphasised that,

"should research on either side lead to the possible deployment of new ballistic missile defence systems, that would of course be a matter for negotiation under the ABM Treaty."

There is another crucial point to bear in mind when we consider developments in this area. This was made by President Reagan himself in the speech in April 1983 which originally launched the strategic defence initiative —that it will take many years of effort on many fronts before clear results will be achieved.

During the years when that research is taking place we shall all need to consider the impact that possible moves in the direction signposted by the concept of strategic defence might have on a number of strategic concepts. Those matters are already the subject of widespread and continuing discussion and debate on both sides of the Atlantic.

Already on a number of points a consensus is beginning to emerge. That was made clear in the important speech made by Secretary Shultz in Austin, Texas, on 28 March. I draw attention to some of his principal conclusions: first, that for years to come we shall have to continue to base deterrence on the ultimate threat of nuclear retaliation; secondly, that any contribution by defences must be orderly, predictable and stabilising in its effect; thirdly, that any future decision to deploy defences that were not permitted by treaty would have to be a matter for negotiation.

Many of these questions were considered again earlier this week at the ministerial meeting of the Western European Union, which I attended with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Before my right hon. and learned Friend leaves the question of star wars, can he tell us whether members of the United States Congress have had displayed to them very much more detailed information about Russian research into strategic defensive initiatives? I believe that that information is also in my right hon. and learned Friend's possession. It would help the debate in this House and in the country if he would illustrate, so that our countrymen could understand the issue, the extent to which the Russians have been engaging in that sort of research, and even in experimentation related to it.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising an important point. A publication that deals with the issue in substantial detail has been made available to the United States Congress. I think that it is also available in this country. I shall ensure that more is done to draw attention to it.

As I said, these questions were discussed at the WEU meeting. There was general agreement that the Camp David four points provide a good basis for future Western policy.

We considered also the invitation that each of the countries represented had received from the United States Government to participate in the SDI research programme. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the United States Congress on 20 February, we do indeed hope that British scientists can share in this work.

That was also the response of most, if not all, of the WEU Ministers at our meeting in Bonn. But they all attached importance as well to the need to sustain and improve the technological capacity of Europe as a whole. On that basis, Ministers agreed, in the words of Tuesday's communiqué,

"to continue their collective consideration in order to achieve as far as possible a co-ordinated reaction to the invitation of the United States."

[Sir Geoffrey Howe]

Obviously, there will be practical questions to resolve and practical arrangements to be made. Only detailed study can provide the answers. But the Government intend to respond soon, and to respond positively.

It is in exactly the same spirit that we have sought to mark out and follow a course for the future of the European Community.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): In the debate on the Queen's Speech, to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred, he said that he was looking forward to a visit to Great Britain in 1985 from Mr. Gromyko. Is that still the position?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Yes. The dates for the visit have been under discussion for some time, but have not yet been agreed. As I told the House earlier this week, I shall be attending at Vienna on the occasion of the Austrian state treaty, together with the other Foreign Ministers that I mentioned, and there will be an opportunity to meet Mr. Gromyko.

I come now to the European Community. The last few months have confirmed our judgment that the Fontainebleau agreement did reflect and will promote an important basic change of attitude towards the Community.

The Community has achieved a lasting settlement of the budget problem. The agreement on budget discipline, finalised in Dublin last year, was a further important step in the right direction.

Last year's price fixing brought about a reduction in prices in real terms in every member state. It included an agreement on guarantee thresholds for all products in surplus. It instituted the milk quota scheme, which has led to a production cut throughout the Community. Those measures inevitably cause hardship for farmers, but we have to take the necessary steps to secure a better balance between supply and demand.

Of course, those reforms will need to be carried forward into the years ahead. That will require persistence and determination, but we are now firmly on the right road. What was once considered heresy—that prices could not be allowed to go on rising inexorably year after year—is now widely accepted in Europe as sensible orthodoxy. While the Opposition remain undecided whether or not to participate in the Community, this Government have been securing real and practical changes in Europe in line with British interests.

We should also mark another success for Europe. After years of difficult and complex negotiations, Spain and Portugal are now on course to join the Community on 1 January 1986. That achievement will consolidate and broaden the base of democracy in Europe.

Meanwhile, if the Community is to sustain and promote democracy, its policies must be seen to improve the daily lives of its citizens. We are tackling that challenge in three ways.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the Community is no longer a European economic community, but a political community? Perhaps at this stage it would be appropriate if he outlined the cost to this country of Spain and Portugal joining the Community. Can we afford it?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think that my hon. Friend will have an opportunity to raise those points during the course of the debate. He was certainly wrong on his first point, and his second point would require a long answer.

As I said, we are tackling the challenge in three ways. The first is through measures of the kind proposed by the People's Europe Committee—for example, for cheap and easy travel, common recognition of everything from professional qualifications to driving licences. We are on course to make open frontiers a reality within the Twelve.

The second is through the streamlining of the Community's institutions. Our purpose is to strengthen European unity and to improve the efficiency of our decision-making procedures, on which the Dooge Committee has just reported.

The third approach is through the new action programme drawn up by the European Council last month. That programme has put the creation of wealth and of employment, through the promotion of enterprise, at the very top of the Community's agenda.

Its specific objectives are to encourage the creation of smaller enterprises by cutting red tape—a proposal put before the Council by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister — to increase the efficiency of the labour market; and to strengthen the Community's technological base and the competitiveness of its industry—in short to achieve a real common market by 1992.

All those policies stand for economic growth; all those policies stand for more jobs. In the promotion of all those policies, the United Kingdom is playing a positive, and indeed the leading, role.

Let me turn now to some other areas in which this country has a real interest. Like many other hon. Members, I have had the grave problems of Africa very much in mind during recent months.

We shall continue our efforts to help the Nigerian Government to grapple with the economic problems that they inherited. Our traditionally friendly relations have, of course, been strained by the Dikko affair. I have emphasised to the Nigerian Government that our approach has to be determined by legal, not political, requirements. A further difficulty is the detention of some British citizens in unsatisfactory conditions. We are continuing to press for that situation to be remedied. We attach the utmost importance to the re-establishment of good relations with Nigeria, and we believe that the Nigerian Government share our desire to get back on course.

In South Africa, the evil of apartheid has been underlined yet again by the tragic events at Uitenhage on 21 March and the escalation of civil unrest that has ensued. Those events reinforce the need for the South African Goverment to promote discussions with the black community to tackle the fundamental problems of black political rights. Without such a policy, no lasting solution can be achieved.

We have made very clear our view of the Uitenhage incident, most recently when I saw the South African ambassador this morning. We believe with equal conviction that it is right to keep up the dialogue with the South African authorities. We cannot expect to influence the South Africans if we choose to ostracise them. That is an approach which I am confident reflects the views of a wide spread of British opinion.

Despite the continuing bitterness and strife in South Africa, there have been some promising developments in recent months. Many of them were foreshadowed in President Botha's significant speech on 25 January—for example, the suspension of forced removals, the extension of property rights to blacks in the Cape area, and the acceptance of a black township at Crossroads. Most recently we have seen action to repeal the Mixed Marriages Act.

The effect of those actions should not be exaggerated, but when seen in historical perspective they do have real significance. They suggest that a change in attitudes—a necessary precursor to political change—may be taking place.

Let no one doubt that we wish to see the major changes necessary to dismantle apartheid. But we reject policies that are calculated only to increase chaos and violence in South Africa. We must continue patiently and persistently to encourage the South African Government further down the road to reform. That is the only way to long-term peace and prosperity in the region.

Peace in the region, of course, also requires a solution to the Namibian problem. I was able to discuss this in depth earlier this year with the Heads of Government in Zimbabwe, Zambia and Kenya. The interim administation for Namibia, announced on 18 April, can be no substitute for internationally recognised independence on the basis of free and fair elections. That is what is provided for in United Nations Security Council resolution 435, to which all parties remain committed. We shall continue to press for its implementation and give our full support to the negotiations now being conducted by the United States.

I also discussed with the same African leaders the tragic famine in Africa. As the House clearly appreciated in the excellent debate four weeks ago, the Government have done much to combat this, particularly in Ethiopia, by direct relief assistance, by support for the voluntary agencies, and through the actions of the Community. In the financial year 1984-85, we committed over £100 million to drought-related aid—a fourfold increase on the previous year. But that is not a long-term solution.

Changes need to be made in the internal pricing and marketing policies of the countries affected. More resources and research should be invested in agriculture. We are ready to help in the most effective way. But a large part of the responsibility rests, as it must, with the Governments concerned.

That is true also for the relief of debt. The debt burden remains a major problem for many countries in sub-Saharan Africa. It is one that affects many other countries throughout the world. Some have made considerable progress in the adjustments that are necessary if sustained growth is to be resumed. But, once again, they cannot tackle the problems by themselves.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): On the question of debt, we look forward with interest to what the Foreign Secretary may later propose. On EC food aid and the cuts in such food aid programmes, I do not know whether the Foreign Secretary was in the House when his hon. Friend the Economic Secretary replied to points made from this side of the House, and said that the issue seemed to depend on the exchange rate. Will he make a statement later on whether or not there has been a cut of some 40 million ecu in the aid programme?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I was in the House during that exchange. I do not think that it is for me in my present occuption to add to the precision of a Treasury Minister's answer. That may be dealt with by my hon. Friend the Minister of State when he is replying to the debate. He will bring to it a degree of wisdom, covering all Departments, which befits his Scottish ancestry.

The economic summit in Bonn next week will be an important opportunity for the major industrial countries to develop their co-ordinated approach to these problems. Despite the improved growth rates of the past 12 months, there are a number of uncertainties, particularly over the pace of growth of the American economy. That makes a decisive reduction in the United States budget deficit even more urgent that before. As Secretary Shultz observed in his recent speech at Princeton, the current United States deficits are simply not sustainable indefinitely. The world's largest economy is also the world's largest net importer of capital. That casts a shadow over economic recovery around the world.

However, it is not only the United States that needs to take action. There are practical steps open to each participant at the Bonn summit which would make a real difference. Certainly the United States must tackle its deficits, but we in Europe must push ahead with liberalisation by removing the many rigidities that hinder the creation of new jobs, and Japan must match the other Western economies by opening its markets and financial system in a way that it has not done so far.

Above all, we need to strengthen the will of all participants to resist protectionism. We need to preserve the benefits of the open trading system for developed and developing countries alike. A new trade round will be important in ensuring that, as far as possible, those who enjoy the benefits of full GATT membership should also share the obligations by opening their markets.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that it is not just a question of Japan opening its markets, as he has rightly emphasised, but that, as Japan now produces one tenth of the entire output of the industrial nations, its contribution to the defence of the free world is still grotesquely inadequate? Is it not also a question of pressing the Japanese Government to realise that their co-operation in stabilising the entire world trading system involves making a substantially greater contribution to defence?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My right hon. Friend has brought the attention of the House to a point that is obviously important. The pattern of Japanese economic activity also has an effect on the nature and spread of Japanese research and development activities. We should notice, however, that since the Williamsburg summit the Japanese Government, under the leadership of Mr. Nakasone, have been drawing their country into taking fuller responsibility for wider world questions. It is right that my right hon. Friend should emphasise that that he has still some way to go.

We shall be discussing those issues at the meeting of Commonwealth Heads of Government this autumn. That will provide a valuable opportunity to consider together the problems facing industrialised and developing countries and to do it in what has always struck me as an atmosphere of frankness and informality which it is not possible to achieve in any international gathering, except one held under the auspices of the Commonwealth.

There, too, we shall hear a report from the Commonwealth working group on Cyprus. We were, of course, disappointed that the meeting between President Kyprianou and Mr. Denktash in January ended without agreement. But we welcome the United Nations Secretary General's intention to bring the two sides together again. We shall maintain our support for his untiring efforts to achieve a settlement.

In the middle east, we are still no nearer a settlement of the conflict in the Gulf. We shall continue to support any initiative which offers hope for an end to that long and tragic war. Here, too, we have given our firm support to the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to bridge the gap between the two sides.

The House will, I am sure, share my equal concern at the continuing violence in Lebanon, particularly the cycle of retaliation and counter-retaliation in the south. If that tragic country is to regain its independence and prosperity, there must be an early and complete withdrawal of all foreign forces, in agreement with the Lebanese Government. National reconciliation must be pursued with renewed vigour. We shall continue to do all that we can to assist. In particular, we will maintain our support for UNIFIL, which can and should play a larger role in restoring peace and security.

There are more encouraging developments in the search for an Arab-Israel peace settlement. King Hussein's courageous efforts to secure a joint approach with the PLO to peace negotiations, and President Mubarak's proposals, are welcome steps.

We must make the most of this chance to move forward towards the negotiation of a lasting peace. We are glad that President Reagan has agreed that the United States should renew efforts to that end, and that Ambassador Murphy is at present in the region exploring ways of moving towards direct Arab-Israel talks. That is the right approach, as the Prime Minister and I pointed out in our talks in Washington. In the continuing series of meetings which we have had with leaders in the area, we have given, and will continue to give, every possible encouragement to this process.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is it the intention of my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) to meet any members of the PLO while he is in Tunisia?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There are no plans for a meeting of that kind.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton) rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I must get on, if my hon. Friend will forgive me.

In central America, too, the search for peace and stability must be pursued with urgency. We share the concern of many central and Latin American states at the build up of arms and troops in Nicaragua. That is why, with our Community partners, we strongly support the Contadora initiative which offers the best prospect for a settlement. We take every opportunity to emphasise our view that the situation requires the utmost restraint on all sides. The aim must be to find practical steps to strengthen peace, democracy and development in the region.

We warmly welcomed the restoration of democracy in Brazil. The whole House will wish to join me in sending our sympathy to the Government and people of Brazil at the death of the President-elect, Mr. Tancredo Neves. We wish the new president, Mr. Sarney, well and look forward to working closely with him.

We have made plain on many occasions our support for democracy in Argentina. The development of more normal relations between Britain and Argentina is entirely consistent with our firm commitments to the Falkland Islanders. But it requires a constructive response on the part of Argentina. I regret to have to tell the House that, despite all our efforts, that has not yet been forthcoming.

Finally, the House will recall that, following the tragic events outside the Libyan People's Bureau a year ago, I instituted a full review of the Vienna convention, its operation and enforceability. I indicated then that I would welcome the views of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Select Committee reported in January, and the outcome of the Government's review was published two days ago. I know that the whole House will join me in expressing gratitude for the valuable work done by the Select Committee, under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), and I am glad to say that the Government have been able to accept all the Committee's main recommendations.

We are applying the Vienna convention more firmly. Stricter standards are being enforced—in particular, on the size of diplomatic missions, notification of new staff, use of diplomatic premises, handling of diplomatic bags, breaches of criminal law and illegal parking. Heads of diplomatic missions in London have been left in no doubt about the Government's resolve to deal with abuse of diplomatic immunity. We have made it clear that the small minority of diplomats who seriously abuse their immunity —especially for purposes connected with terrorism—are not acceptable in this country.

I have tried to set out the Government's achievements in foreign affairs and to outline our plans for the future.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think that I must bring my remarks to a conclusion now, if my hon. Friend will forgive me.

Britain is playing a central role in developing closer links between East and West, and securing lasting peace in Europe. Britain is playing a central role in charting the next phase of the European Community. Britain is playing a full part in the search for solutions to the other major international problems. Britain has set an example by the agreements that we have secured in relation to Hong Kong and Gibraltar.

We can be proud of that record. We have reached the targets that we set ourselves last year and we have shown that this Conservative Government's policies are achieving success in upholding and promoting Britain's interests around the world.

5.12 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East): First, I thank the Government for arranging this debate, which comes at an exceptionally critical moment in world affairs.

The first round of the disarmament talks in Geneva has just broken up without any genuine negotiations having taken place, although I understand that there was a certain exchange of views. The prospect for a radical improvement in East-West relations opened up by Mr.

Gorbachev's assumption of leadership in Moscow remains as cloudy as ever. I am bound to say, however, that I agree with the Prime Minister, who expressed the view that she should do business with that man, and I strongly support the Foreign Secretary's reported view that the arrival of Mr. Gorbachev opens a new phase in Soviet foreign policy.

At the same time, there have been a series of meetings about the world economy in OECD and the International Monetary Fund which have failed to reach agreement on any of the fundamental issues now troubling the world —exchange rate instability, the debt crisis, protectionism and, above all, unemployment. Those economic discussions were distinguished mainly by slanging matches between the United States and Europe, in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer probably played the most prominent role.

The Foreign Secretary knows as well as I do, as an ex-Chancellor—this view is strongly shared by Mr. Schultz in the United States, who himself held similar responsibility — that if something goes wrong in the world economy it is bound to have the most far-reaching effects on international diplomacy and, indeed, security. After all, it was the slump of the 1930s that produced Hitler and the second world war. East-West relations and what is happening in the world economy should be the central issues in next week's summit meeting in Bonn, which may be the last chance to avert catastrophe in the world economy, so I shall concentrate mainly on those two issues.

The Foreign Secretary made a wide-ranging speech in which he covered everything from the nuclear holocaust until he reached his crescendo on illegal parking. Nevertheless, he rightly left some important issues— including one of the most difficult—to his hon. Friend the Minister of State. I was glad to note that there was a certain amount of traffic between the Front Bench and the civil servants' Box immediately following the handing over of that poisoned chalice. I, too, shall be asking my hon. Friend who is to wind up to deal with some of the major regional problems. I wish to comment briefly on just three of them.

In central America, the United States Administration have for some years been attempting to force a change of Government in Nicaragua by supporting terrorists who were originally followers of the deposed dictator Somoza, by covertly building a military base in neighbouring Honduras, where massive military exercises have been carried out for more than two years, by vetoing economic assistance to Nicaragua and even, as we learn from the President's latest missive to Congress, by threatening direct military action against Nicaragua if all else fails.

We are deeply ashamed that the British Government have done nothing to dissuade the United States Administration from that course but have simply echoed all the propaganda emitted by the White House. There was a further example of that at Question Time yesterday. I hope that the refusal of the United States Congress to continue support for the Contras will embolden the British Government to join the rest of Europe in pressing the United States to abandon the attempt to terrorise the Nicaraguan Government into changes of policy or indeed to overthrow that Government, and instead to put all its weight behind the Contadora process. A negotiated settlement through the Contadora process would be as much in the interests of the United States as in the interests of Nicaragua and the West as a whole. I believe that the Nicaraguan Government's latest proposals, transmitted to the United States by two visiting senators, offer at least a starting point for such a process.

I should like the Minister of State to reply to one special point. I hope that there is now no question of going ahead with plans for training troops from El Salvador in Britain. The Minister must bear in mind that the Atlacatl battalion, which was trained by the United States, has been responsible for appalling atrocities in the civil war in El Salvador. I am sure that no one in Britain would wish our country to be implicated in that way.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): As there has now been a second election in El Salvador and a moderate Government have been elected, whom we should broadly support, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that if we can help President Duarte in his fight against both extreme Right and extreme Left terrorism by training his forces that can only be in the interests of this country and of El Salvador?

Mr. Healey: I do not believe that assistance in training the El Salvador army would be in the interests of President Duarte. As I have said, the battalion trained by the United States has been responsible for the most appalling atrocities. I welcome the unexpected victory of President Duarte, but the important thing now is not to increase the military confrontation in that unhappy country and to give all possible support to attempts by the Contadora countries, especially Mexico, to achieve a peaceful settlement. There are already signs that commanders of the guerrilla forces are waiting for the opportunity to take up such negotiations.

With regard to South Africa, the Foreign Secretary was right to say that the whole world was appalled at the recent massacre at Uitenhage in which 19 people were killed without having offered any provocation and most of them were shot in the back.

The Foreign Secretary scarcely mentioned the fact that President Botha had given a slap in the face to United States and European members of the Contact Group, including Britain, by establishing a puppet Government in Namibia, contrary to United Nations resolution No. 435 and in the face of the most explicit warnings from Secretary Shultz. I hope that the Minister of State will tell us what action the Government will take in view of those offensive and damaging actions by the South African Government over Namibia.

I believe that the time has now come to exert direct economic pressure on the South African Government. The nonaligned Governments are right in saying that the best answer would be general mandatory sanctions through the United Nations. However, that is unlikely to be agreed. Therefore, we must consider what individual countries can do on their own. There is no question in my mind that the best possible action that we could take would be to follow the example set by many American banks of international standing and ban further loans and investment in South Africa until the South African Government change their policies. There are now 15 resolutions on that matter in front of the American Congress. Some are bound to be passed. I hope very much that Her Majesty's Government will, at last, join that movement.

The arguments that the Government have put so far against a ban on loans and investment in South Africa are, first, that it is a mistake ever to use sanctions to achieve changes in the internal situation in another country—yet the Foreign Secretary has just taken credit for supporting the Solidarity movement in Poland. He will recall that this Government, along with the American Government and many others, imposed economic sanctions on Poland entirely and exclusively for the purpose of securing changes in the Polish internal situation.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): The right hon. Gentleman now seems to be pursuing the road of mandatory sanctions, which he has suggested before. If he is so keen on them now, why was he not when he and his party were in office? The Labour Government refused to put economic sanctions on South Africa. Why is there now this sudden change of heart?

Mr. Healey: Because the situation in South Africa has become much more serious since that time. The South African Government, since then, have violated their clear undertakings to help the process for giving independence to Namibia under article 435. This point is often ignored by Conservative Members. The development of economic pressure on South Africa is undoubtedly one of the factors that has produced changes in what has come to be called petty apartheid in recent weeks on the part of the South African Government. It was one of the objectives of the American movement in favour of banning loans and investment in South Africa and, contrary to what we were told by the Foreign Secretary, it has not produced a reaction in the opposite direction. On the other hand, it appears to have accelerated the movement towards dismantling some of the fouler aspects of apartheid.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I should like to refer to Namibia. In case the right hon. Gentleman has misled the House, will he confirm that Moses Katjiuonga, who happens to be the president of SWANU — an organisation that existed even before SWAPO, and a member of the multi-party conference — has clearly stated that the multi-party conference in no way undermines United Nations Security Council resolution 435, and he and his party will form only part of an interim Government who will in no way undermine the future implementation of United Nations Security Council resolution 435?

Mr. Healey: All that I can say to the hon. Gentleman is, in the immortal words of Mandy Rice-Davies, "He would say that, wouldn't he?" What else would he be expected to say? He would say that because he does not want to incur action by the United Nations against steps that are in fact undermining progress towards independence for Namibia and are in direct contradiction of the courses urged by the American Secretary of State, among others, in recent weeks.

The third regional issue to which I shall refer is the appalling tragedy of the famine that is still sweeping the whole of middle Africa from the Atlantic to the Red sea. I hope that the Minister of State will explain why, in that situation, the United Kingdom Government are cutting aid in real terms by about 3 per cent. this year and why we agreed at the Common Market meeting this week to cut the Commissioners' request of 40 million extra ecu in food aid to 26 million, and did so just at the moment when the Commission is planning another great fire sale of 380,000 tonnes of Common Market butter to the Soviet Union at only one fifth of the price that is paid by housewives in Britain. I think that the House and the country would like an answer to those questions.

I should like to make a further point in that area. Several distinguished service officers who took part in the last world war and many who are serving at this time have supported a call by the International Peace Academy to use the anniversary of VE day for a declaration by all the belligerent Governments in favour of common action against natural disasters such as began to take place in Ethiopia last year. That would be an excellent initiative. It would be difficult for any Government to refuse such an invitation. I hope that Her Majesty's Government will reconsider their rejection of that idea and that the Minister of State will be able to say something about it when he winds up.

I shall now refer to the major issues. First, I shall make a short comment on the crisis in the financial markets, which could weaken Western unity far more deeply than any efforts by the most cunning Communist. I think that the Foreign Secretary will agree that the volatility in exchange rates in the past few years, created by the colossal cloud of funds that is slopping around the international markets, is profoundly damaging to the stability of the Western economy and, indeed, its financial system.

The best estimate that I have heard of the size of those flows is between $30,000 billion and $50,000 billion last year as against only $2,000 billion to finance the whole of world trade in goods and services. Those capital flows are creating havoc on foreign exchange markets. Foreign exchanges rates are bobbing up and down like a yo-yo. We have seen dramatic examples of that with sterling in the past few weeks. Exchange rates determine the flows of trade. Those oscillations encourage protectionism in all the countries concerned. Exchange rates determine the rate of inflation. They often determine interest rates and, through interest rates, they influence growth. I hope very much that that matter will be addressed at the summit next week, because if it is not addressed this time, it is unlikely that any effective action will be taken for at least another 12 months.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): In the light of what has happened, does not the right hon. Gentleman regret the thoroughly unconstructive and negative attitude taken by the Government for whom he was Chancellor of the Exchequer towards the creation of the European monetary system?

Mr. Healey: That is an issue on which I hesitate to admit that I agree with the views of the present Government. A purely regional system cannot have more than the most marginal effect on the oscillation in world exchange rates that we have recently seen. The hon. Gentleman should know that the deutschmark, which is a member of the EMS, has been as severely affected as the pound sterling by the recent chaos on the foreign exchange markets.

The other economic matter that I must say a word about was referred to by the Foreign Secretary. It is the debt crisis. If the debt crisis explodes, it will threaten financial markets, the fragility of which has already been demonstrated by the collapse of major institutions in the United States, Britain and Ireland. At present, Bolivia and Nicaragua are already effectively in default. Peru, which is also in effective default, may declare formal default when the Aprista Government take power in a few weeks' time. Owing to the death of Tancredo Neves, Brazil has now joined Argentina as a major debtor which is most unlikely to organise a further rescheduling in the foreseeable future. If the fall in oil prices, which most people expect, takes place this year, it could push the oil-producing debtors over the precipice. Mexico, Venezuela, Nigeria and Indonesia could join the list of countries which are in effective default.

It has been possible at least to hope for the last two years that the sticking plaster or case-by-case approach to the world debt crisis might, somehow or another, get the world through. In the light of events in recent weeks, that hope looks increasingly vain. I hope that the Minister of State will be able to assure us that this problem will be addressed more honestly and vigorously at next week's summit than it was at the meeting of the International Monetary Fund a fortnight ago or of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development which preceded it.

I turn to the issue of East-West relations, to which the Foreign Secretary rightly devoted the greatest part of his speech. He and I find ourselves in uncomfortably close proximity on this issue. I find it very difficult to criticise most of what he has done in recent months. I applaud very much what he said this afternoon about the unity of eastern and western Europe. I believe that he performed a great service by his recent visit to eastern Europe, in which he combined a proper respect for human rights with a genuine desire to improve relations between Britain and the countries of eastern Europe. This was one occasion upon which the patient plodding of Sancho Panza in eastern Europe did a great deal more for Britain and the world than the charge at windmills by Donna Quixote. I know how embarrassed the Foreign Secretary is by the contrast between the patient merit he showed on his recent visit to eastern Europe and the exhibition made by one of his colleagues in another part of the world, so I shall not press that matter further.

The Foreign Secretary was right to express the view that a new range of opportunities is given to the world as a result of the change in leadership in the Soviet Union. Those of us who have closely followed these questions over recent weeks have been surprised and impressed by the speed with which Mr. Gorbachev has established his authority in the Soviet Union—by, for example, filling the vacant places in the Politburo within a month of taking office as the Soviet leader. He has also made it crystal clear that he regards it as his prime task to improve the efficiency and integrity of the Soviet internal system and particularly to improve its economic performance.

So far, his public statements on foreign policy have added very little, with one exception with which I shall deal later, to what was said by his predecessors, but nobody who has been to the Soviet Union recently can deny that if the new Soviet leadership wants to improve Soviet economic performance it will have to offer better incentives for hard work and higher skills. It will be unable to offer those better incentives if it is compelled to make even bigger increases in defence expenditure. Therefore, I believe that the House is in agreement that the economic priority which Mr. Gorbachev has set himself gives him a very strong incentive to try, through arms agreements with the West, to reduce defence spending—which, we now know, has been very much lower than it was often made out to be.

The Central Intelligence Agency has recently stated that Soviet defence spending has increased by only 2 per cent. a year since 1976 and that expenditure on equipment has not increased annually over that period. We should bear in mind the fact that total expenditure in the Soviet Union has been no higher than that in the United States, but the increase in United States expenditure over the whole period has been twice as great as that in the Soviet Union, and since President Reagan took over as leader it has been four times as great. Therefore, the Soviet Government, like the British Government, have an overwhelming reason for moving as fast as possible in order to achieve the two main objectives set jointly by America and the Soviet Union in Geneva at the Shultz-Gromyko meeting: to prevent an arms race in space and to wind down and stop the arms race on earth.

It would make a great deal of sense to start with a freeze on arms development, since there is approximate parity in strategic and intermediate weapons. The figures that were given by the Foreign Secretary were most disingenuous. He knows as well as I do that in addition to the Pershing and cruise missiles which America has recently placed in Europe, SACEUR still retains control over 400 Poseidon warheads in case of war which must be added to the intermediate forces as well as a sizeable nuclear strike force based on American carriers in the Atlantic and the Mediterranean. Here, too, there is a rough balance.

I find it very difficult to understand, as an ex-Secretary of State for Defence, why the Foreign Secretary did not welcome Mr. Gorbachev's offer of a moratorium. If he looks at the figures, he must admit that we should have been far better off if we had accepted the Brezhnev offer of a moratorium in 1979. At that time, the Russians had deployed only 50 SS20s. Now, according to NATO sources, they have deployed 280 for possible use in the European theatre. I am sorry to have to say that, as weapons, the Soviet SS20s are very much more impressive than the Pershing 2 which the Americans now find is defective, which means that they are having to slow down their deployment in Germany, and the cruise weapons which Mr. Perle—a pearl beyond price indeed—told us three years ago had very little military value and which Mr. Weingberger told us the other day the Russians are already capable of shooting down. Indeed, he said that they had shot down one of their own cruise missiles over Finland, although he had to withdraw that claim almost as soon as it was made.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman has just destroyed his own argument. He cannot at one and the same time say that the West should have accepted the 1979 offer yet claim that today rough parity is still being maintained after the Soviet build-up of the SS20s.

Mr. Healey: The hon. Gentleman is fairly new to the House, although I know that he has great bureaucratic experience in foreign affairs. I put the answer to this question in very great detail when we debated the deployment of cruise missiles in November 1983. The fact is that, in the totality of weapons for use in the European theatre, there has been a balance for 20 years. That includes the deployment of SS20s. However, successive

[Mr. Healey]

Governments in the West have consistently refused to count in the balance the 400 Poseidon warheads that were and still allocated to SACEUR. A freeze at this moment would be more advantageous than a continued race if it meant that without it the Russians doubled the number of their missiles and that more useless cruise missiles were deployed in Western Europe, as well as more Pershing 2s, which blow up on their launch pads in peacetime.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Healey: No. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] Of course I shall give way, but I do not believe in giving way every three seconds; otherwise I might prevent my hon. Friend from making the speech that he intends to make.

Mr. Lamond: It is on exactly that point that I wish to intervene.

Mr. Healey: All right, then.

Mr. Lamond: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way. He is making an excellent speech, but may I point out that the remarks made by Mr. Gorbachev were not in the nature of an offer or a proposal; they were a unilateral statement that the Russians would not deploy any more missiles until November. He did not ask for any reciprocal agreement from the West. He will carry on with that action whether or not we take any reciprocal action, which makes the matter rather different.

Mr. Healey: I am well aware of what Mr. Gorbachev said, but the plain fact is that a six-months moratorium in itself is not over-impressive. We all know that Governments phase in the deployment of weapons in batches. It may well be that the sacrifice that the Soviet Union makes is not an impressive one if the moratorium is limited to six months.

Moreover, I must also tell my hon. Friend that Mr. Gorbachev would have impressed NATO opinion more if he had offered to withdraw those missiles which he has deployed relevant to the European theatre since the Dutch Government stated that they would not deploy any NATO weapons providing that the Soviet Union did not deploy weapons in the intervening period. I hope very much that, as a result of this interchange, Mr. Gorbachev takes my advice. One must use all diplomatic channels available.

All of us must recognise, and none more than the Foreign Secretary, that the main obstacle to progress in Geneva has been the way in which the American commitment to the strategic defence initiative has changed over recent months compared with what Mr. Gromyko was given to understand by Mr. Shultz when they first met in January.

I had the opportunity, as has been mentioned, to visit America for a day last week when I was able to talk to people on both sides of the star wars argument. The impressive thing is that everybody who has expressed a view who has served as Secretary of Defence in the United States in the past 20 years regards the strategic defence initiative as dangerous nonsense. That goes for defence Ministers of both parties, Mr. Schlesinger of the Republican party no less than Mr. McNamara and Mr. Brown of the Democratic party. Indeed, it was criticised in similar terms by President Ford, a Republican, at a recent meeting in Atlanta, Georgia.

To me and to many people in Washington, what was perhaps most impressive was that the strategic defence initiative was strongly criticised by General Scowcroft last week in the United States. I say "impressive" because General Scowcroft's report on the MX missile was accepted as the most balanced statement of the requirements for a stabilising nuclear strategy and it was accepted by President Reagan and the political opposition in the United States as well.

The real trouble is that the American Administration's position has changed in worrying ways since that initiative was first announced. In December, the national security adviser, Mr. Macfarlane, said that America would be prepared in negotiations to bargain about research as well as deployment. In January President Reagan said that America would not bargain about research but would bargain about deployment. But in recent months, Mr. Weinberger and many other American spokesmen have said that America will not bargain even about deployment if deployment appears to be feasible. That is a worrying situation, because nobody is still arguing in Washington that the United States will be able to protect is own people through the strategic defence initiative, still less that it will be able to make nuclear weapons obsolete, as President Reagan initially suggested.

The only purpose now suggested for that system, if it proves feasible, is to protect American land-based inter-continental ballistic missiles and increasingly people in Washington are beginning to worry that the Russians may justifiably fear that it is intended to protect the remaining ICBMs against a ragged response by Soviet missiles to an American first strike. That fear was expressed by General Scowcroft last week.

That type of fear is fed by remarks by the American Defence Secretary, Mr. Weinberger, who said the other day:

> "If we can get a system which is effective and which we know can render their weapons impotent, we could be back in a situation we were in, for example, when we were the only nation with a nuclear weapon."

That is the clearest declaration of the interest that at least one member of the Administration has in acquiring not only superiority but the sort of superiority which no American Administration has ever sought at any time since the war.

I hasten to add that Mr. Weinberger is not the only spokesman for the Administration. Mr. Paul Nitze, in a recent series of speeches, one of which was in London, said that the strategic defence initiative would not be worth while unless the system it produces can survive an attack, costs less than measures to defeat it and increases rather decreases stability. All those are important criteria, although most people think that they rule out the SDI programme in advance.

Yet when the Foreign Secretary repeated those points in a recent lecture, the response that he received from supporters of the SDI on both sides of the Atlantic was one that I can only describe as hysterical rage. The Times leader was a model of bloodshot saloon bar apoplexy. To quote its more moderate remark, it said that the Foreign Secretary's speech was

> "mealy-mouthed, muddled in conception, negative, Luddite, ill-informed and, in effect if not intention, a 'wrecking amendment' to the whole (SDI) plan".

God protect him from his friends. It is a great pity that Mr. Rupert Murdoch has reduced the once mighty Thunderer to impotent spluttering whenever it comes across on argument or view with which it disagrees.

Not satisfied with the Times leader Mr. Richard Perle, a middle-ranking official in the Defence Department, rushed over to London and made a speech which was extraordinarily loutish and incoherent. I find that extraordinary because I have a long acquaintance with Mr. Perle and he has always appeared to me in normal circumstances to be an intelligent and courteous man. But when the presentation of reasonable doubts is met by this hysterical response, one is justified in doubting the conviction and rationality of the supporters of star wars. Indeed, there is no doubt, in my view, that Mr. Perle was essentially attacking his colleague Mr. Nitze and using the Foreign Secretary simply as a surrogate.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Will the right hon. Gentleman agree that the principal problem with the SDI is that at the end of the day one cannot run what must be a political relationship using essentially only strategic technology?

Mr. Healey: If the hon. Gentleman is saying, as I suspect he is, that one cannot solve political problems through a technological fix, I agree with him. A worrying tendency in American policy for many years has been the desire to do precisely that, and it is always bound to fail.

The remarks of the Foreign Secretary awakened echoes of great sympathy throughout western Europe inside the Alliance. It is vital that those of us who have doubts about the course on which American policy appears to be set should express those doubts clearly and in public. There is no other way by which we can hope to influence the debate in Washington. It is important that if the European countries agree on this matter, they should state a concerted view because a concerted view from Europe will always be more influential in Washington than a series of different views.

I am sure that we should regard it a highly impertinent for Mr. Burt, who is a middle-rank official in the State Department, to have told the European Governments that they had no right to discuss these questions except in the presence of the United States, and I hope that the Foreign Secretary put a flea in his ear.

If Europe expresses its view firmly and collectively, we can turn the tide of argument in America. To do that, we must refrain from participating in SDI research, as the Americans peremptorily summoned us to do within 60 days of Mr. Weinberger giving the invitation.

I see no reason to believe that research into SDI will increase Europe's technological ability to compete with the United States; on the contrary. Japan has no military research in these areas but is knocking the living daylights out of American high technology all over the world, including in the United States. In the last three years, the Americans have turned a trade surplus of $10 million in high technology into a trade deficit of $5 billion. In my view, one reason for that has been their excessive devotion of research resources to military research.

Given the neurotic obsession of some in the present American Administration to prevent what they call the transfer of technology, it is unlikely that the European countries would be given any interesting areas of research into SDI, except on conditions which would, frankly, be commercially intolerable. I hope that the Government will not be seduced by the arguments of the aerospace industry, which in the United States recently described SDI as money from heaven. I hope that the British Government will resist this heavenly shower.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): While I greatly share the sentiments that the right hon. Gentleman has expressed on that topic, is he aware that an argument propounded in favour of our participating in the research programme, even if we are opposed to eventual deployment by negotiation, is that it enables us, individually or collectively in Europe, to prevent the Americans from making a unilateral decision eventually on deployment? If we participate throughout the research up to the point at which they would either negotiate or deploy, we are more likely to have a say in that eventuality than if we opt out of it.

Mr. Healey: I have some experience of working with the Americans in these matters. I assure the hon. Gentleman that no American Administration, least of all the present one, would ever make themselves so dependent on foreign contributions in this area as to give foreigners a veto over their actions. Anyone who believes the contrary has no knowledge of the post-war history of American co-operation with its allies in defence.

I hope, therefore, that the Government will resist the temptation to join the research programme. I hope that they will also point out to the United States that, if they have now come to the view that the only real purpose of a star wars system would be to defend their ICBMs against a first strike, there are many much cheaper ways of doing that. One which the British Government, in their present mood, should support to the hilt would be to put more Trident D5s at sea, because the Trident submarines are invulnerable and I understand that their warheads are just as effective against hard targets as the warheads of ICBMs.

What has confused many people is the argument used by the Foreign Secretary that, as the Russians have engaged in research, the Americans must do the same or the Russians might suddenly break out and deploy an anti-missile system. In any case, it is said, there can be no verification of an agreement to ban research. I shall comment on that, because by examining the problem we may be led to the way through.

It is true that there is no means of verifying a ban on research, which takes place in people's minds or in laboratories. However, it is impossible to carry research in this area far without carrying out experiments which can be monitored by the Russians, by us or by anyone else. To prove that, the American Department of Defence has recently published a list of 15 major sets of experiments that it proposes to carry out as part of the SDI programme, nearly all of which could be monitored by the Soviet Union.

The Department published that list so as to argue that the tests were compatible with the anti-ballistic missile treaty, and a great argument has begun in the United States about whether they are compatible. We know that the Russians have carried out similar experiments which have been monitored by the United States, and each side has carried out experiments in anti-satellite warfare which have been monitored by the other.

Surely the answer, if we want to stop the arms race moving into outer space, is to tighten the ABM treaty—so that all these, currently grey, areas can become absolutely clear—and ban all experiments which are, or could be held to be, related to the future deployment of anti-missile systems. That would meet the American worry about some of the ambiguous Soviet measures, such as the construction of a phased array radar system, and it would meet Soviet worries about the Americans overtaking them.

If the Americans showed themselves ready to reach an agreement along those lines, the Russians should offer deep cuts in their intermediate range nuclear forces and in their strategic forces. Then rapid progress in Geneva would be possible, and rapid progress is necessary, too.

I have been deeply worried by talk in America of leisurely negotiations which could last for many years. During such a period, the arms race would move into areas which might soon become beyond control, in peace or war —for example, dual-capable cruise missiles which are easily hidden and systems which are so sensitive and which require to react so quickly that their use must be triggered by computers rather than by the minds of men. That is true, I fear, for most of the technologies which the Americans contemplate as contributing to the SDI.

Next week's summit meeting gives Europe a unique opportunity to make those points to the United States President and his closest advisers. On this sort of issue, the battle in Washington sways to and fro between the State Department, the White House and the Defence Department. A concerted attempt to put the issues clearly and courteously to the United States next week could have a major influence. We are only asking for the American President to return to the position that, on his behalf, Mr. Macfarlane stated in December—that America would negotiate about research on as well as deployment of the strategic defence initiative, provided that progress was being made in the other areas.

We have a unique opportunity. I hope that the British Government, who have taken the lead on this matter—I congratulate the Foreign Secretary on that—will take another great step forward. There could be no better way of celebrating VE day than to make progress on this issue.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): If I understood him correctly, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) dismissed the strategic defence initiative as "dangerous rubbish". He threw a great deal of doubt on its feasibility. He may be right or he may be wrong, but any discussion of the subject must take account of two factors.

First, there is the President's apparent confidence in the feasibility of the project and his commitment to it. It is hard to believe that the President would have committed himself so far or expressed such optimism unless he had good reason to believe, and had been given good advice to the effect, that it was feasible.

Almost more impressive, however, is the obsessive anxiety displayed last year by Mr. Gromyko and since then by Mr. Gorbachev about the strategic defence initiative. The Soviets have made some study of the matter. If they thought that it was not going to work, why would they complain about the Americans spending a great deal of money on it, or if they thought that they could do it better themselves, why would they complain about the Americans trying to catch up?

The problem will not go away. It will not be possible to put the genie back into the bottle. One cannot uninvent what has been invented and taken some way. That being so, what do we do about it? Only research will show whether the programme would be cost-effective at the margin—whether the advantages that would accrue from the system would cost less than the measures which the other side would have to take to counter it.

Unlike the right hon. Gentleman, I think that we should be in on this development. We had the painful experience of the MacMahon Act, when we were cut off from all information on nuclear technology and had to relearn a great deal at great cost and effort. It would be wrong for us to put ourselves in that position in connection with this new technology. Until the reseach programme has been completed we cannot tell whether or not it will be of great importance to us.

I agree that it is right that such matters should be discussed within the Western European Union. Mr. Burt's intervention was, to say the least, undiplomatic.

I drafted the original memorandum that led to the setting up of the WEU. It stated:

"NATO is a box to keep the Soviets out of Europe. We need a box to keep the Germans in Europe."

As long as there is a Soviet threat to Europe, NATO is essential. It is vital. It is the main system through which we face that danger. As long as that threat continues to exist, NATO must be our front line and our basic alliance. However, the concept of European union would remain valid even if the threat did not exist. We have a trade and payments union in Europe. There are meetings of Heads of Government and Foreign Ministers. However, we do not yet have a proper defence system. It would be good if, within NATO, we developed a European system. The WEU, suitably amended, would seem to be the natural forum for this. It would be in no sense an alternative to NATO. It would be a means of affirming, within NATO, the European contribution. If such a development helped to bring France a little closer into the Atlantic Alliance, so much the better. Europe cannot be defended without France.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East expressed substantial hopes about the possibilities arising from Mr. Gorbachev's arrival in office. Yes, there is something to be hoped for in that connection. However, in this context, I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on his two excursions into eastern Europe. There is always a dilemma to be faced on such visits. If one simply approaches them on a state-to-state basis, there will be a feeling among the people of the country that one is supporting the regime by which they are repressed. My right hon. and learned Friend's judical combination of formal discussion and unconventional excursions exactly resolved the dilemma.

Eastern Europe is not a monolith. It is not nearly as monolothic as it was even 12 years ago. Romania has a fiercely independent foreign policy and a rigid regime. In Poland, though it is not a pluralist society, the church and Solidarity function almost publicly as an opposition. Hungary has liberal trading traditions. East Germany is permeated by West German television. Czechoslovakia is the most rigid of the countries, because it has a common frontier with NATO's arms.

In their different ways, those countries are all subject to the attractions of the West. If we on our side can play a part in transforming the Soviet empire into a Soviet commonwealth, we will be half way to where we want to go.

Of course it is right to examine the possibilities offered by the new regime in Moscow but it would not be honest of me to say that I thought that we would make rapid progress. The right hon. Gentleman thinks that the Americans are taking arms control too slowly. Arms control is at the moment in the centre of the stage. We must remember — the right hon. Gentleman was factually wrong on this point—that the Soviets enjoy a substantial superiority in conventional and nuclear weapons at present and will not surrender that superiority lightly. They will make every effort to freeze the present situation. The right hon. Gentleman suggests that we should accept the freeze proposed by the Soviet Union. The Soviets will try by negotiation and propaganda to persuade us to do so. However, we must not allow a freeze.

It was because of the dangers posed by Soviet superiority that Chancellor Schmidt demanded that we should put new weapons into Europe to make up for the absence of German nuclear weapons under German control. That is being done, and the best chance of an agreement with the Soviets is for us to continue to build up our weapon levels while working at the negotiating table. We should build up our programme, as we have said that we will, while being ready to disarm with the Russians to a level acceptable to both sides.

Will we succeed? I do not know. However, the Soviet Union knows that it cannot win an arms race against the West. The Russians will try to delay, but if they see us going ahead they will have to decide whether to do a deal while they are still in a relatively strong position. It was the deployment of Pershing and cruise that brought them back to the conference table. It would have been nice if the right hon. Member for Leeds, East had admitted that that was a great triumph of President Reagan's policy and that of other Western Governments.

There is of course a risk that, while we continue rearming, the Soviets will wish to take advantage of the window of opportunity which is still open to them. The situation is fragile—we are almost walking on eggs. I do not expect it, but I do not exclude the possibility of their attempting some adventure in Europe to take advantage of the opportunity still open to them. There are other areas which are perhaps more advantageous to them. The middle east stands out as one. The Iraq-Iran war drags on. If Iran were to collapse, what was once the Shah's progressive empire would become a vacuum and the Soviets are well placed to fill it from the Soviet Union and Afghanistan. If Iraq were to collapse, the repercussions in the whole of the middle east would be chaotic. We must watch that carefully.

There is another danger area, which I am sure my right hon. and learned Friend is watching carefully. I refer to the Horn of Africa. Despite the ghastly famine in Ethiopia and neighbouring countries, the Marxist regime of the Dergue continues to wage civil war against the Eritrean and Tigrean freedom fighters. It has had great difficulty so far but matters are now easing up for the Dergue. The new Government in Khartoum have stopped the broadcasts to Eritrea and Tigre from the Sudan, although the Mengistu Government are helping the rebels in the southern Sudan. And the southern Sudan controls the oil without which Sudanese prosperity cannot be rebuilt.

Mengistu and his Libyan friends, who have money in their purse, have considerable means of pressure on the new Sudan regime. The situation in Khartoum is still far from clear, but it is clear that the new Government have called for better relations with Libya—there has been a resumption of diplomatic relations—with Ethiopia and with the Soviet Union. It is also clear that the broadcasts against Gaddafi and the Ethiopians have been stopped. There is talk of ending co-operation with the American rapid deployment force. The Sudanese Government are dependent on the Americans for money, but Gaddafi has money too and control of the Nile waters is vital to Egypt, the leading ally of the West in the area. If anything should happen to Egypt, the moderate axis that has been built up from Cairo to Amman to Baghdad will be in danger, and with it the chances of a settlement of the Palestinian problem and peace with Israel. The stakes are high in the area and the possibility of East-West confrontation is apparent.

I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend is aware that, whatever else happens, we should not let our hopes of a new potential in East-West relations blind us to the real dangers ahead.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): I am sorry that we cannot vote on the Adjournment motion. To judge from what the two Front Bench spokesmen have said, in their euphoria, it looks as though there is a return to bi-partisan politics. I am sorry that they have both disappeared because I wanted to make a few remarks, especially about my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey).

The cold warriors are still at it, here and in the other place. There is no evidence of a new approach to good relations between East and West in recent debates in either House. Some pleasant remarks have been made lately. The Prime Minister said that it might be possible to do business with Mr. Gorbachev, but she has not proved that she has moved from calling the Soviet Union a vile society. She called its negotiators undemocratic, unrepresentative and untrustworthy and said that there was no basis of trust. We shall have to have a lot more evidence before we believe that we are moving away from the present frigidity. I hope that that evidence comes soon.

In Mr. Nakasone in Japan, Mr. Kohl in Germany, and our Prime Minister, allied to President Reagan, we have a reactionary quartet working in unison. All four are vying with one another to prove their aggression against the Soviet Union and to find excuses to explain why current talks are not making much progress. If there is an aggregate expenditure on arms, especially nuclear arms, of £150 billion a year, there must be an enemy somewhere to justify it. To justify that expenditure to taxpayers, they must claim that an enemy is knocking at the door. I look to the resumption of talks in Geneva at the end of May as a prospect of progress, especially in conjunction with the resumption of talks on the non-proliferation treaty, which start in September. I hope that the summit later this year between President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev will consolidate preparatory work which I hope will have been possible in Geneva. We should not be misled by the present euphoria.

[Mr. Norman Atkinson]

The West seems to be locked into anti-Soviet vigilance and the Soviets seem to be locked into anti-Western vigilance. The Foreign Secretary said that there had been no progress in Geneva and that it seemed to him that the Soviets were more concerned with propaganda than making progress. I do not know the basis for that statement or whether he has access to what has gone on at the negotiating table in Geneva. If that is his conclusion, it does not sound too good. The Foreign Secretary talked about Poland and my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East rightly reminded him of Government initiatives on Poland and an alternative leadership there some years ago.

People throughout the world are looking for leadership, and it might be possible to have a moratorium on all nuclear weapons testing. That is the priority demand being made in all countries, especially Britain. Against that background we should consider what is happening at the talks. Western peace movements agree that secrecy is not on the side of peace. It is part of the arms race vocabulary and weakens the movement towards peace. Therefore, we should do everything that we can to break down the confidentiality agreed on by both sides in the current negotiations.

One of the priorities that we should attempt to achieve is an end to the secret numbers game, in Geneva particularly, but in all disarmament talks. We and the United States are particularly dependent on American information from the institute in Stockholm and from the International Institute for Strategic Studies. There are only the two sources of information. When any hon. Member uses numbers in his arguments, on what basis does he claim confidence for their accuracy? In my experience of 20 years of putting questions about the numbers of nuclear weapons held, either in warheads or in the yield that they are capable of producing, every Minister has refused consistently to confirm or deny the accuracy of the numbers. It has not been the practice of successive Governments to reveal anything about the number of these weapons.

There is no certainty anywhere. There is no open knowledge about what is being discussed at Geneva. Both the Soviet Union and the United States have agreed total confidentiality about the references put on the table. The evidence is that contradictory figures are being used, and some downright misleading figures are being used by this Government, about the possession of nuclear weapons either by Britain or the United States. The Soviet Union is not willing to divulge any of the precise figures that it is putting on the table either in Geneva or elsewhere.

I appeal to Ambassador Popov, the Soviet ambassador to London, to give a message to Gorbachev. The peace movements will be assisted by a break from these agreements about confidentiality. The Foreign Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East, like a series of successive Conservative and Labour Foreign Secretaries have refused to budge from the fixation about the confidentiality of talks. However, if we are to make a positive contribution to peace, we have to break open the door so that we know more about the papers on the table. Let the world understand what the negotiations are about.

In this country, the figures cannot be classified to keep them from the Soviet Union—they are the figures that are on the table. What is good enough to tell the Soviet Union at the negotiating table is good enough to tell the British Parliament or the United States Congress. Let us tell the world the arguments that we are using, and ask the Soviet Union to do the same. The appeal must go out from the peace movements of the world to Gorbachev to have second thoughts about perpetuating the agreement on confidentiality, which can do no good to the peace movement or to the progress for which we are hoping when the summit takes place and the serious matters are discussed.

I move on to the Labour party's attitude towards nuclear weapons, and that of particular sections of the Labour party, and to some of the ideas under serious discussion. The Labour party's position is clear. The party stands for, and I understand will fight the next election on, unilateral nuclear disarmament. That means no Polaris, no Trident, no nuclear bombers, no cruise bases, no Pershing bases, no United States bombers or submarines based in the country, and no United States bases. There is unanimity in the Labour party on that, from the Front Bench backwards. That is the clear basis on which the Labour party will campaign for acceptance. There is bound to be a tremendous shift once a Labour Government start to implement that policy in their first years.

Under those circumstances — the sheer size of the task that a Labour Government will have to face in carrying out that policy, the changes that, of necessity, there must be in the Armed Forces, particularly the Royal Navy and the Air Force—we must have the stability of a NATO understanding. Those parts of the Labour movement and the peace movement that are arguing that, simultaneous with unilateral nuclear disarmament, we must withdraw from NATO, are doing no good to the cause of peace, and to the Labour movement which is trying to pursue that policy. Those in the Labour movement who advocate coming out of NATO overnight should recognise the significance of the arguments that they are using, and the political damage that they will inflict by pursuing those arguments, in spite of the progress that has been made, and the unity between the leadership and the whole movement.

I cannot emphasise too strongly the irresponsibility of those who argue for the severing of the Atlantic relationship. They are doing no good to their cause or to our arguments about a method of bringing about the profound changes to denuclearise Britain in the way proposed by the Labour party. The solidarity, leadership and strength of the moment will be weakened if people believe that there is a short cut to establishing Scandinavian-type neutrality in Britain before we get rid of nuclear weapons.

Both my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East and the Foreign Secretary referred to the strategic defence initiative. My right hon. Friend said that it is nonsense. I do not know whether that was a profound statement based on his scientific and engineering knowledge of what is happening to space mechanics. I want not only the Labour movement but Britain to take seriously what is happening in the United States and in its attempts to develop an anti-ballistic defence system. It may have profound effects and significance for all of us in Europe, particularly the Soviet Union, and on what happens at the negotiating table. We should take seriously the potential of what is being discussed and accept without qualification that such a system can be effective by 1995. There are no technological or scientific reasons why that cannot be so.

We know enough about the technology that is involved, as it is practised on earth, to know that in 10 years such a space defence system is technically feasible. Beam technology and the superb electronics of surveillance systems already exist. If the distances involved in a space defence system were limited to a mile or so, it would be possible to use the technology that is already available. Engineering firms in Britain and the United States have proved that beam technology can be used to punch holes through one-inch steel plates a mile away. The question is whether that technology can be extended to the dimensions of space. We must seriously consider the means of synchronising all these technologies to perfect our defence system.

Within 10 years, the United States and the Soviet Union could make the changes necessary to develop this space defence system. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East said that the Japanese are beating us hands down in developing this technology, but that is not true. The Japanese do not have an equivalent to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The technology in Japan is not in the same class as the developments in Massachusetts or other defence research institutes in the United States. A giant technological infusion is occurring, with Soviet scientists being seconded to operate here. Those scientists have an intimate knowledge of some of these technologies.

It is a matter of dimension, not of finding the technology. The success of the technology will be determined by the way in which it is extended to take account of the size of space.

Documents produced by American scientists have referred to the possibility of producing souped-up, supersonic, low trajectory missiles capable of hugging the contours of the land. Such missiles could carry sophisticated electronic navigational equipment and new forms of rocket motors and fuels. These developments would produce before too long a new generation of weapons, which will shift the emphasis towards nuclear technology.

President Reagan originally questioned some aspects of ballistic missiles. He started to say that alternative methods of nuclear defence should be investigated, but scientists were moving towards a different concept, away from Trident, Polaris or similar weapons. They were searching for alternatives.

There are tremendous advantages to be gained from talking about defence against ballistic missiles. An important change is taking place. Such a system is a disadvantage to the Soviet Union and to Europe. The creation in space of a defence system against ballistic weapons would shift the emphasis to those weapons capable of cruising close to the ground at supersonic speed. Such weapons would need to be based close to their targets, and there is no other place but Europe for such bases. Weapons with megatons equivalent to those of the proposed Trident missiles can be launched from the back of a lorry close to the Soviet border.

The Americans talk of the 80 per cent. effectiveness of an anti-ballistic missile system in space. They say that they can exclude the United States from the theatre of engagement. They can shift the business of nuclear conflict to Europe and confine the conflict to a small area. It is possible to confine the whole of a nuclear conflict to the width of Europe—to the area between Cornwall and Moscow. America can thereby think itself safe from ballistic weapons.

There is a political and military significance to star wars which is ignored and which has profound effects on Europe's defence. We should note seriously what is happening in the laboratories of the United States which are developing these ideas. These forms of technology are feasible, and we should accept some of the statements that have been made about them.

We are on the verge of making progress. I conclude as I started. The peace movement and Labour Members are looking for concrete evidence from the Government that they are serious about wanting to create a new climate in the world to bring East and West together to establish greater confidence in peace in the future and build a system that will make the next generations proud of our efforts.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): The hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson) is right about star wars. If it works, it will confine the battle to Europe; if it does not work, it will increase the nuclear threshold. Either way, it will make relationships between the United States and Europe difficult. But there has always been this difficulty between the United States and Europe. The Alliance has held so far. I was glad to hear what the hon. Member for Tottenham said about NATO. I hope that the Alliance will hold in the future.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary referred to diplomatic immunities. I welcome the Government's acceptance of the report by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. There is really only one difference between the Government's view and that of the Committee. The Committee thought that the Government had been a little too kind for too long to the Libyans when it was obvious that they were misbehaving. The Government may feel that that is a statement made with hindsight, and of course it is. I suppose that every dog must have its first bite. I believe that the Foreign Office should put the matter down to "experience", which is what I usually call my mistakes.

The Committee was disappointed that no mileage could be gained for the proposal to change the Vienna convention. There are two reasons. The first is the opposition to change—there are 144 other signatories—and the second and more important is that the convention only expresses customary law. Even if the convention were altered, that law would not go away. Therefore, we would not be much better off.

I agree with what the Government have said about crime. Despite the headlines in newspapers, the incidence of crime among the diplomatic corps is fairly low. The crimes are fairly petty, usually involving children whipping something off the shelves of Marks and Sparks.

But more than 100,000 parking offences a year are committed in London. That is unreasonable. Diplomatic immunity does not give a person the right to disobey the law of the country concerned. It only enables the person to avoid the penalty. We can do without those who arrogantly break our law repeatedly.

I have a question about diplomatic premises. Does the Government's answer mean that they can direct where embassies shall be located? I call attention to the plight of the two boroughs of Westminster and Kensington where nearly all the embassies are to be found. They have a tough time with parking, parties and the lack of rates from embassies. It is justifiable to ask that an embassy should be located in a reasonably convenient place.

My second question arises out of paragraph 39d(iii) of the Government's reply dealing with property. The Government apparently envisage that they could sell abandoned or empty premises. Does that mean that the Libyan embassy in St. James's square could be put on the market? It has an awful look at the moment. It looks disagreeable and unkempt. It should not be there. What about the Iranian embassy? It is a danger and about to fall into the street. Are we not entitled to sell them both and send the money to the countries involved?

I shall comment upon our relations with Russia.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. and gallant Friend has been talking about problems of law. Is he prepared to comment on the ridiculous claim made, as it were, by European members of Parliament that they should be outside the civil law in any country within the Community? Does he support the Government's current position that that is outrageous and unacceptable?

Sir Anthony Kershaw: It is outrageous. They are claiming diplomatic immunity. There is nothing in the convention which says that Euro-MPs are diplomats. I do not think that they are. I dare say that we can counter that suggestion by calling on the book. My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) is a fine diplomat, but I do not believe that he should be classified as such.

I shall deal with relations with Russia. Her Majesty's Government have been right to insist on the Soviet Union keeping the rules about spies. If we were much softer, we should not obtain any more co-operation, nor would it alter its conduct.

Mr. Gorbachev's first moves on the international stage have been disappointing. His offer to freeze Soviet superiority, timed to provide the dafties with appropriate slogans at their Easter parades, was almost contemptuous in its flagrant disregard of Western interests. Plainly, he had no expectation that we would accept. It was also in disregard of the understanding that diplomacy should be conducted not by loud hailer but by agreement in private at Geneva. It reveals that Gorbachev's object at Geneva is to obtain a political advantage rather than achieve disarmament.

When Mr. Gorbachev was here and we had the pleasure and honour of meeting him, his swift reaction to human rights questions showed that the Helsinki ideals are no more likely to be realised now than they were before the change of regime. I am afraid that Mr. Gorbachev's value as an interlocutor cannot be assessed as highly as his youth and obvious intelligence seemed to warrant. The leopard has not changed its spots, nor was it reasonable of us to expect Communism to change so soon. Communism breaks; it cannot bend. Nevertheless, my right hon. and learned Friend is right to go on trying, and so long as he uses a long spoon, we wish him luck.

I wish to deal with the Foreign Office. Last year, the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs said that the cuts in our overseas services had gone far enough. Our opinion has not been listened to. Salami cuts have continued. The latest cuts have resulted in the closure of 10 posts overseas including, sadly, the embassy in Santo Domingo which has given much offence in that country and that part of the world. We were the first country to recognise Dominica in 1853 and the first major country to close its embassy. It is a sad commentary upon our relations.

Even before matters go as far as closure, the reduction to mini-missions in so many countries harms our interests. That reduction can be seen from the figures. In the past five years or so, second rank officers in the Foreign Office have been reduced by half. That implies that a mini-mission consists of a head of mission and no one else. He does the filing and the washing-up. He even looks after the car. He does almost everything and his value as a diplomat is thereby diminished. He spends so much time administering himself that he has less time for diplomatic work.

Since 1969, we have seen a 20 per cent. reduction in the manpower of the Foreign Office. Morale will suffer. Recruitment is suffering now. I fear that standards may have to be lowered.

I shall say a word about the British Council. I fear that I have bored the House about it before. It suffers, like the Foreign Office, from the cuts. Since 1979, the British Council has been cut by 20 per cent. Cuts continue every year. This year the British Council, for example, has been left to absorb £1·1 million in cuts, in addition to £600,000 of excess home costs which it must also absorb. It is a further 2 to 3 per cent. reduction in its disposable income.

In addition, delays in identifying overseas risen costs, which hang over for months, have made it impossible to plan with certainty even one year ahead. Some of the consequences are plain to see. We have had to cancel at short notice the opening of a new post in Shanghai after much preparation. We have closed nine or 10 other posts with long-term damage to our interests.

I should have less to complain about if the British Council had merely shared a misery equal to that of other Departments, but that is far from being the case. It has been cut far more than other Departments. It needs a small increase of about £2 million a year for the next two years. That would mean a 15 per cent. cut since 1969 instead of a 20 per cent. cut. That is a fairly modest claim. As with the Foreign Office, the subject of the morale of the service arises. No one wants to be part of a declining organisation or to work for a firm that loses money every year, because it will obviously go phut. A public organisation does not go bust, it merely loses heart. Its members wonder whether their work is worth it. It is the Government's responsibility to maintain the morale of those services.

I shall refer only briefly to the BBC overseas service not because I do not attach the highest importance to it but because this year, largely because of the progress in capital expenditure, the figures do not look too bad.

My final point is about overseas students. There is no doubt that the abrupt raising of fees a few years ago was a bad mistake. It offended many of our friends overseas. It has reduced the number of overseas students in this country from 91,000 to 56,000. It reduced the number of postgraduates from 19,500 to 17,000. That is a vast reduction—30 per cent. I fear that in the future we shall have fewer friends.

Today, as the House realises, I know, 24 overseas countries have leaders who were educated in Britain. That is to say, one in eight of all world leaders were educated here—12·5 per cent. of countries have British-educated leaders. As a matter of interest, France is next with 7 per cent., the United States has 6 per cent. and the USSR has 2 per cent.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the increase in overseas students' fees to such astronomical levels does not just militate against students coming here to study, but means that those who come tend to be from the wealthier families? That militates badly against the poorest people from Third-world countries who are looking to receive some kind of decent technical or higher education in this country.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: The hon. Gentleman is right. I was about to make the same point, and I am grateful to him. The tendency has been that we get not such good students from richer countries and the brilliant people from the poorer countries cannot afford to take part. With our history and advantage of language, it is folly not to try to make friends for the future.

I could make a number of detailed suggestions about the arrangements for overseas students, but will not weary the House with them now. I maintain, however, that it is manifestly in our interests on political and economic grounds that we seek urgently to repair the damage which we have done to our reputation. It is badly dented and we should seek to restore it to what it was until very recently.

I know that it is maddening for my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) and for the Government generally when people do what I am doing now—commending frugality in general but advocating expenditure in particular. But I firmly believe that the welfare of this country demands that our external affairs be conducted in future on a more ample basis than they have been in recent years. That will not cost much, and not to do it might cost us a great deal in the long run.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber) rose——

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier this week, following events in which you were closely involved, it became known that the Procedure Committee was considering the amenities for third parties in the House. What arrangements have been put in hand to advise the Procedure Committee that on this important occasion no member of the Social Democratic party has sought to catch your eye from any seat in the Chamber? Could the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) indicate whether he is speaking on behalf of the Liberal party, the SDP, or the two jointly, and whether he made any application to speak from the Dispatch Box, which is normally reserved for official spokesmen for the Opposition?

Mr. Johnston: I observe, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you have made no attempt to respond to those questions. I am speaking on behalf of the Liberal party, with the agreement of the Social Democratic party.

Mr. Madden: And the hon. Gentleman is quite happy with his seat?

Mr. Johnston: I have been happy with it for 20 years, which is somewhat longer than the hon. Gentleman has been in the House.

I agree very much with the remarks made by the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir. A. Kershaw) about the cuts in the British Council, the introduction of fees for overseas students, and the long-term damage that has caused. In this area the Government have been profoundly negative and harmful and in many respects plain stupid. For a Government who continually pride themselves on furthering British interests and seldom stop talking about them, this is clearly an area in which they have not done what they have said they are doing.

We are having a debate which, because of numbers, is, I understand, to be extended to midnight—which I regard as a very ungodly hour at which to discuss anything. Nevertheless, I shall be here at midnight, and so will many other hon. Members.

There is a wide range of issues which are important in their own right, but perhaps not sufficiently important, except in exceptional circumstances, to lay claim to a separate debate. I believe that the strategic defence initiative merits separate treatment and that—perhaps in the sort of context that was provided by Lord Home of the Hirsel in another place on Tuesday—there should be a debate on this issue in this House. I hope that the Secretary of State will consider that carefully and discuss it with the Leader of the House. I do not propose to deal with the SDI today, but it is evidently of enormous importance, as has already been stated by a number of hon. Members. We on this bench are extremely doubtful about it. We cannot see any proven merits in it, but we have not discussed it in any great detail. It is clearly going to be hugely costly, and it is uncertain and potentially escalatory, as the hon. Member for Stroud remarked.

One should remember the suggestion of a freeze is not a policy, but simply a mechanism for improving the circumstances in which negotiations can be undertaken. Nor is it, as could be inferred from what the Foreign Secretary said, an open-ended matter. One might have looked at the possibility—suggested by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey)—of building on the proposed Gorbachev moratorium rather than simply dismissing it out of hand. Six months might be inadequate, but there could be a longer period.

It goes without saying that we feel that the coincidence of the changed leadership in the USSR and a United States President in the early part of his final term offers the best chance of real progress for many years, and that opportunity must be seized.

I hope that the Minister, in winding up, will say rather more about how the United Kingdom, by itself, or within the mechanism of the European Community, can make an effective input at Geneva, for the Foreign Secretary said little about that.

I shall deal as succinctly as possible—although my first point will take a little longer—with six issues. The others will be dealt with very briefly, so hon. Members need not get excited. I do not, in the main, make long speeches in the House.

There have been very little discussion in Britain about the Dooge report, to which the Foreign Secretary referred, and I think that its importance has been underrated. I stress that it is not, as were earlier reports—such as those of Tindemans and the three wise men—merely an advisory statement on how the Community might be reformed.

As hon. Members know, the Dooge committee was decided upon by the European Council at Fontainebleau last June, following the adoption by the European Parliament, on 14 February 1984, of the new draft treaty for European union. The members of the committee were personally chosen by the Heads of Government—the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) was thus chosen by the Prime Minister—and they expressed the views of the Heads of Government. The conclusions of the report and the reservations to it are therefore the opinions not of some stray committee, but of the Heads of Government.

It is clear to me that the Prime Minister is once again taking a negative line on crucial questions. She has been joined in this by Greece and Denmark. Mr. Papandreou's reaction is not surprising, given his general attitude towards the Community. The Danish Prime Minister's reservations reflect the fact that his is a minority Government and that there is no majority in the Folketing for going towards anything, much less European union. Mr. Dooge, on behalf of Dr. Garret FritzGerald, has made an inevitable, if important, reservation about security policy.

There is no doubt, however, that the objections which have been made by the hon. Member for Pentlands on behalf of the Prime Minister are regarded as the most significant. That is why I thought that the bland, not to say disingenuous, responses made by the hon. Member for Pentlands during foreign affairs questions the other day were quite inadequate.

That is not only because of the relative importance of Great Britain, but because the Dooge committee comes out strongly in favour of British Government policies on, for example, foreign and security co-operation and the establishment of the internal market. Yet the Government and the hon. Gentleman, speaking for the Government, oppose the procedural reforms without which these policies will continue to be blocked.

I think that the Government must review their approach, for two reasons. The first is for the sake of British interests, about which, as I said, they are always talking. For the British to find themselves once again missing the bus, as Sir Anthony Eden, as he then was, did in Messina, and isolating themselves from their closest partners at a time when it is becoming increasingly obvious that it is only by making the European Community a political force that we can hope to exercise real influence on the policies of Washington and Moscow, seems to me to be quite insane.

The second is for the sake of the Community itself. British self-exclusion—as I and, I am sure, many hon. Members know—might well produce a collective sigh of relief from the other members of the Community, but in their hearts all far-sighted people know that it would be a disaster for Europe.

It must be obvious that the Ten cannot work while the veto power is maintained in its present form. That is even more obvious with the accession of Spain and Portugal. The reservation of the hon. Member for Pentlands on the powers of Parliament is indefensible if one believes in democratic parliamentary control of Community policy. Dooge proposes not taking away power from national parliaments but, rather, bringing the Council and the Commission under parliamentary control when they act on behalf of the Community.

The British Government must participate in the special conference to take decisions on European union, which will be convened following the European Council in Milan. It would be a good earnest of our intent if we indicated, at last, an intention to join the European monetary system.

We should not be in any doubt that attitudes towards this country have changed. One of the members of the European Parliament delegation which was here earlier this week told me that if the choice were to be between inaction and going on without the British, they would go on without the British. I know that that is a reluctant view, but it is a real view. When the Minister replies—after all, he served on the Dooge committee—I hope that he will respond to those questions and give us some insight into what the Foreign Secretary said to the delegation.

On central America, the Alliance believes that the vote of the House of Representatives was very welcome. It is a mistake for people to think that it is simply a matter of a House dominated by Democrats rebuffing a Republican President. Anyone who visits the United States knows that things do not operate in the rather closed way to which we have become accustomed in the United Kingdom. It was a very real rejection of a counterproductive policy.

As the right hon. Member for Leeds, East said, the Government should take more positive action to support the Contadora initiative and urge the United States to be more positive, more conciliatory and more prudent. I hope that they will do so.

There is a rising tide of democracy in Latin America, which is greatly welcome. That is true not only in the Argentine, but in Brazil. I associate myself with the remarks of the Foreign Secretary about the tragic death of its President. A sad exception is Chile, which has an appalling record on human rights, yet the British Government continue to sell it arms and refuse fully to condemn the position there.

I go now across the world to Afghanistan. No one has said very much about that country. If there was some place where the United States was engaged in repression, with 3 million refugees on the border of that country, the Left in British politics would book Trafalgar Square non-stop for two years, yet we hardly hear a cheep about Afghanistan. That shows an extraordinary and unbalanced view of human rights.

I regret that the Soviet Union still has a closed society, so there is no open debate about Afghanistan in the way that the United States has an open debate about Nicaragua, as evidenced by the Congress debates, and as it once had about Vietnam. It is important to consider what will happen in Afghanistan. I do not think that the Russians will leave. Eventually, there will be an absorption of the north. The Pathans in the south up to Kabul—they are, of course, the same people as the Pathans on the other side of the border in Pakistan—will make for a continuing instability.

In discussing refugees, it is not illogical to refer to the poor Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong. The Home Office Select Committee has recommended that the Government should take action. I do not blame the Hong Kong Government because I know that they face many difficulties. At least they do not turn back any refugees. However, because of internal circumstances, the refugees have been in closed camps for more than two years. I have seen them. It is rather like people living in luggage racks in a station. That must come to an end. Britain has a responsibility to take the initiative on international action.

I associate myself with those who complimented the Foreign Secretary on his east European visit. However, there is a new campaign of repression in Poland—170 people have been arrested, including leading opposition leaders. I wonder what pressures the Government are bringing to bear. The balance that the Home Secretary struck was good. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) recently asked what the Foreign Secretary would think if a Russian leader came to Britain and acted in that way. I think that we should welcome that. I would not have the slightest objection to a Russian leader coming to Britain and criticising anybody. I would probably also criticise people. We live in a free society. I wonder whether we can devise some form of relationship between an improvement in human rights in Poland and access to the International Monetary Fund.

The problem with these debates, even when they last until midnight, is that there is never enough time to cover important issues throughout the world. For example, what is happening in Matabeleland is awful. I know that many people in the House are friends of Robert Mugabe, who is a highly intelligent and competent man. He must be pressed to show restraint and leniency. Not only would it be disastrous if Zimbabwe were divided simply on a tribal basis: it would do deep damage to any faint residual chance of a peaceful solution in South Africa—to make no mention of any prospect for more immediate progress in Namibia. I welcome the Foreign Secretary's unequivocal rejection of the unilateral proposition on Namibia by South Africa.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East referred to the United Kingdom cutting off aid to the famine belt in central Africa. That is a bad policy and should be explained by the Minister when he replies to the debate.

The middle east remains a powder keg, with people moving around it with lighted torches. It could blow up at any time. Yet, despite the appalling position in the Lebanon, I am absolutely certain that there is a window of opportunity. The President of the United States has great power. Traditionally, the Republicans in the United States are less under pressure from pressure groups than the Democrats. The President has a chance to do something. The peace initiatives from Hussein and Mubarak should be pressed. If we do not assist the moderates in the middle east, they will be overwhelmed and will disappear. There will be either a Left-wing regime, such as that in Syria, or a fundamentalist uprising, such as that in Iran. That will not only do enormous damage to the stability of that area, but will undermine the future of Israel. I defend the future of Israel, which will not be secured by its temporary military domination. It can be secured only if it succeeds in reaching agreement. We have failed sufficiently to press the United States on this matter. It was wrong at the United Nations for us to abstain on the resolution on Israel and the Lebanon.

Our position on the Iran-Iraq war is deeply unsatisfactory. There is no doubt that trade helps Khomeini. We trade more now than ever before—for example, in motor car parts which help to carry the flower of Iranian youth to the border, where they are shot down by Iraqi machine guns. It is not something of which to be proud.

The Foreign Secretary said that the basis of the Government's foreign policy was the pursuit of peace, freedom and democracy. I can hardly argue with those principles. Sadly, as I think I have brought out in some of my remarks, one must question whether it has always been done. It reminds me of the days when British Airways was always telling us that it took better care of us when it was manifestly obvious that it did not.

The Foreign Secretary also mentioned British interests. As I have said, not for the first time, if one's sole concept of British interest is either British advantage or the furtherance of the ideological priorities of a transient Government, that is inadequate. Britain's real interest lies in the search for fair solutions in the world through developing international groupings, such as the European Community. I point out to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) that Europe's interests are Britain's interests and that Britain's interests are Europe's interests. Agreements that will safeguard human rights, the pursuit of fair trade policies in the developed world, a generous approach to trade in the Third world and a persistent disciplined search for peace are the sort of things that should animate our foreign policy. I have yet to see that they do.

7.10 pm

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): I welcome the dialogue that my right hon. and learned Friend is conducting with the Soviet Union and with eastern Europe. I hope that it will produce substantial and lasting improvements in relations between East and West, but we have to be realistic and recognise the serious limiting factors that there are in the way of that result.

The most serious limiting factor is the nature of the Soviet system itself. In the important debate in another place two days ago a former Foreign Secretary said about the Soviet state:

"it is by its nature a propagandist state; it believes that it has a cause to promote throughout the world; it believes that it is the ultimate destiny of the world to come after greater or lesser, more or fewer upheavals under communist rule, and that it is the duty of the Soviet Union to assist in that process. In holding that view the Soviet Union does not consider itself bound by any treaty obligation that conflicts with that ultimate view."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 23 April 1985; Vol. 462, 1051-2.]

That was said not by a former Conservative Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs but by Lord Stewart of Fulham, a former Labour Foreign Secretary. I find it difficult to disagree with his statement.

The implications of that statement, if it is correct, are that we are in for a long haul if we are to get substantial and lasting results. That is the context in which Mr. Gorbachev has come to power. I do not know, and I doubt whether anybody in the West knows, what Mr. Gorbachev's ambitions and intentions are, but we have to recognise that he has come to the top in a ruthless, rigid and dogmatic school which does not change easily. The motives of the leaders of the Soviet Union are, internally, to retain power for the Communist party of the Soviet Union and, abroad, to expand. They have never known an election. They have not had much economoc success. Their successes have lain in the military sphere and in keeping that extraordinary country together.

People in this country are not aware of the degree of militarisation in the tone of Soviet life. Most Soviet children from an early age have military training at school. A distinguished commentator pointed out the other day that is misleading to say that the Soviet Union has a war machine; it is a war machine. That is the school in which Mr. Gorbachev has been brought up, so he has a long way to go if he wants to make an improvement in relations between East and West.

The first fallacy of some Opposition Members, as shown yesterday at Question Time, is to call for a gesture to Mr. Gorbachev—because he has come to power they think that the West should make a gesture to please him and to show him our sincerity. Against the background that I have outlined that is a naive call.

In reality, is there hope for a long-term improvement? I think that there may be. I believe that the Soviet system contains within it the seeds of failure. We shall find over the coming decade that increasingly it is failing economically. It will be unable to cope with the computer revolution that faces the West. We see some stirrings of dissent that are ruthlessly suppressed. We see those stirrings also in countries of eastern Europe. At some time —exactly when, we cannot predict—the Soviet Union may soften under pressure and may become more liberal; indeed, it may even collapse. Our task, put simply, is to survive until that occurs.

It is wrong to imagine that change is impossible in the Soviet Union's attitude towards the outside world. We saw an important change under Khrushchev when he abandoned the dogma that war between the Soviet system and the free world was inevitable. That was an important step forward. If we hang on and are firm and united it is conceivable that an equally important change may come in future in the outlook of the Soviet Union.

In the meantime, we must expect to see a continuance of the efforts of the Soviet Union to change the correlation of East and West. It will want to establish a greater advantage for the Soviet Communist system over ourselves; in particular it will want to drive the United States out of western Europe. The Soviet Union pursues that objective by military intimidation, by political means, by psychological means, by subversion, by spying, by economic pressures and by fooling us by its use of words. We should not ignore the importance of that last point. For example, the words "peaceful co-existence" and "detente" have an entirely different meaning to the Soviet Union than they do to us.

The second fallacy is to imagine that unilateral concessions from us help to achieve a better attitude on the part of the Soviet Government. The opposite is true. It is only too easy for the Soviet Union to take unilateral concessions by the West as an indication of a loss of will.

There are many fallacies. The third is to imagine that the expulsion of Soviet spies can cause a serious blow to relations between the Soviet Union and the West. The expulsion the other day of the Soviet attachés who had been spying will be forgotten in a fairly short time. It happens regularly. The Soviet Union, which has spies all over the world wherever it has a mission, accepts that it is inevitable from time to time that a few of its people will be expelled. I do not think it makes any difference whether the expulsions are public or whether the people are asked to go privately. When the Labour Government were in power they, to their credit, kicked out a few Soviet spies, sometimes publicly and sometimes in private. If it was done in private, possibly it was not so much out of a fear of a Soviet reaction as a fear of the reaction from their own Back Benchers.

What are the main lessons that I draw for Western policy from the background that I have sketched? One is the overwhelming importance of unity among the Western allies. The main danger to the freedom of the West is in the political sphere. I do not think that there is a danger of an attack against western Europe by the Soviet Union so long as we have sensible defences. The main danger is that the allies will fall out among themselves and that, as a consequence, the United States might withdraw from western Europe. That is the principal objective of Soviet policy in its totality.

The main hope of progress in the disarmament negotiations lies in western unity. The reason the Russians are back in Geneva negotiating about three subjects— strategic missiles, intermediate range nuclear missiles and space defence — is the unity of the western Alliance when faced with a propaganda barrage from the Soviet Union over the installation of cruise and Pershing. That is why the campaigns by CND and other organisations were potentially damaging.

That unity is equally important now that the Geneva talks are under way. I believe that there is a real possibility of proposals on the first two issues — strategic and intermediate-range missiles — being accepted by both sides. I fear, however, that the Soviet Union is all too likely to succumb to the habit into which it has always fallen in past disarmament negotiations of trying to divide the West. I have experience of such negotiations. In 1962, the Americans, British and Russians negotiated for a year in Geneva without any movement on the Soviet side while the Soviet Union tried to divide America and Britain. Because we survived that probing, we eventually achieved the agreement to ban nuclear tests in the atmosphere. That was one of the early breakthroughs in the negotiations between East and West. We should not have achieved it at that time, although we might have done so later, if we had not been united.

It is in that context that I set Mr. Gorbachev's statement that the Soviet Union proposes to freeze deployment of intermediate-range nuclear weapons in Europe. I believe that it was a propaganda statement, for two reasons. First, if it was intended as a serious negotiating proposal he would have made it privately instead of making it in public and having it splashed across every Western newspaper. Secondly, the Soviet Union made a similar statement in 1982 when it declared a moratorium on further deployment of SS20s, but they made no attempt to keep to it in subsequent months. I believe that there will be further pressure from the Soviet Union on the hinge between strategic and intermediate-range missiles and space defence. That is where unity will be important.

It is in that context, too, that I set the agreement between the Prime Minister and President Reagan in December last year, to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary referred today. The agreement covered four important points. First, the Western aim is not to achieve superiority but to maintain balance. Secondly, deployment of any space defence would have to be a matter for negotiations. Thirdly, the overall aim is to enhance and not to undermine deterrence. Fourthly, negotiations should aim to achieve security with reduced levels of offensive systems on both sides. I believe that that is an immensely important agreement.

If the Western Alliance supports the America research programme, as we must because the Soviet Union is certainly conducting its own research, but also supports the United States undertaking that deployment would take place only after negotiations, I believe that that is a posture that the Alliance could sustain and which, through unity on those two points, could enhance the prospect of agreement in Geneva.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): I must confess to listening with some anxiety to speeches such as that of the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker). The right hon. Gentleman's speech was heavy with distrust and dislike or even hatred of the Soviet Union and determination not to move an inch from the position that he has taken up. Not so long ago, the right hon. Gentleman was a Foreign Office Minister and was even a member of the negotiating team trying to reach agreement. He told us today that he expected the Soviet Union to make more than gestures towards reaching an agreement. He seemed almost to be suggesting that the Soviet Union should abandon its whole political philosophy so as to reach agreement with us. I am sure that the Soviet Union does not expect us to abandon our political philosophy, but it would do us no harm to make at least some small gesture. In international negotiations, as in anything else, if a bargain is to be struck there must be something in it for both sides. Each side must gain something from any agreement. If we are not prepared to move an inch, we are most unlikely to reach any agreement.

I congratulate the Foreign Secretary in his absence on his very interesting speech. I do not believe that he has quite the same hardened attitude that we saw in the past. He began his speech today by telling us what had been achieved since he spoke in the debate on the Queen's speech. He is to be congratulated on the agreements that he reached on Hong Kong and Gibraltar. Those agreements are extremely important to the many people living in those places and although the agreements did not please everyone—no agreement would be likely to do that—in all fairness we must congratulate the right hon. and learned Gentleman on a good job well done.

The Foreign Secretary referred to another matter of great importance to me. It is a shame that we have to try to combine a debate about disarmament and peace with a debate about foreign affairs generally. The range of the debate is vast and a number of important matters such as overseas students' fees have been mentioned. The conduct of foreign diplomats, too, has a place in parliamentary debate, but I believe that raising topics of that kind on occasions such as this detracts from their importance. In my view, disarmament should be discussed on its own because it is fundamental to everything else that we discuss in the House.

We have great difficulty in financing all that we want to do in our own country. Yet we still spend between £18 billion and £20 billion per year on defence. If we could claw back some of that, we could make some progress towards improving the social conditions of our country. Therefore, quite apart from whether we are likely to survive to see the end of the century, which is questionable in view of the way the world is going, in the meantime we are spending an unnecessarily large amount on defence.

Several hon. Members have referred to the strategic defence initiative. I believe that President Reagan first mentioned it in 1983. He said that he was planning to embark on research into the project and that the cost of the research alone would be $26 billion. Attitudes have changed a little since then, but at that time President Reagan maintained that if the research was successful it might end the threat of nuclear missiles to the whole world because he would be prepared to share the fruits of his research with the Soviet Union. I do not know how many right hon. and hon. Members remember that.

However, is it not interesting that when the Prime Minister came back from addressing Congress in the United States, where she had thrown her full weight behind the stategic defence initiative, she said at the Dispatch Box that it was necessary to go ahead with that research because the Soviet Union had been engaged on it for so long? Seven years was the time that she mentioned. Is it logical to suggest that the Soviet Union has been engaged in that research for seven years, and then for President Reagan to suggest that he would share the fruits of his research with the Soviet Union if it was successful? If the Soviet Union is ahead of us by seven years, it will certainly not be waiting around for the fruits of President Reagan's research. And of course the Soviet Union does not believe that President Reagan would share those fruits in any case. Is it sensible to believe that any country would spend $26 billion trying to get ahead in the arms race and then, at the end of it, freely, without charge and without any obligation, hand over the results of that research to the country it regards as its sworn enemy? I doubt it very much.

When the Soviet Union sees the research going on, it must carry out its own. It is reluctant to do so. Of course that is so. Every penny in the budget that is spent on defence is a penny less from what could be spent on improving the conditions for the people in the Soviet Union, in the same way as the £20 billion that we spend in this country comes from the pockets of taxpayers, and as such cannot be used to give us the things that we sadly lack at present. I need not go into them because we continually discuss all the things that are required to be done to improve conditions in our country.

If one thinks that one can go ahead with a research project valued at $26 billion and, at the end of it, call a halt if one decides not to go ahead with the project, one is mistaken. A business will be built up on the back of the expenditure, and many scientists and other workers will be involved. So much profit will be made from it and there will be so much investment by big business that the project will be carried on simply by its own momentum. All those things will carry it forward to such an extent that one will be unable to stop it when the research comes to an end. To begin and go on with the research implies that the whole project will be carried out, in my opinion.

What is the defence initiative for? If it is a defence mechanism, it is hardly foolproof. It has now been admitted that it cannot be regarded as 100 per cent. certain in its results. Even if there is only 5 per cent. uncertainty, the whole reason for having it is destroyed. If it is successful, it means that it is a shield behind which the United States can sit and dominate the rest of the world. It certainly will not share that with the Soviet Union. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said, this has already been likened to going back to the days when the United States was the only possessor of the atom bomb. The Americans could hold the world to ransom at that time. If this shield is successful and they sit behind it, once more they will be able to dominate the world and try to push it around.

Let us not forget that the United States contemplated using the atom bomb even after it had used it for the first time at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Many hon. Members will recall that Mr. Attlee, who was Prime Minister at the time, had to fly out there to dissuade the Americans from using it.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: Will the hon. Gentleman deal with the problem that SDI, if carried out correctly, is entirely a defensive mechanism and is not aggressive? That is different from the situation that he was describing when the United States had a monopoly of aggression.

Mr. Lamond: I shall try to explain briefly. If the United States is successful in developing this 100 per cent. foolproof shield behind which it can sit, it can defend itself against everyone else, but the Americans' weapons are available to them because no one else has the shield that they enjoy. Therefore, they would have the same monopoly that they had when they alone possessed the atom bomb.

I should like to give my personal point of view about one or two matters. First, I should like to look at the facts about who is responsible, not just in the past few years, but since the end of the last war, for the arms race. I have looked at the information provided by "World Military and Social Expenditures 1981", of which, I am sure, many Conservative Members will know. It is certainly not a Soviet publication. In it one can see a history of the arms race. In 1945 the United States had the atomic bomb. In 1949 the USSR perfected its own. The Russians were four years behind in that arms race. In 1979 NATO was formed. I accept that it was a defence alliance, but it was formed fast. As a response to NATO, the Warsaw pact was formed in 1955. We should remember that. We should also recall that the Warsaw pact countries have, on several occasions, suggested that both NATO and the Warsaw pact should be dissolved and that we should go forward towards that position.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lamond: I do not want to give way too often because there is pressure on time, but I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

Sir Bernard Braine: This historical excursion is of great interest. Will the hon. Gentleman tell us whose tanks rolled against Hungary in 1956, who seized control by the same means in Czechoslovakia in 1968 and who has shot down Polish workers? Has there been any comparable invasion of the eastern Europe of the Soviet Union by NATO forces in that period?

Mr. Lamond: Again, I do not want to stray too far from what I intended saying, but I remind the right hon. Gentleman that we in this country were a little inhibited from being too critical at that time because of our own actions in Suez. Some people would believe that that was also an attempt by force to invade a neutral country. We could trade those statements for a long time, but I should like to look at historical facts.

One of my hon. Friends has just told me that I made a mistake when I gave the date for NATO. It was in 1949 that NATO was formed, and in 1955 the Warsaw pact was formed.

In 1954 the United States perfected the hydrogen bomb. A year later the USSR did so. With regard to intercontinental ballistic missiles, I must be fair, because on this occasion the Soviet Union led the way. It had them in 1957 and the United States had them in 1958. In 1966, however, the United States perfected its multiple warheads and in 1968 the Soviet Union followed suit. In 1983 the neutron bomb was perfected by the United States. The Soviet Union has not so far perfected such a bomb. Those facts lead one to believe that the arms race has been led by the West, and by the United States in particular.

I should like to ask who is serious about disarmament. My hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson) said that we should try to inform people about what is going on not only in peace negotiations and talks, but at the United Nations, because it is extremely difficult to obtain any information in this country about resolutions that have been passed at the United Nations, who voted for them and even what the resolutions contained. However, the United States alone voted against several resolutions that were carried at the United Nations.

On the prevention of an arms race in outer space, only the United States voted against the resolution. Great Britain, to our shame, abstained. On the prohibition of chemical and bacteriological weapons, a resolution which urged the intensification of efforts to establish a working group to negotiate a treaty, only the United States voted against it. On the resolution welcoming the report of the Palme commission, an independent commission on disarmament and security, which many hon. Members welcomed, only the United States voted against it.

Again, only the United States voted against the resolution on the prohibition of the development and manufacture of new types of weapons of mass destruction. With the exception of Greece, the NATO nations abstained. Only the United States voted against the resolution calling for a study on the naval arms race. On the call to implement the decisions of the second special session on disarmament, only the United States voted against the resolution. The NATO nations, with the exception of Greece, abstained. On bilateral nuclear arms negotiations, a resolution

"urging the USA and USSR to examine the possibility of combining into a single forum the two series of negotiations they have been carrying out and to include 'tactical' nuclear weapons", only the United States voted against. I shall not weary the House by mentioning other United Nations resolutions, but there have been many. The actions of the United States do not reflect very well upon that country.

I do not think that many British people realise that these resolutions were opposed by the United States and that sometimes Great Britain abstained from voting. A great deal could be done to interest people in the struggle for world peace and development. It was agreed at the second special session on disarmament at the United Nations that peace studies should be encouraged in our schools. That must come as a surprise to certain Conservative Members of Parliament. They object to peace studies in our schools and do not seem to realise that we agreed to their introduction when we accepted the United Nations resolution.

The resolutions of the United Nations ought to be given greater publicity, because it is very difficult to obtain information about that body. Even the United Nations parliamentary group, of which I am a member, is a sickly organisation. Very few hon. Members bother to turn up and take part in its activities. I wonder why. There seems to be a conspiracy to try to blacken the name of the United Nations because the West, in particular the United States, cannot get its own way there. When it was founded, the United States did not believe that in time many independent nations would become members of the United Nations and might vote against US proposals.

I believe that there should be regular statements in the House about the progress of the peace talks. Those which have just ended in Geneva were bilateral. However, this country is directly involved in the Stockholm peace talks and we shall be involved in those which are to take place in Ottawa and elsewhere. This country is also taking part in the Vienna peace talks. Surely it would be reasonable for the Foreign Secretary to tell us from time to time about the initiatives which have been taken by this country. If this country is doing all that the Foreign Secretary referred to in his speech, why should we not take credit for it? Why should we not bask in the glory of having taken such initiatives? If we were told about them, it would be encouraging. I am perfectly happy to give the Foreign Secretary credit where credit is due. I should not attack him for taking the initiative in peace talks, but I would like to hear about them.

Hon. Members may have noticed that certain United States Congressmen were present at the recent peace talks in Geneva. I believe that they were members of the team. Members of the Select Committee on Defence or the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs should attend the talks in Stockolm which are to continue for about three years and should provide the House with information upon their return. The very important peace work that is being carried on should be publicised. This House should be the vehicle through which encouragement is given to the community as a whole to take an interest in it. It must be left to Government representatives to conduct the negotiations, which ought to be greatly encouraged. Parliament is the means by which information can be channelled to the public, and I believe that those who attend the negotiations would be only too happy to let the public know what is happening. Even a little more information about the negotiations would be well worth while.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): About 20 hon. Members are still hoping to speak in the debate. Therefore, I appeal for short speeches.

7.47 pm

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): The hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond) has not, I am afraid, allayed the fears of my hon. Friends after the allegations made in another place by my noble Friend Lord Orr-Ewing. However, I am sure that we all agree with the kind and generous remarks of the hon. Gentleman about the Foreign Secretary's negotiations over Hong Kong and Gibraltar.

Mr. James Lamond rose——

Mr. MacKay: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Lamond: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, for I wish to refer to his opening remarks. I deliberately refrained from dealing with that matter in my speech because I did not want to take time on it. However, I have already said in the House, and I repeat it now, that all that was said about my membership of the World Peace Council is correct. It is contained in the reference books and in my declaration of interests. I am proud of it, and I would not deny it for a moment. However, I deny the allegation that the World Peace Council is financed by the Soviet Union. I have already said in the House, and I repeat, that if anybody can prove to me that money for the World Peace Council comes from the Government of the Soviet Union, or from any other Government, I shall resign immediately from it. I can say no more than that in answer to the allegations. It is impossible to prove otherwise. However, those who make allegations have a responsibility to prove, if they can, the truth of those allegations.

Mr. MacKay: It is for hon. Members to decide whom they wish to believe.

I am conscious of the fact that many hon. Members wish to take part in this immensely important debate, and the House ought to have an opportunity to deal in general rather than in specific terms with foreign affairs. It is also important for the House to have an opportunity to judge how successful the Government have been in that area.

If we are to assess the Government's record, we must look first at the aims of their foreign affairs policy. Our aims should link with those of our allies—to ensure that there is British and Western influence in the world, that British trade should be successful, that our friends throughout the world are sustained and that those friends are people of whom we can be proud.

An important aim of our policy should be long-term peace and security. As many countries as possible should join in the parliamentary democratic experience and enjoy the sort of human rights that all British citizens have.

Another aim of our policy should be that those organisations of which we are proud to be members, such as NATO, the European Community and the Commonwealth, should prosper and have influence throughout the world. Let us look at each of those briefly and individually.

Mr. Soames: I hope that my hon. Friend will be brief.

Mr. MacKay: I promise my hon. Friend that I shall be brief. I know that we are all particularly anxious to hear his contribution to the debate.

It is vital that we have a policy which is firm and fair. That was well illustrated in our policy on the Falkland Islands and in gaining a settlement in Hong Kong and Gibraltar. It is recognisable that throughout the ages the bully or the aggressor will not attack if it can be seen that we are prepared to defend ourselves. That was true in the 1930s and it was true of General Galtieri only two or three years ago. That is why our policy has been successful in standing up to Soviet aggression and why, since Afghanistan, Soviet expansion has been restrained throughout the world.

We were told that there would be a domino effect in south-east Asia after the fall of Vietnam and Cambodia, but that has just not happened. Thailand, Malaysia and Indonesia are strong, vibrant and economically successful. In Africa, important strategic countries, such as Egypt, Somalia and the Sudan, are no longer under Soviet influence. Further south in that continent there are considerable changes in Mozambique and Angola.

Only 10 years ago the phrase "the soft underbelly of Europe" was used extensively. There were fears for Italy and real fears for Portugal, Spain and Greece. All those fears, due to strong Western policy, have been ill founded.

[Mr. MacKay]

As has been mentioned earlier during the debate, there is also movement within the Eastern bloc. That is why my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary's recent visit behind the iron curtain to eastern Europe has been so widely welcomed on both sides of the House. I entirely endorse what my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) said earlier. That will lead to a real possibility of progress at the peace talks.

We are now living in an atmosphere of reality. Like other hon. Members, I welcome the accession of Mr. Gorbachev. We should not be starry-eyed about his leadership, but it has two great assets. One is that there is a fair chance, if his health holds up, that we shall have the same Soviet leader for a decade or more, which has not been the case for the past 15 years in the Soviet Union. Secondly, we have a man of a generation which at least understands how the West works. Therefore, under his leadership, mistakes will not be made within the Kremlin in the foreseeable future.

The second aspect of our policy is the backing of good friends and the influencing of our allies. It is fair occasionally to be critical of our American allies. In the past they have often backed regimes which have been unsavoury, to say the least. If a regime has been anti-Communist, that has been sufficient reason for them to support and sustain it. I am sure that the Americans would not be having their difficulties in Nicaragua now with the Sandinista regime if they had not backed General Somoza for so long. That was a major mistake.

It is immensely encouraging that in central America now the Americans, together with their allies, are backing democracies and ensuring that parliamentary elections take place. It was particularly encouraging that in Belize, which was our particular responsibility, there was a peaceful and successful election a little earlier this year.

Developments in Honduras and Guatemala are mildly encouraging and in El Salvador they are immensely encouraging. That is why I took issue earlier with the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) who, after my intervention, rightly acknowledged his support for President Duarte and the fact that two elections have now taken place in that unfortunate country which have led to President Duarte's party, a moderate centrist party, being elected.

If we wish to sustain and encourage moderate democratically elected leaders in central America, we must give them the aid that they request. If the Government of El Salvador request military assistance, such as the training of some of their troops, that should be forthcoming. President Duarte has a major internal terrorist problem, from both extreme Left-wing guerrillas and Right-wing despots. It is only by having a well-trained, incorruptible army, which we can organise, that he will have a fair chance of survival. El Salvador and the Contadora initiatives are the two most pivotal aspects of long-term peace in central America. When the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) sums up for the Opposition, I hope that he will have second thoughts about what the right hon. Member for Leeds, East said earlier. That is not something that the Opposition should sustain.

Elsewhere in the American continent we have also seen a return to democracy. Rightly, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary referred to the tragic and untimely death of President Neves. We all hope that Brazil will continue along the democratic path. The signs are good. Anybody can return briefly to parliamentary democracy, but it is only when a Government are defeated and a new Government of a slightly different political persuasion come in that one realises that parliamentary democracy is taking root. I am referring to Peru. It is in that continent's interest that Argentina has returned to democracy. It is encouraging that its democratically elected Government are bringing to trial those previous leaders in military juntas who allegedly committed most serious crimes against humanity and the people of that country.

In the longer term, I believe that it will lead to a settlement of the Falklands dispute and, because it goes hand in hand, the resumption of diplomatic relations between Britain and Argentina. I appreciate that that will take time and that the wounds of the Falklands war will have to heal. We should not push the democratically elected Government in Argentina too quickly, but in that centrist, democratically elected Government there lies a real chance for a better relationship in the longer term, and we should wish them well.

Mr. Soames: Has my hon. Friend concluded his remarks?

Mr. MacKay: If I seemed to pause somewhat overlong, it was because, in deference, among others, to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), I was dispensing with several pages of my notes, so enabling other hon. Members to take part in the debate.

We should consider the way in which we have sustained democracy in southern Europe—a matter that is vital to our long-term interests. The inclusion of Portugal, Spain and Greece in the European Community should be welcome. A few years ago there was the possibility of a return to military rule in those countries or of extreme Left-wing Governments taking over. That is no longer the case, largely because of their inclusion in NATO and the EC.

The portents for elections this summer in Greece are not good. What Prime Minister Papandreou has done so far this year is not encouraging. One must wonder what would happen in the European Community—I appreciate that this is hypothetical — should democratic elections not take place in a member state. We must watch carefully what happens in Greece in the next few months.

It is important for the House to have regular debates of this kind. We have an important and influential role to play in the world as an individual nation, as a member of the EC, as a member of NATO and because of our position in the Commonwealth. We also have a Prime Minister who is widely respected on the world stage. Trips such as her recent visit to south-east Asia should be encouraged, not discouraged, because they act not only in the interests of British trade and influence but in the interests of world peace. We should be heard more in the councils of the world. I hope that the Prime Minister will make many more such highly successful visits.

I caution Opposition Members who attempt to rubbish trips of that sort. My experience in my constituency, during the county council election campaigns and on other occasions, has been that their efforts in that respect have been counter-productive electorally. The Government's record on foreign affairs is extremely good. Their policy has been sustained, and we wish them well in the future.

8.5 pm

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): While I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate, I must express slight disquiet, as have other hon. Members, about it being such a general debate when many specific issues should concentrate our minds.

I shall concentrate on the issues of Namibia and South Africa. The House will not be surprised when I say that I was disappointed by the Foreign Secretary's speech. I concede that it was an improvement on his previous speech; on this occasion he uttered two sentences about Namibia, whereas last time he uttered only one. Beyond that, he told us nothing new.

The issue of Namibia is important because it is an international matter. It has concerned people throughout the world since the League of Nations awarded the mandate for South-West Africa to South Africa in 1922. The territory has come to be known as Namibia.

It is worth spending a while considering the definition of the purposes of the mandate system. In 1917-18 there was a great deal of discussion about the possibility of the League of Nations awarding mandates. Credit for the definition of the purposes of the mandate system is generally attributed to General Smuts, who wrote in 1918 in his book, "League of Nations: A Practical System":

"The mandatory state should look upon its position as a great trust and honour, not as an office of profit or as a position of private advantage for it or its nationals."

He went on to write that the basis of the mandate system lay in the fact that "the well-being and development of primitive peoples form a sacred trust of civilisation."

I accept that General Smuts was referring, in particular, to the Austria-Hungarian, Russian and Turkish empires and that Smuts never considered Germany's African colonies as being suitable for self-government. Nevertheless, the principle of "a sacred trust for civilisation" was admirable.

Notwithstanding General Smuts's derogatory attitude and feelings towards Africans, the League of Nations nevertheless awarded the mandate to South Africa, and it is worth considering briefly the South African Government's record in discharging that sacred trust of the mandate for Namibia.

The facts are that 60 per cent. of the land, including the main diamond and mineral bearing areas, is reserved for the white population, who form only 7 per cent. of the population; 40 per cent. of the land is designated for blacks, who form 93 per cent. of the population. The per capita income for whites is double that of blacks, and well over half of all black workers are migrant labourers, often working hundreds of miles away from home. In other words, the sacred trust has been a sacred trust of exploitation.

When we discuss Namibia — we have, of course, been over this many times before—certain matters must be borne in mind. The House will recall that in 1978, South Africa sabotaged the immediate implementation of Security Council resolution 435 by organising its own "internal elections" in the autumn of that year. That so-called interim, or transitional, Government in Namibia collapsed.

Since the Conservatives came to office, they have expressed optimism that resolution 435 would be implemented. In 1980, the present Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, then the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, anticipated the prospect of Namibian independence in 1981. However, in January 1981 the United Nations pre-implementation meeting in Geneva broke down. The right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour), then the Lord Privy Seal, told the House:

"There is no question but that the failure of the conference in Geneva a few months ago was the fault of the South African Government, who decided at that stage that they did not want an agreement."—[Official Report, 7 May 1981; Vol. 4, c. 284.]

However, the Government and the so-called Contact Group of five persisted in trying to reach agreement with South Africa. In the autumn of 1981, officials of the Contact Group visited Africa and on 10 December 1981, in a joint communiqué, the Foreign Ministers of the Contact Group expressed the hope that the "agreement of all concerned can be reached on the earliest possible date, thus opening the way for the implementation of S.C.R. 435 in 1982".

It is now 1985, and agreement is as far away as ever. We now understand that progress has been impeded by the South African and American insistence that the issue of Cuban troops in Angola must be linked with the independence of Namibia.

On 6 September 1982, the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), then the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, wrote to the secretary of the Anti-Apartheid Movement saying:

"The Five are doing all they can to hasten implementation of Security Council Resolution 435 and have made encouraging progress in recent discussions in New York. Certain aspects still have to be finalised, but all those involved in the talks have shown themselves ready to move as quickly as possible to implementation."

Time has passed, and we still make no progress. I have told the Government many times that South Africa has no intention whatsoever of implementing the Security Council resolution. Their past and present prevarication is clear proof. Last week the South African Government said that they intended to impose a transitional Government based on the so-called multi-party conference proposals. That is clearly in defiance of the United Nations, and a massive snub to the Contact Group of five of which our Government are a member.

I understand that Mr. Shultz of the United States warned South Africa not to proceed with that plan. No attention has been paid to that warning.

What do the Government intend to do? At best, the idea of a transitional Government will delay Namibian independence. South Africa will say that the transitional Government need time to establish themselves. Later, they will say, as they attempted to do in 1981, that South Africa is no longer the negotiator and that the negotiations will have to be conducted with the transitional Government. That will mean that no negotiations can proceed.

Precisely what is the Government's attitude to the idea of a multi-party Government for Namibia? Will the Minister say unequivocally that our Government will have no truck with it? That must be made clear, because it appears that the Federal Republic of Germany takes a different view. I shall quote from a broadcast by the Johannesburg radio home service on 17 April:

"Our Africa desk reports that the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the FRG parliament, Dr. Werner Marx, says the FRG Government supports an interim government in South West Africa. The committee, together with the FRG Department of Foreign Affairs, determines the country's foreign policy . . . In an interview with the South West Africa information office in Bonn, Dr. Marx said the FRG supported an interim government in the territory, as long as it did not make a unilateral declaration of independence and did not lay claim to international recognition. Such a government could bring great advantages to the territory and there was no reason why the FRG should not support it."

Whatever may be said about the transitional Government not being a substitute for resolution 435, experience tells us that the Government always say that they have to deal with realities. Technically, the British Government's position on the linkage of the question of Cuban troops with Namibian independence is that it is not a formal precondition and not part of resolution 435, but that it is a reality that cannot be discounted and must be part of the negotiations.

It is clear that honeyed words from the Government simply encourage South Africa in its intransigence. As a matter of urgency, the United Nations Security Council should be convened to discuss the issue of Namibia, and should under chapter 7 of the United Nations charter impose mandatory economic sanctions. Otherwise, there will be yet further delay. Governments who fail to act will carry a heavy responsibility for the loss of life in Namibia, the continued repression, the detention without trial and the torture carried out by South African police and troops.

As soon as sanctions are mentioned, Conservative Members will say, first, that sanctions hurt the blacks much more than the whites and, secondly, that the majority of blacks are opposed to sanctions. The Minister of State said that during a recent foreign affairs Question Time. The South African Government often use that line of attack. I find it incongruous that the South African Government will pray in aid the fact that the majority of blacks are in favour of investment in white-owned industry, but will not discuss with them the democratic running of South Africa.

Mr. John Carlisle: It is not South African figures that show that blacks are opposed to disinvestment. The figures are taken from the most recent opinion poll, carried out by the MORI organisation. According to that poll, 75 per cent. of blacks questioned opposed disinvestment.

The Schlemmer report, too, had nothing to do with the South African Government. It was completely independent, and came to the same conclusion. The hon. Gentleman cannot lay that at the door of the South African Government.

Mr. Hughes: The first part of that intervention reinforces my point. The South African Government are prepared to use public opinion polls to determine black attitudes but they are not prepared to negotiate with the blacks about democratic rights in their own country.

I am glad that the hon. Gentleman drew my attention to the Schlemmer report.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Is my hon. Friend aware of the report in The Guardian this morning, to the effect that Mr. Richard Lugar, the Republican chairman of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, has parted company with President Reagan and has introduced a Bill on sanctions that will probably be passed, because it has all-party support? Are not the British Government now in splendid isolation on the issue of sanctions?

Mr. Hughes: I shall take up that point later.

I concede—I have never denied it—that there are black people in South Africa who oppose sanctions. However, it is likely that many more people would advocate sanctions and disinvestment if to do so was not probably an offence under section 54 of the Internal Security Act 1982 to make such statements.

As the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) said, a study has been published entitled "Black Worker Attitudes—Political options, Capitalism and Investment in South Africa". It is by Lawrence Schlemmer of the Centre for Applied Social Sciences at the University of Natal, Durban, and was funded by the United States Department of State. The survey was conducted among black workers "in the sector in which most multi-national companies operate — the manufacturing sector — the sample was restricted to black male production workers".

A total of 551 interviews was conducted. There are some 15 million Africans in the country.

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman need not deny it. It is all in the report. Does the hon. Gentleman wish to deny that the number was 551?

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Hughes: If the hon. Gentleman is denying that 551 black workers were surveyed, I shall gladly give way to him because I have the figures here. The sample can hardly be regarded as representative. I do not doubt the integrity of the study or its methodology, but it is a quantum leap to deduce that 551 workers represent the majority of black opinion.

There are many parts of the Schlemmer study on which people are silent. For example, 56 per cent. of those surveyed said that they supported armed confrontation by blacks to achieve Namibian independence. When asked

"If the African National Congress were to come in secretly asking people to help it, which of the following would happen in your area? Most people would help it. Not most but a large number would help it. Only a few would help it."

no fewer than 42 per cent. said that most would help the African National Congress. We do not hear anything about that.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): If the hon. Gentleman is saying that the majority of those in the survey showed enthusiasm for armed revolution and support of the ANC, does that not suggest that his other argument—that it might be unlawful in South Africa to advocate economic sanctions—is unlikely to have had any effect on those who were asked their opinions?

Mr. Hughes: Precisely the opposite conclusion can be drawn. If there were no restriction on what people could say, they would speak much more openly. Some of the attitudes revealed by the Schlemmer study must be a warning to the South African Government, which lay great store by the survey. I could quote the survey almost for ever because it reveals interesting attitudes, but I shall not.

If such a survey were carried out now and used precisely the same methods, I believe that it would reveal a great change because recent events at Uitenhage have shocked and horrified the world. The mass arrests, detentions and denunciation of the United Democratic Front leadership demonstrate that the South African Government cannot tolerate any freedom of discussion or any democratic organisation which opposes their views.

Any internal call for the ending of apartheid is regarded as treason, and attempts are made to crush them by every legal means and every means of brutal repression. It is said that there have been reforms which should be welcomed, but they are intended not to end apartheid but to buttress and entrench it. The tricameral Parliament is a cruel and callous charade because there is no real change and white Members of Parliament outnumber Asian and coloured ones. The South African Government's defence of that is perfectly simple and logical. They say that there are more white Members of Parliament than Asian and coloured ones because their numbers represent the ratio of such groups in the country. That argument merely reinforces the idiocy of there being no black African parliamentary representation. Logic compels one to the conclusion that there should be a majority of black Members in the South African Parliament. The South African Government cannot have it all ways.

We have recently heard the promise to repeal the Mixed Marriages Act. I accept that that will help individuals. If people are allowed to marry across the colour lines, much hardship and heartrending will be avoided. However, it hardly dents the apartheid system. Indeed, the ending of that Act creates as many problems as it cures. For example, where will the partners of a mixed marriage live? They are still restricted by the Group Areas Act. How will their children be classified as to race? One South African commentator has said:

"there will be no upward mobility".

A white man who marries a black woman will be downgraded and any children will not be classed as their father.

I do not subscribe to the view that there is a comprehensive change in attitude or climate for the democratic process in South Africa. I fear for its future, as the prospects for peaceful change are receding. Recent events show that, 25 years after Sharpeville, the South Africans have learnt nothing. They still intend to maintain their domination of the non-white population by brute force of arms. They cannot succeed in the long run. They must realise that, but, in the long run, they will cause tremendous bloodshed and chaos.

The Foreign Secretary said that the Government cannot support policies which cause violence and chaos. I tell him more in anger than in sorrow that that is exactly what he is doing. The Africans in South Africa have shown a restraint and constraint which is altogether quite exceptional. There has been no retaliation against the white population for Sharpeville, Soweto or Uitenhage. How long that can continue is anybody's guess. Whites have a lot to thank the African National Congress of South Africa for, with its policy of non-racialism.

If there is to be dialogue on the future of South Africa, the Government will have to shift. The most significant move would be the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela, Govan M'Beki, Walter Sisulu and all African National Congress and Pan African Congress political prisoners and the legalisation of ANC and PAC. Such a move would reduce tension dramatically and generate optimism for the future.

It is regrettable that experience shows that the South African Government are incapable of changing the character of apartheid or of learning from past tragedies. Regrettably, it appears that the British Government are incapable of doing anything to assist change. The South African Government will not change unless they are compelled to. It requires sanctions to convince them of our seriousness in favour of ending apartheid.

If we do not act soon, we shall perpetuate South African repression and share responsibility for the consequences. If the Government are serious in their condemnation of the evil of apartheid, they must act now, before it is too late.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I hope that the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) will forgive me if I do not follow his interesting speech on Namibia. I was delighted to hear his tribute to Jan Smuts, who was a great South African and a statesman of world stature who, it will be recalled, was the author of the concept of a commonwealth of nations. It is tragic that no man of his stature has emerged in South Africa since his death.

I join those who have paid tribute to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, especially on visiting so many iron curtain countries recently and yet managing somehow to convey the concern of the West at the continued violation of human rights characteristic of all of them.

I do not know whether any other hon. Member has done so, but I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute also to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who paved the way for my right hon. and learned Friend. His conduct and bearing in Poland not only moved the civilised world, but earned him the lasting admiration and gratitude of the extensive Polish community in this country.

It was right for my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to visit Poland and Czechoslovakia, and equally right for him to talk to Church leaders there and to identify our people with the murdered priest Father Popieluszko, the manner of whose death symbolised all that is so cruel and repellent in Communist countries. My right hon. and learned Friend came to two conclusions: first, that it is possible to conduct wide-ranging discussions with the Soviet Union and eastern and central European countries; and, secondly, that we should make plain in such discussions the inadequacy of their human rights performance.

We should not be under any illusions. What matters is not discussions, but performance—not words but deeds. I wonder whether my right hon. and learned Friend, after his experience, does not have reservations in his heart. Does he believe that a genuine and lasting detente with the Soviet Union is possible, and that there is a real possibility of our ending the arms race?

I ask that question because it is not arms that make for war, but the tensions and rivalries, the hatreds and misunderstandings that trigger off problems and disrupt relations between states and within states.

To mark the 40th anniversary of the Yalta protocols in 1945, I put down an early-day motion at the beginning of the year, which attracted an almost unprecedented number of signatures drawn from all parties. There were 246 in all. The early-day motion noted that the Soviet Union unilaterally broke both the letter and the spirit of the Yalta protocols within months of their being concluded. It went on to say that the House

"deplores the resultant widespread and systematic abuse of human rights which still continues to this day; supports peaceful endeavours by the peoples concerned to regain their rights; and urges Her Majesty's Government . . . to declare its refusal to accept the division of Europe into spheres of influence and to reaffirm the right of the peoples of Central and Eastern Europe to genuine self-determination."

Why was it necessary to put down such a motion? Why did so many Members feel that they had to sign it? The answer is that for the peoples of eastern and central Europe —some of us remember the sacrifices of the Poles and Czechs during the war in defence of these islands—and for their displaced emigré survivors, time has stood still since 1945, while the rest of the world has moved on. In the period when self-determination was the order of the day, when General Smuts's vision of a commonwealth of nations was developing before our eyes, when western colonial empires were being dismantled, the Soviet grip on an area hitherto composed of independent states, save for temporary Nazi occupation, was tightening and consolidating.

My right hon. and learned Friend spoke of 40 years of peace, and I then became a little sceptial. Who paid the price for that peace? Who stood in the way of the Soviet tanks that roared into Hungary, and of those who slaughtered Hungarian patriots and hanged their leaders in 1956? Who was it who moved the newly formed Warsaw pact forces into Czechoslovakia to destroy the smiling face of Socialism in 1968? Who shot down Polish workers, ending the first ray of light out of eastern Europe—the Solidarity trade union? Who was responsible for all that?

A decade ago, gradualist hopes were invested in Poland. Today, the Hungarian experiment engages our attention. Sadly, experience shows that, at the end of every tunnel of hope in central and eastern Europe, there stands a Communist thug in police uniform or a Soviet tank to shatter the dream. For the West to view Yalta as no more than an unfortunate historical event, as some have pretended it is, is to fail to understand the underlying cause of East-West tensions. Yalta left an ambivalent legacy that wrong-footed the search for peace and security from the outset and it continued to obstruct all attempts to ensure East-West co-existence and to promote orderly and reassuring change.

World leaders as widely different ideologically as President Mitterrand in France and President Reagan in the United States have denounced Yalta. According to the USSR, however, Yalta legitimised its hegemony in eastern Europe, and Western denials merely add to existing tensions. Confusion surrounding this issue surely makes reassessment desirable.

Stability in eastern and central Europe is desirable. It is essential to the Soviet Union—we are the first to recognise that—but it is also essential to us and to world peace. It is self-deceptive to assume that the people concerned—the Poles, Czechs and Hungarians—will remain sullenly submissive at all times if the West does nothing but encourage false hopes. The Solidarity trade union and the continuing underground opposition in Poland are living proof that dissent does not need Western prompting. Although the lessons of Hungary in 1956 have been thoroughly digested by people east of the Elbe, the Soviets can never hope to placate and satisfy their hostages under existing rules and conditions. Yet the system over which they preside makes it almost certain that opposition movements—some small, some dangerously large—will emerge.

A few days before his murder, Father Popieluszko gave an interview to the journalist Mary Craig. He affirmed:

"I'd be happier meeting death in a worthwhile cause than sitting back and letting injustice go unchallenged."

Others may feel the same. His was only a more eloquent expression of the view that is gaining ground rather than weakening in eastern and central Europe. It is surely irrational and unjust to expect heroic people of this kind to pick up the bill because the West finds it convenient to do and say nothing. It is shortsighted, too, since, the region may exert an increasingly destabilising effect on world peace. Clearly, there has to be a new approach.

Does my hon. Friend the Secretary of State envisage a further period of no war, of phoney peace, so that our children and grandchildren in the early decades of the next century will still be faced with Warsaw pact forces on one side, standing over prostrate bodies of once independent nations, and NATO forces on the other? Will this uneasy, unsettled situtation go on and on? Of course not. The bubble must burst. Western leaders could begin by ending the hypocrisy that has been practised for more than 40 years by formally denouncing Yalta. Such a declaration should make it clear that the minutes of the meetings of the Big Three did not constitute a treaty or an international agreement, because the intention that the document should create legal relationships was absent.

I have no illusions about this. It is ludicrous to admit that the Soviet security interest in dominating half of Europe reinforces Soviet fears of the West's aggresive intent. There has never been such an intent. NATO is a defensive alliance. The peoples of the West long for peace and justice. We may differ here in our approach to the subject, especially nuclear arms, but there is no man or woman in this country who does not want a peaceful understanding with the peoples of the Soviet Union and eastern and central Europe. No one here wants collision and conflict.

Why not accompany a repudiation of Yalta with a reaffirmation of commitment to the Helsinki final act, which guarantees existing frontiers in eastern and central Europe? Why not proclaim an unwavering conciliatory programme of economic and social contacts designed to promote understanding and common interests? Such a trumpet call would not bring the walls of Jericho tumbling down, but the cruel mould of Yalta would be broken and the way opened, as never before, to intensive rethinking about the future of all Europe.

In the modern world, foreign policy cannot and must not be divorced from human rights. I agree with the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston). We have moved on from the days in the middle of the last century when Lord Palmerston said:

"Our guiding rule is to promote and advance, as far as we can, the interests of the country to which we have the good fortune to belong and which we have the honour to serve. We have no lasting union with this or that country—no identification of policy with another. We have no natural enemies, no perpetual friends."

That was as good a definition of foreign policy as anyone could have found in the heyday of British imperial power when the Royal Navy guarded all the seas. But such a definition is totally inadequate in today's world. With the advance of communications technology, the globe has begun to shrink and to shrink fast. As a result, there are no more remote places. No part of the world is now safe from the missiles of a determined enemy or can hide itself from the all-seeing eyes of vehicles in space. Whether we like it or not, the condition of independence is, paradoxically, that we accept a growing measure of interdependence. We are no longer free to do what we will and to ignore the consequences. We are discovering that our industrial effluents can poison our neighbour's water; his atmospheric pollution can lead to acid rain destroying our forests. Our joint survival requires recognition of our duty to one another and the acceptance of sensible rules.

As an outward expression of this growing interdependence, we have created supranational organisations and rules of conduct. To resolve disputes, we have the United Nations. This imperfect organisation and these arrangements have not always worked very well, but if we did not have them, we would have to invent them. As the world shrinks, so we become increasingly conscious of what is happening beyond our shores. People in Britain and north America are shocked to find that the basic freedoms that we enjoy in the West are denied to a large part of humankind. One has the impression that more people are imprisoned without trial, deprived of civil rights, tortured and murdered than ever before. We are confronted by a monstrous evil in every continent, a kind of corruption, a sort of pollution, which, if unchecked, can undermine our societies.

Double standards abound. It is not too much to say that they infect us here. I am not arguing that a crusade for human rights is a substitute for the patient diplomacy to which my right hon. and learned Friend has given his name, with increasing success. The Hong Kong agreement is one of the great diplomatic achievements of the century. The agreement opens the way to understanding and co-operation with China — the only state that has the capacity to alter the strategic balance. I predict that China will alter that balance, if not this century then in the early years of the next. The Hong Kong settlement is a greater achievement than people in this country or even, perhaps, people in China have begun to realise.

There may, therefore, be areas where the easing of tension between East and West can be secured by means of patient diplomacy. That is surely the hope of my right hon. and learned Friend. But it is imperative that Western Governments cease to practise double standards, fooling themselves that detente, as we have known it, is an acceptable policy, when the only result of the Helsinki agreement inside the Soviet bloc so far is that most of its citizens who bravely sought to monitor compliance have been imprisoned, sent to psychiatric hospitals or silenced in some other way.

Those of us who have the good fortune to live in democracies must insist that our Government do not delude themselves into believing that they can achieve a genuine and lasting peace by ignoring the continued violations of human rights or by denying whole peoples the right to self-determination. Our own Government should measure every proposal for co-operation with the Soviet Union or its satellites by what it will yield in positive gains, especially in human freedom. For every "quid", there must be a tangible "quo".

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The debate has been going on for four hours and only 11 hon. Members have been able to contribute. I know that some hon. Members have been present for the whole of the debate. I appeal once more for brevity.

8.48 pm

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): I do not intend to stray into a consideration of many parts of the world; I wish to refer to one particular subject—the strategic defence initiative. I shall not be present for the reply by the Minister of State, for the good reason that I hope to be on the 11.20 sleeper to Edinburgh. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would like to be on that train as well. I have not been able to change my constituency arrangements tomorrow morning.

I should like to discuss the dangers in the strategic defence initiative, of which the Government are aware and about which I hope they are prepared to talk more frankly. With a degree of courage that we have not come to expect in recent years from Conservative Foreign Secretaries, there has been a willingness to disagree in public with the American Administration on major issues. I hope that the Government will take future opportunities to prevent our ally from going down what we consider to be a dangerous road.

I recognise that this evening's remarks by the Foreign Secretary were primarily about research. There are three stages in the development of the strategic defence initiative. The first is research, then development and then deployment of whatever comes out at the end of the process.

In some respects, the only matter on which we can be specific at the moment is research. My understanding is that there is only limited scope for European participation in that research. The conditions which the American Government have put down on matters relating to technology transfer would greatly inhibit any major European participation in SDI, even if we wanted it.

Secondly, it is clear that there are dangerous problems for any programme of research which goes both ways across the Atlantic and which I imagine would result in a further exacerbation of what has come to be known as the "brain drain". I cannot see the best of British researchers being kept in Britain in the present climate.

The dangers for the further distortion of our research work in universities and institutions generally is great, because it is now widely accepted that with the limited resources available for research we probably put too much into defence and armaments-related research.

The experience of Japan has been quoted; we may dispute it, but to some extent research for non-defence purposes flourishes in Japan.

I should not be happy for us to commit ourselves to a programme such as star wars, which would invevitably mean fewer resources going to other much-needed research. There would be an even further and greater distortion of the technology available to our manufacturing industry.

I draw attention to the fact that the high technology companies in America are the main backers of the star wars programme. Those companies are more likely to benefit areas of the United States than western Europe.

Other aspects of research, apart from those internal ones, are of even greater significance. Not least are the consequences for the ABM treaty. The 1972 treaty was explicit in seeking to make clear the areas where research would not be regarded as helpful.

It is possible—I only say "possible" because as yet we are sailing in uncharted seas—that we could create conditions in which there would be massive breaches and examples of non-compliance with the treaty. The United States has made great play of the fact that one of the trigger mechanisms for its right to participate in that SDI are the steps being taken by the Soviet Union.

Much has been made by the United States of the radar installation at Krasnoyarsk. It is said that it was first noted by the Americans in 1983, after the President's strategic defence initiative speech. The installation has not been completed and the Soviet Union's line on that — one must be honest enough to say that it needs to be taken with a fair degree of salt — is that it is only a satellite tracking station. I am not sure, and I do not think any of us are.

The present arms race includes technological leapfrogging. It is possible that Krasnoyarsk will be a station capable of affording the Russians the opportunity to participate in some massive breach of the ABM treaty. At the same time, Ambassador Dobrynin has made it clear that once that installation has been completed it will be possible for American observers to visit and examine it.

I realise that such offers can often be meaningless, but nevertheless the offer has been made. A Conservative Member who is no longer in the Chamber said that there is a great deal of information about Krasnoyarsk and asked why it should not be made available to the House. As I understand it, the document on Soviet military power to which he was referring has an illustration of what the establishment will probably look like once it has been finished.

When I took that up with American officials, they told me that the American security community was so worried about letting the Soviet Union know how much it knew that it was not prepared to let the American people know how much it knew.

I become suspicious when such information is one of the main pillars and foundations of the Americans' argument in favour of proceeding with star wars developments. I am not fully convinced that that is an argument that will justify it. If the Americans proceed with star wars, it could lead to breaches of the ABM treaty which legitimately could be taken before the standing consultative committee. In recent years, the Americans have made a great issue of breaches of the treaty, but under the Reagan presidency they have made nothing like the use of the standing consultative committee which was established to examine such issues. We have not had the useful dialogue between the Soviet Union and the United States which took place in the 1970s and which ironed out many problems.

Lack of United Kingdom enthusiasm for the star wars proposal is, to an extent, based upon the switch from mutually assured destruction to mutually agreed survival. It could result in the United States becoming invulnerable to Soviet threats, or so we are led to believe. It could enable the Americans to attack the Soviet Union if they so wished. I am not suggesting that the Americans will want to do that, but it is a perception and construction at which the Soviet Union could arrive. It could mean that, even in the event of deterrence failing, there being a nuclear war and the SDI operating to the full extent, it is likely that there would be some penetration of the shield which star wars would afford and considerable destruction in the United States and elsewhere.

The Soviet reaction to this kind of argument will, I believe, be negative; it will further alienate the Soviet Union from arms control. The road to Geneva has been hard enough for both sides already, and I do not think that the massive commitment of the United States to star wars at this stage, if only on a propaganda basis, is going to help the Geneva talks in these brittle and fragile early stages. Rather than encourage the Soviet Union to participate in arms control, this will give it a green light for saturation deployment of intercontinental missiles.

If the star wars proposals were put into effect they would certainly cause problems for Europe, because the purpose of star wars as discussed at present is primarily to deal with long-range nuclear weapons and there would be no meaningful cover against the kind of intermediate weapons which the Soviet Union would direct against the countries of Europe. If that were the case, there would be a reaction in Europe against the Alliance and a very severe strain would be put on it.

We also have to recognise that in many respects any United Kingdom or French deterrent would be meaningless.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): In pursuing this particular line of argument in which my hon. Friend discusses the idea that western Europe would not be in a position to take advantage of a star wars scheme, can he also see the parallel for the Soviet Union? The Soviet Union may well be able to create its own star wars programme in defence of ICBMs from the United States, but not be able to create the same kind of defensive shield for missiles based in western Europe or, indeed, on the coasts.

Mr. O'Neill: I think that my hon. Friend is correct; a number of options can be explored in this context, but all of them have the effect of confusing the arms control talks that we have available to us at the moment. There could be a setback to any hopeful signs which exist at the present moment — things that will not bear fruit by Christmas, but will take many years. As long as a constructive dialogue is taking place, there are hopes that the worst aspects of individualist action or initiative will be avoided.

It is likely that at the moment we in Europe do not have the technology or the resources to commit ourselves to creating an effective anti-nuclear defence system such as is suggested by star wars. Even if we had such resources, there is no guarantee that we should be able at the end of the day to establish it.

There has been a fair amount of discussion tonight on star wars, and the measure of controversy which the Foreign Secretary's remarks have raised in this debate and in previous speeches that he has made warrants a longer debate on the subject. We could go into the various ways in which the strategic defence initiative could be frustrated, at relatively low cost. We know that the deployment of an anti-ballistic missile system as envisaged would be a destabilising influence and would start the arms race again. Any arguments about stability from the Americans must be taken in the context that stability will not be secure with unilateral development and deployment. If the Americans cannot get the Russians to participate with them — there is no question of that happening; I think it is fair to assume that — it will gravely jeopardise stability.

Furthermore, if the United States insists on pursuing this, it will put a considerable strain on our Alliance.

Dependence on technology for its own sake is very dangerous, because then we see automatic systems being created and all the problems which that can lead to. Then we are more likely to have nuclear war by accident than peace by design.

The Foreign Secretary has gone a considerable way for a Conservative Minister in dissociating and distancing himself from this scheme, but he must go further. His private fears and misgivings have to be made public. We have to have a debate within the Alliance, because I know that none of the Socialist parties within NATO is enthusiastic about this. None of them, if returned to power at subsequent elections, would agree to participate in this or be prepared to acquiesce in it. We know that in Germany the Christian Democrat party—which in many respects is even more slavishly pro-American than the British Government — has expressed considerable misgivings.

We must have a debate within Europe so that the 60-day period does not pass and somehow virtual silence is not taken as assent. The American President's full weight and authority has been placed behind a scheme which at its best is ill thought out and at its worst extremely dangerous. I urge the Foreign Secretary to work with his colleagues in Europe and within NATO to ensure that the Americans are made to understand fully how out of step they are with the remainder of the Alliance.

9.6 pm

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I listened to the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) with interest. He spoke mainly about technology. I hope that he will not mind if I stick to earth-creeping politics, taking my cue from my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine).

We have had some progress in East-West relations, but we should remember that new progress often brings new pitfalls. The West has had some difficulty in staying in line during the past few years, and I anticipate rather more difficulty when we try to move forward in some sort of decent formation.

We should begin by looking back over the past couple of years. In doing so, we shall be struck by the quite extraordinary tension that has existed and we should ask ourselves whether that was really inevitable. There was bound to be some tension as the West, quite rightly, responded to the Soviet increase in SS20s. However, that tension could have been better controlled with better results in domestic politics.

The most striking aspect of all has been the volatility of Western assessment of the Soviet Union, and it is about that simple point that I wish to speak tonight. During the past three years we have again, in a rather primitive mode, gone through the old arguments about whether we prefer our Russians fat or thin, as though we had a straight choice. We have again discussed, quite unrealistically, whether we could starve the Russians into submission by denying them imports. We have again discussed, quite fruitlessly, the relationship between ideology and nationalism in Soviet policies, as though it made any difference to the Afghans whether they were occupied by ideologues or nationalists. We have gone through many of these debates quite fruitlessly, and have ended up exactly where we were before.

The Soviet Union with which we are faced today is precisely the same country as it was five years ago. It is still occupying Afghanistan; it is still pressurising Poland; it still locks up its most creative people; and, as we saw only last week, the KGB's activities do not wax and wane according to our volatile assessment of Soviet reality—they just bang on regardless. That is an important lesson to remember as we face the future.

What does public opinion make of the extraordinary volatile assessments in the West about the Soviet Union? At one moment the public are told that the Russians are such evil people that we should not even talk to them, and at the next moment they are told that we can and must talk to them. At one moment they are told that Western defence and security has rested for 40 years on the nuclear deterrent and that that will continue, and at the next moment they are told that deterrence in that form is both immoral and unreliable and must be stood on its head in favour of a wholly new concept that does not yet exist in practice and may never exist because who knows where science might or might not lead us. That form of instability can be extremely dangerous.

If we are honest with ourselves, we will admit that a good deal of that volatility comes from the American political system. That system will not be changed. If I may recall one incident in the early 1970s, virtually overnight the United States changed its policy on China. To make the point graphically, I point out that when a certain highly placed American, not Henry Kissinger, first met Chou En-Lai, he emerged with tears in his eyes. Not only was he overcome by the historic nature of the occasion, but he was probably very struck by the strong personality of the statesman he had met. Chou was a ruthless man, but on that occasion his ruthlessness was not on display. No doubt the American had pictured him as a kind of yellow devil. That illustrates precisely the sort of worrying thinking that we still see, I am sorry to say, in our greatest ally.

I do not expect for a moment that the Americans will break down in tears when they have their first meetings with Mr. Gorbachev, but we should be prepared for the same element of instability to re-emerge in America attitudes over the next year or two. We must have a stable and, in some senses, an assertive British foreign policy ready to counter any American volatility.

We are already in danger of under-estimating the natural propensity of the two super-powers to gravitate towards a privileged and exclusive dialogue. It has happened in the past, and my guess is that it will happen again. When it happened before, there was an automatic tendency for us not to be told every detail of what was going on between the super-powers. On this occasion it is all the more imperative, if there is a privileged dialogue, that we should know what is going on, because we have reached a stage in East-West relations when there is an unhealthy concentration on arms and arms control. On all three major aspects — star wars, cruise missiles and strategic missiles — this country has a close and continuing interest. Anything that is discussed, decided or hinted at confidentially between the super-powers will have an effect on this country's interest in one of those areas.

The main purpose of my intervention is that I do not want ever to see British Ministers, of whatever party, standing at that Dispatch Box answering to the British people about matters at the very heart of the defence of the country without being fully informed of what is happening between the super-powers. I am not saying that we have reached that stage today, but there is an inherent instability of which we should be aware. It could be very dangerous for the defence of this country and, above all, for the consensus about defence which all responsible Members want to maintain.

That consensus must involve three factors. First, we must have a defence which we can afford. Let us be frank about it; there are competing demands from the Health Service and from education, so we have to keep that factor in balance.

Secondly, we must be seen to be having a reasonable and civilised dialogue with the Soviet Union. I pay great tribute to the accomplishments of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in that regard. The Foreign Secretary particularly has established an exquisite balance in his dealings with the Russians, as we saw last week, and in his recent visits to eastern Europe.

Thirdly, and most importantly, I believe that the British people will back any Government in power provided that that Government are seen to stand up for British interests. That means that if we have doubts—and there are deep doubts in this country about the strategic defence initiative —any British Government must be seen to articulate those doubts as frankly as is sensible in terms of our continuing alliance with the United States. Like many other Members, I must admit to having felt a twinge of anxiety when I first heard my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary's speech on SDI, but the more I thought about it, especially as there was no sensible and moderate public reply from the United States to the extremely cogent points that my right hon. and learned Friend raised, the more convinced I became that he was right to articulate those very well grounded doubts as clearly as he did. I believe that that is the general view in this country.

This is not an anti-American speech. I believe that the Americans respect people who discuss these matters openly with them. As a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends have said, there have always been ups and downs in the Alliance. The great thing for this country is that we should be seen to stand up for British interests and be very vigilant in watching for any change of policy by our allies.

There has been some suggestion that Europe should develop its own foreign policy, but that seems to me to be slightly misguided. To have our own foreign policy we must have our own power, and Europe does not have the power to maintain a foreign policy completely separate from that of the United States, even if that were the right thing to do. The United States, however, has the power to change its foreign policy — if necessary, without reference to Europe. We must be realistic and frank with our allies about that. The Alliance is mature enough to bear that frankness.

Therefore, although we have made progress, we should not think that we have now hit a beautiful balance. I believe that there will be a further change in American policy, and we must watch out for British interests.

9.17 pm

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I agree with much of the interesting analysis of East-West relationships set out by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden). I intend to concentrate more on our relationships within the Western Alliance, not because East-West relationships are not important but because our relationships within the Alliance bear serious discussion in a debate on foreign affairs in the British Parliament.

I was disappointed with one aspect of the Foreign Secretary's opening speech. Nowhere did he give any general picture of the relationship between Britain and the United States, our principal ally and friend in the world, or of political co-operation in the EEC.

In recent years, our foreign policy has increasingly tended to swing like a yo-yo between craven support for the United States, whatever that country happens to be doing in various parts of the world, and ritual obeisance to EEC polical co-operation. I believe that both those alternatives are completely unacceptable as a basis for British foreign policy.

As a result of our craven support for some United States policies we have lost not just influence but dignity and integrity in the world, especially the Third world. I give just three brief examples.

First, the United Nations conference on the law of the sea concerned one of the greatest international treaties to be negotiated in the post-1945 world. That treaty has been signed, though not yet ratified, by many countries thoughout the world, but opposed by the United States. Unfortunately, the United States opposition was supported by Britain, West Germany and two or three other, minor, nations. The opposition from both the United States and Great Britain was based entirely on narrow commercial grounds, some of which are extremely hypothetical. It is far from certain that there will ever be much financial incentive to drag the sea bed for manganese nodules and all the other things that are supposed to be lying down there just waiting to be collected.

By lining up with a few rich nations against the rest of the world—not merely the poor, but many rich nations siding with the poor—we have once more shown that we prefer a world in which resources, the common heritage of mankind, should not be shared. We have undermined our wider strategic interest in many parts of the world as a result of our failure to sign and ratify that treaty.

I refer next to UNESCO. Again, here was an area where the United States led and then, a year or so later, Britain cravenly followed. What happened last autumn? There had been no talk previously in the press about Britain's withdrawal from UNESCO or giving notice of withdrawal. The United State put some pressure on. The former Australian ambassador to UNESCO came to this country in October; members of the press were seen and entertained; the right people were seen; a big PR campaign was mounted; there were articles in all the newspapers and magazines for about six weeks; questions were asked in Parliament, mainly by Conservative Back Benchers; and there was pressure on the Government. The Government said that as there was all that pressure they would give notice of withdrawal from UNESCO. Again, we followed where the United States led. I challenge the Minister of State to deny that if the United States was still in UNESCO, we would be contemplating withdrawal.

My third example is central America. I shall not go into it in detail because it has already been mentioned by several hon. Members, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). We have followed all American policy in central America. We pay lip service to the Contadora process, but there has never been a peep out of the Government protesting about American military assistance to the Contras about the mining of Nicaraguan ports. Nothing has been said about the fact that the United States, a founder member of the United Nations which is obliged, if other nations agree, to submit international disputes to international arbitration, has withdrawn from the International Court of Justice because it was to be taken there by Nicaragua over the mining of Nicaraguan ports in peacetime. We followed United State policy in every one of those cases. We were wrong to do so, and we have lost influence, prestige and, above all, integrity as a result.

The story is not completely one-sided because in two issues we have managed to separate ourselves from the position of the United States. How on earth we managed to do it I do not know. We managed to retain a vestige of independence and integrity. The two illustrations are these. Two years ago the United States Administration decided that they were not going to replenish the International Development Association with the amount of money that the World Bank required. It asked for $16 billion. Previously it had had $12 billion in a three-year period. Because of a decision taken by the Administration of the United States—not by Congress—the amount was reduced to $9 billion, as a result of which there will be far more poverty, deprivation and death.

Someone talked about human rights. What about the human right to life, dignity, education, food, health and clean water? Much of the world's population will be deprived of those rights over the next few years because the World Bank will not have sufficient funds in the IDA as a direct result of American action. Fortunately, this country, to do the Government and the Foreign Office justice, took the lead in trying to see what could be done to mount a rescue operation. Unfortunately, we failed. I cannot blame the Government for that. They did their very best.

One other example of where we managed to segregate ourselves from the United States policy was in the second world population conference in Mexico City last year. The United States was alone in the world, out of 130 nations, in mounting a campaign against the International Planned Parenthood Federation because of what it was doing in a few countries to finance health programmes that also had abortion-related activities. We went along with the great majority. That is the first international conference since the second world war in which the United States has found itself in a minority of one. For once, we were on the side of the angels. I only wish we could do that more often.

I should like to refer to political co-operation in the EC. All that one can expect and hope for is the lowest common denominator of agreement among 10, soon to be 12, nations. The declarations of political co-operation from time to time have had relatively little impact in the world. All that they evince is a polite response from the client states of the Common Market—that is, those under the Lomé convention who know which side their bread is buttered, and also states which have an association agreement.

The rest of the world ignores those declarations. They have no practical effect. Most hon. Members would agree that the Venice declaration on the Middle East was very statesmanlike, but it has had no impact on events in the Middle East. If that is all the political co-operation that will be involved, it is just a meaningless ritual.

The reason why political co-operation in the European Community is so popular is that it gives EC Ministers the illusion of power and influence in a world which no longer has time for political pretensions. People should be judged not by their power and influence but by their views and the action they take to resolve world problems. As for the future of political co-operation in the European Community, I do not believe that that institution will ever be a great political influence upon the rest of the world because Europe, both east and west, is a declining force in the world, both economically and politically. That is to be expected. Efforts to halt that process, let alone reverse it, are completely misguided and are doomed to failure.

I turn to what ought to be another pillar of our foreign policy, apart from the United States and Western Europe, but which is much neglected because of our addiction to those two; that is, the Commonwealth. When did we last hear from Ministers a panegyric about the possibility of Commonwealth co-operation to resolve many of the major world problems? Outside the United Nations and its associated bodies, the Commonwealth is unique in linking rich and poor countries. We ought to make much better use of it, in association with the Commonwealth secretariat and the other member states. Heads of Government in the Commonwealth meet only once every two years, and it is pot luck whether education Ministers meet every three or four years. Some Commonwealth Ministers, unlike European Community Ministers, hardly ever meet their compatriots in other Commonwealth countries.

The Commonwealth is a force which could break down the barriers between rich and poor countries. Things get bogged down in the United Nations and its agencies. Better use could be made of the Commonwealth by holding regular meetings. Above all, we should ensure that we consult our Commonwealth partners—they are genuine partners, unlike our competitors in the rest of western Europe — on major issues, especially when economic summits attended by the rich countries are to be held. Then we should bring not only our own views as a rich country but the views of the Commonwealth as a whole to the proceedings. In that way we could try to demolish the barriers which have been erected since the North-South dialogue broke down after the failure two years ago of global negotiations at the United Nations. We should consult the Commonwealth, both formally and informally, not only before economic summits but before UNCTAD and GATT meetings. In that way we could do more about trying to bridge the gap.

For example, when the only world summit meeting of rich and poor countries took place at Cancun, Mexico, in 1981, 23 world leaders from rich and poor countries were present, including our own Prime Minister. Seven of those 23 countries were Commonwealth countries. Despite persistent questioning by me and by other hon. Members, the Government made no attempt whatsoever to get together with the other Commonwealth countries to try to establish a joint position on the two-day Cancun summit agenda. The direct result of that and other factors was that the summit failed lamentably. Had there been adequate preparation in the form of a Commonwealth dialogue beforehand, I believe that the summit could have succeeded. Even if it had not succeeded, it could have resulted in the establishment of a proper dialogue between North and South. The Commonwealth needs to be taken much more seriously.

Finally, I turn to the United Nations, another much neglected organisation. This is understandable, because during the last 15 years the old western influence, with Soviet vetoes from time to time, has been replaced by the dominance of Third world countries.

What ought to be our foreign policy objectives in the United Nations, the major forum in the world? First, we should recognise that the rich-poor divide in the world is making the world a much more dangerous place. That was a point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) when he talked about the debt crisis in the Third world. Is it beyond the wit of the Foreign Office at least to suggest to our allies that they should use the United Nations and perhaps invite United Nations observers to the economic summits in the Western world to try to regulate the financial and economic affairs of the whole of the planet, not just rich countries but rich and poor alike.

The nuclear arms race is becoming more and more dangerous. Why could there not be United Nations observers at the Geneva negotiations? One accepts that confidentiality may well have to be the case for the time being, although I take the point by my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson) that the sooner we get down to open diplomacy the better, so that people can see what is being done and make positive suggestions to help.

The non-proliferation treaty is not directly a function of the United Nations but a review conference is coming up later this year and the House and the country will hear a lot more about it in the months to come. That review conference genuinely gives us a last chance to try to prevent a disastrous spread of nuclear weapons throughout the world. We shall not have another five years after 1985, as we have had five years since the first review conference in 1980, to put our house in order. The rest of the world is waiting with bated breath to see whether the Soviet Union, the United States and Britain, the signatory powers —I think that they are the guardian powers—are the ones to which people in the rest of the world are looking to show that they are trying to cut their nuclear weapons.

We have heard that the Geneva talks may have been disappointing at the moment but I hope that we shall recognise in the non-proliferation treaty review that we must also show that we are genuine in our desire for a comprehensive test ban treaty. We are in a logical dilemma with the test ban treaty. In answer to questions, Ministers have accepted that the reason Britain needs nuclear weapons testing — no doubt it goes for the United States and the Soviet Union as well — is to maintain the effectiveness of our nuclear deterrent. Therefore, it follows that if we have a comprehensive test ban treaty the effectiveness of our nuclear deterrent would begin to diminish over time because we could no longer test nuclear weapons and warheads. The same would be true of the nuclear weapon arsenals of the United States and the Soviet Union. So the review conference and the idea of a test ban treaty acquire a new significance. It is not just a case of saving the world from nuclear testing, fallout and so on, but of saying that this is the only way in which we are likely to halt the nuclear arms race between the major powers and to prevent, at one fell swoop, the spread of nuclear weapons to other states.

I hope that the Government will take the non-proliferation review conference seriously and not just use bland words to allay suspicions and alleviate fears. I know that there are difficulties about verification, but they cannot be allowed to hold up progress for ever. Advances have been made in countries such as Norway where scientists have developed a method of detecting low grade explosions to distinguish them from earthquakes. I hope that our Ministry of Defence experts will look at what the Norwegians have done. The United States Defence Department is interested. We should take seriously the prospects for a successful conclusion of that conference. That will mean much more progress than we have made so far.

Above all, if we do not succeed at the non-proliferation review conference in September, the world will be embarking on an even more dangerous course which will be beyond the capacity of the great powers to control, no matter how many times they sit down together and no matter how many top level summit meetings they have between various combinations of leaders. The nuclear arms race will have so spread that it will have become unstoppable. Nuclear weapons will spread to half a dozen other countries and others beyond which are just waiting to see whether the great powers are as good as their words under article 6 of the original non-proliferation treaty. That is the biggest challenge that faces British foreign policy in the next year. I hope that we shall hear something from the Minister tonight about the Government's attitude.

9.35 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) down the road that he took, although I agreed with his comments about the Venice declaration, a subject to which I shall return.

I wish at the outset, like hon. Members on both sides of the House, to congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues on a highly successful period for British affairs in the world since we last debated these matters.

I also pay a warm and unqualified tribute to the staff of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for the excellent work that they do throughout the world on behalf of us all, sometimes under gravely difficult circumstances, and all too often on a shoestring budget. The conduct of our diplomats under circumstances of grave difficulty and danger is rightly the envy of the world, and they are to be congratulated.

On European affairs, I am in considerable agreement with the hon. Member for Walthamstow. European politics seem to be conducted, here and elsewhere, on the basis of the apologists of the "let the dog see the rabbit" school. From the point of view of having a true and real Common Market, it would be of advantage to us all if this rabbit could be produced at the earliest opportunity.

It is vital, as my right hon. and learned Friend and the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said, that the Common Market is seen to have real meaning and relevance in everyone's life if it is to have any force in Britain. Political co-operation is crucial to international affairs, and in respect of European affairs in the wider world, we must put some meat on the bones.

By now we should have built on the Venice declaration. It is to Europe's shame that it has, to all intents and purposes, sat on its collective hands. I do not believe that the Americans have either the inclination or the power to do anything in the Middle East. They are a mercurial people who are unduly swayed by sentiment and prejudice rather than by reason or even consideration of their long-term interests in the area, and their policies are, to an exceptional degree, at the mercy of the electoral process.

For that reason, in relation to Israel and the middle east, they are neutered. America is truly emasculated by the Zionist lobby and can do nothing in the middle east. Europe must therefore shake off its sloth and defeatism and try to make some cohesive political progress on a settlement in the middle east, which is one of the most depressing parts of the world in terms of achieving anything.

Mr. Johnston: I agree that we should love to see Europe make an impact, but it has no leverage. The United States has the leverage on Israel. What can Europe do beyond making statements such as the Venice declaration? I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it was a good statement.

Mr. Soames: The hon. Gentleman and I are at one in wishing that Europe could do more. It is no longer any good asking what we can do. We must try to find a way forward. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) that it is difficult for Europe to achieve much in that respect when it is perceived as having no power. We must develop that power and the institutions that go with it. Europe must be seen to be credible and to have a role in the world, and there can be no finer place for Europeans to make a start than by taking a lead in the middle east.

The subject of disarmament has been much discussed in the debate. We have a duty to explain that arms control is a means to an end and not an end in itself. The ultimate goal of all arms control talks must be stability. I hope and believe that western Governments realise that calming political opinion comes a poor second to the prospect of real stability. What are we aiming for in the talks? We need an agreement or a set of agreements that contain unambiguous and effective provisions for full verification and total compliance. That is the only way in which these transactions will be seen as credible, and the only way to create confidence that the Governments will observe the agreements when duly signed. It would be a great mistake on the part of the United States and her allies to go for a bad agreement just for the sake of having an agreement.

The first objective of the West should, in my view, be broadly equal numbers of warheads and missiles. Secondly, there should be a real cut in the present numbers of weapons. Thirdly, there should be satisfactory and credible provision for verification. Fourthly, taking account of the strategic defence initiative, there should be defined limits on modernisation and new developments.

That is a formidable shopping list, but it is the first step on a long, difficult and tortuous road. The key will be to find the right mix of imagination, common sense, and—hardest of all—real respect for the legitimate security interests of both East and West and an acknowledgement that one cannot, at the end of the day, run a political relationship using solely strategic technology.

Our aim must be to achieve a credible, consistent and realistic framework for the future conduct of East-West relations. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend and his colleagues on the significant progress that they have made. We need a policy that above all recognises the realities of Soviet power and takes all necessary precautions. In my view, the Soviets will always behave badly. They will always advance where we weaken. I was amused by Lord Home's remark that two years after he had sacked 150 Soviet diplomats in this country, he found, when visiting Yugoslavia, that one of the diplomats had been sacked again by President Tito for the same offence. So long as we remain aware of the intentions of the Soviet Union in this country and in any country where freedom and democracy reign, we shall have nothing to fear.

In broad outline, a possible definitive framework for an agreement would contain, first, a recognition that adequate defence and detente are not incompatible. Secondly, we must recognise there are important areas of common interest between East and West. Thirdly, we must remember that a process of continuous dialogue and communication is crucial for its own sake.

To all the players—both principals and fringe—I make one point. There can be no excuse for bowing to domestic political or tactical pressures in these matters. To do so would be to display dismal weakness. The political and moral strength of the West will remain the key to the successful conclusion of the talks.

The conduct of international affairs demands courage, intelligence, patience and, above all, unfailing good humour. My right hon. and learned Friend, his colleagues, British diplomats and the British people by and large have many of those qualities in abundance. Our integrity is greatly respected in the world. We have an enormous store of good will on which to draw. We do not capitalise upon it enough.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) has great experience of these matters. He has drawn attention to student fees. On that question the present Government committed an act of folly in broad terms inimical to our long-term interests.

We run an enormous network of embassies and diplomatic representatives. We must do more with trade and foreign policy, and use our missions and outposts to greater effect to serve British trading interests. Great strides have been made, but endless opportunities remain unexploited, largely for want of information and vision.

Security and prosperity are the legitimate goals of British foreign policy. For a trading nation, prosperity is extremely important, but it must remain secondary in the long run to security. I hope that the Government will continuously review every aspect of our foreign policy to ensure that we retain this good and healthy balance.

9.44 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): The hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) reflected the theme that has run throughout the debate on East-West relations. I hope that he will not mind if I do not follow him. There are other points that I should like to make and, even having heard the debate, I must confess that I am still an optimist. I believe that the Soviet Union, under Mr. Gorbachev, must recognise that it cannot continue to have an economy worth talking about if it continues with its present emphasis on defence expenditure, and that the United States must be told in pretty clear terms by Western and developing countries that they are not prepared to continue financing an American deficit on its present scale.

I am delighted to join my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) in drawing the attention of the House to what I hope will be a continuing discussion on UNESCO. The Government's announcement was made without there having been much debate, without much information having been given to the House and on the basis of arguments that were especially lacking in substance and seem incapable of standing up to much examination. The Government have told us that there is no firm decision. I hope that it might be possible for the matter to be put before the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, which is chaired by the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), so that we can have a reasonable discussion on the merits of the argument and reach a conclusion which I hope will be in keeping with the great history and contribution of UNESCO.

The Foreign Secretary said that the human spirit cannot for ever be shackled. I believe that he is right. I also believe that right hon. and hon. Members have been right to pay tribute to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his recent activities, his visit to eastern Europe and the stand that he took there. The House cannot be selective in its attitude to human rights. There was a clear distinction between the Foreign Secretary's contribution and that of the Prime Minister, especially in regard to Indonesia. I hope that the Minister will take on board many people's grave reservations about the absence of human rights in that country and the fact that intolerable suppression is taking place.

Only last week, the press in Jakarta talked of the forthcoming executions of three more political prisoners. Those men were sentenced in 1975, having been arrested in 1968. We all regard that as utterly intolerable. Even if our Commonwealth friends, especially Papua New Guinea —we are all delighted that the Prime Minister of that Commonwealth country is in London this week—do not have reservations about Indonesia's intentions of aggrandisement, such as it has shown with East Timor, its record on human rights ought to have caused the Prime Minister to comment during her visit. We deeply regret that she did not find it possible.

I move on to Nicaragua. I join my hon. Friends in giving a loud welcome to the decision taken the other day by the House of Representatives. It shows that there is hope for the American people. The President said that he will address the American people over the heads of their elected representatives, but perhaps he should be modest enough to think that the American people might be sending him a message via their elected representatives. The message that I think that they are sending him is that they are not prepared to accept or see another Vietnam on the basis of the flimsy evidence that the President put before the House of Representatives, which, happily, it did not find convincing.

I hope that, on aid, we shall learn the lessons that invite themselves. I hope that we will bear in mind resolution 325 about aid to the Contadora group. We should also remember that Nicaragua has suffered not simply because of the American attitude to it—it is time that America got off the back of Nicaragua—but because its aid has been considerably reduced as a result of the prejudices of the American Administration — prejudices that our Government have tended to reflect.

In the Queen's Speech debate the Foreign Secretary talked about fighter aircraft from the Soviet Union going to Nicaragua, but not a shred of evidence has emerged showing that that is the case. There was the inexcusable mining of Nicaraguan ports, showing yet again that the Americans sometimes have an infinite capacity for making enemies out of potential friends. I hope that, in our attitude to central America, we ignore the same temptation.

I am worried about the arms race in the Third world. We are discriminating in sending aid to some countries, while to others, such as El Salvador, we are sending arms to an exent that is unhelpful. It does not help if the Americans, in response to the situation in Afghanistan, send arms to Pakistan, because that in turn leads India to think that it should build up its arms, and to the possibility of nuclear weapons. That should be a great worry to us.

I move on to the report on refugees published a few days ago by the Home Affairs Select Committee. The Minister of State will not be surprised that I raise this matter, because time after time I have referred to the situation in Hong Kong. I was delighted when the Committee drew the attention of the House to the fact that there are 11,900 refugees in Hong Kong. The report says that if Britain accepted up to 500 more refugees from Hong Kong, given that more than one in five of the refugees has spent more than five years in a refugee camp, that might send the correct message to the rest of the world. If we do that, not only will it be right in the circumstances of Hong Kong, but it will give encouragement to many other countries to respond, as I hope our Government will, in the way recommended by the Select Committee.

The Foreign Secretary said that the human spirit cannot be shackled for ever. That is right, and this debate has shown that we are a long way from achieving the objective that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the House set in these matters.

9.55 pm

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): I hope that the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) will not mind if I do not follow him across his wide range of subjects. I propose to follow the example of some other hon. Members in concentrating on a single topic—the subject with which the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) dealt. In January, I visited Namibia for the third time as the guest of the South African Administrator-General, and I want to take this opportunity to say a few words on the present position in Namibia, based on that experience.

I should say, first, that I make no apology for visiting that part of the world as a guest of the South Africans. As the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said in respect for the hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond), we must make use of all diplomatic channels. Seeing Namibia as a guest of the South Africans gives one a first-class opportunity to look at the Namibian scene from the South African point of view, to see it through their eyes and get a sense of the way in which they view their interests. And it is surely appropriate to try to look at the issues in that perspective in a situation like that in Namibia, since it is clear that, for the foreseeable future, there will be no settlement of the Namibian question without South Africa's co-operation.

Let me take a moment to say why I think this is so —because it is certainly true that at a quite recent time it seemed that a Namibian settlement could be imposed on South Africa from the outside — in the spirit of the remarks of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East today. During the second half of the 1970s, it seemed that a combination of several factors might achieve that result — the growth of the pressure of SWAPO's "armed struggle" after the Portuguese collapse in Angola; the prospect of the stepping up of the Cuban or Eastern bloc, or even possibly of Soviet, military pressure across the Angolan border; and the threat of economic sanctions by the Western powers, led by the United States under President Carter. The Western powers at that time were anxious to head off the growth of Soviet influence in southern Africa in the wake of the Portuguese collapse, and to pave the way for the removal of the Cubans from Angola by securing the removal of the South Africans from Namibia.

Today, however, it is apparent that these factors no longer operate to make it possible to envisage the involuntary removal of the South Africans from Namibia. From what little I was able to see of the South African preparations to counter SWAPO's latest rainy season offensive this year, it was apparent that the threat of SWAPO's arms struggle has been effectively blunted. Some SWAPO fighters are apparently still able to get through the exclusion zone in southern Angola which the South Africans have got the Angolans to agree to try to enforce. But those fighters are few and exhausted, and their influence in the northern border lands seems to be in substantial decline.

As for the other pressures on South Africa, it is clear that South Africa's sponsorship of Jonas Savimbi's UNITA movement in Angola has succeeded in heading off the possibility of Eastern bloc pressure on South Africa in Namibia. And, concomitantly, the threat of Western economic sanctions to force an early settlement has receded. Far from a South African withdrawal from Namibia opening the way for a Cuban withdrawal from Angola, the boot is now on the other foot, with Cuban withdrawal now being considered as a precondition for South Africa's withdrawal from Namibia.

And so it seems clear that, for the foreseeable future South Africa is master of the game in Namibia. It behoves us, therefore, to consider the position from the South African point of view.

Mr. Anderson: Why should we view the position from the South African point of view? Would it not be better to see it from the view of the Namibians who are under the trusteeship?

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman will have a chance to speak later. Fundamentally I propose to consider this matter from the British point of view, which is the view that the House should take.

Let us look at the problem for the moment from the angle of the South Africans, since they are in control of the situation. The South Africans have five options. The first option is to build up their position in Namibia as a base for supporting Dr. Savimbi in a big military push to win power over the whole of Angola, leading to the forceable expulsion of the Cubans.

The second option is to transfer the reins of Government in Namibia to internal parties acceptable to the South Africans, irrespective of the lack of international recognition of the result.

The third South African option is to continue indefinitely in more or less the present position, using the Cuban presence in Angola, or some other excuse, as a device for procrastination.

The fourth option for South Africa is to implement its agreement to the Western plan for an internationally supervised election leading to a transfer of power under United Nations resolution 435.

It being Ten o'clock, the Motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Motion in the name of the Prime Minister for the Adjournment of the House may be proceeded with, though opposed, until Twelve o'clock.—[Mr. Major.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Major.]

Mr. Jackson: South Africa's fifth option is to implement resolution 435 after obtaining further reassurance by negotiating further improvements — I emphasise the word "further"—in the western plan, in addition to those previously negotiated between 1978 and 1982.

I shall rapidly review these five options. With regard to the first—support for an all-out campaign by Savimbi —probably none of us can assess UNITA's capability for such a task. But the South Africans are experienced in the perversities of African warfare and they had their fingers severely burned in Angola in 1975. They are also no doubt following closely the improving relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. I do not believe that they will take too many risks in their policy towards Angola.

Similarly, unlike the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North, I view with equanimity the current moves in Cape Town and Windhoek to associate the Multi-Party Conference with some of the functions of Government in Windhoek. I do not believe that the South Africans would be so foolish as to take the option of transferring power definitively to the internal parties in Namibia. As long as South Africa has the responsibility for Namibia's defence, it will want to keep hold of the power in Namibia. I prefer a more optimistic interpretation of what is intended by these dealings between the South Africans and the Multi-Party Conference — that the South Africans are now trying to rebuild the moderate forces in Namibia in the hope of strengthening their position vis-à-vis SWAPO in an eventual free election.

Of the five options that I have suggested I suppose that it must be said that the option of further delay is the most likely to be followed. I agree with the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North on that point. After all it is the course that South Africa has followed—the hon. Gentleman was right about that—so effectively ever since it agreed to resolution 435 in 1978.

Nevertheless, I came away from my most recent visit to Namibia—unlike previous visits—with a feeling that I had not experienced previously. I felt that there was a growing measure of recognition among responsible South Africans that procrastination was not a course which could be pursued indefinitely.

After the accords of Nkomati and Lusaka, the South African position in the region is strong. It is more likely to weaken than to become stronger.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the South Africans have delivered neither on their side of the Nkomati bargain nor on the Lusaka agreement?

Mr. Jackson: The application of those agreements by all the parties is difficult in the circumstances that obtain on the ground. There is some evidence that the South Africans have been doing their best in particular on the Nkomati accord, but it is difficult in the circumstances.

What those accords show is that the South African position in the region is now strong. It will become weaker rather than stronger in the future. I believe that that is why the South Africans are beginning to recognise that now is perhaps the time to cut a deal in Namibia. At the same time, the events of the past two months have underlined what wiser South Africans have known at least since the crisis of 1976—how fragile their underlying position is. Further, the South Africans are also aware that they are unlikely to have an American Government in the future who are more favourably disposed towards them than the present Administration.

For all these reasons, I believe that the case for withdrawal from Namibia by the end of President Reagan's term of office in 1988 must now be under more serious consideration in Pretoria than at any stage since 1978.

We come now to what I have described as South Africa's fourth and fifth options — that is, withdrawal under the Western plan as it stands, or withdrawal after obtaining further amendments to the plan to give South Africa further reassurance.

I do not think that, in spite of their agreement to it, the South Africans will be prepared to implement the Western plan as it stands. The fundamental problem is not that SWAPO might win the election. Intelligent South Africans know that SWAPO is bound to be a dominant, if not the preponderant, voice after any free election. They also know that, for reasons of geography and economics, an independent Namibia, even under SWAPO rule, would hardly be able to breathe without a South African by-your-leave.

The fundamental problems are twofold. The Western plan as it stands does not provide sufficiently clear constitutional guarantees for minorities in Namibia after independence. Even more serious, it leaves too much scope, and gives too much time, for a collapse into chaos during the long, indeed indefinite, period of transition envisaged in the Western plan between South African withdrawal and the achievement of independence on the conclusion of the constitution-making process.

I had the honour of serving the last British Governor of Southern Rhodesia, Lord Soames, as special adviser to him during his brief tenure from mid-December 1979 to mid-April 1980. I remember very well the many moments of tension in that very brief period—moments at which his fragile authority might have dissolved into farce or tragedy. I do not believe that he could have sustained our position in Southern Rhodesia if the Lancaster House constitution had not provided some basis for reassuring white opinion and if the election had given rise to a parliament with no clear majority, leaving the task of constitution-making to be debated indefinitely within that parliament for month after month before a conclusion was reached enabling independence to take place.

One of the many strokes of genius in the Lancaster House settlement—and I see one of the authors of it on the Front Bench, my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce)—was that it limited the period of transition to independence by establishing the constitution before the election rather than leaving it to be settled after it. Yet the Western plan for Namibia, which was admittedly conceived before the Lancaster House experience, does not reflect that experience. It leaves the constitution to be settled after the election in Namibia—an election which is more likely than was ever the case in Rhodesia to lead to a parliament with no clear majority.

So, in conclusion, I believe that South Africa, or important elements there, may now at last be prepared to move towards an internationally acceptable settlement in Namibia. I believe that it is in the British, European and Western interest to advance that movement. I believe that in order to do so we must be prepared to recognise that in Namibia, as in Rhodesia, nothing can be achieved without the co-operation of the party in possession, which in the case of Namibia means South Africa. I believe that if the South Africans come forward with precise and constructive ideas for the further improvement of the Western plan under resolution 435 we should be prepared both to consider those ideas positively and to use our influence to persuade others in SWAPO and in the front-line states to do so. Other postures may seem—I repeat, seem — to be morally more attractive and politically more comfortable, but, if the choice is between half a loaf and no bread, I vote for half a loaf.

10.9 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), but I shall not follow him throughout south-west Africa. However, if he sees the diplomatic process as one of looking entirely at narrow self interest, and if we look at matters in a vacuum, we reach some unfortunate conclusions. That may be the case with British foreign policy as it applies to central America.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) has already pointed out that the British Government's view is very much allied to that of the United States Government. For example, yesterday the Parliamentary Under-Secretary spoke about the Cuban influence in Nicaragua. I challenged the Minister—as he has already been challanged by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke)—to produce evidence of Cuban involvement. That supposed involvement underpins America's claim to its adventurism in Nicaragua, yet there is not a scrap of evidence to support that.

Mr. Deakins: Does my hon. Friend agree that what the Americans are really worried about, and what the British Government may be worried about, are not Cuban soldiers or advisers, but Cuban doctors, educationalists, social workers, architects and engineers?

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That sharpens finely the distinction between the Cuban presence in that region and the economic colonialism practised by the United States in Mexico. That country, which is self-sufficient in beef, exports virtually all its beef to the United States, while its children go hungry. Compare such American domination in the region with the possible Cuban export of doctors, services, education and training.

The British Government are so hooked on the American doctrine that yesterday the Foreign Secretay said that the United States sought a peaceful solution in Nicaragua. That peaceful solution consists of arming the people to engage in bloody warfare — people against people, brother against brother, as happens in any civil war. That is what the Americans mean by a peaceful solution, and I am afraid that that is also what our Foreign Secretary means by a peaceful solution. That is why we must accuse the Government of moral bankruptcy in central America.

That compares, sadly, with the way in which we construct our policies in the whole of the central American region. Guatemala, which is not so far from Nicaragua, has an atrocious human rights record that is almost beyond belief. Even the remotest political opposition to the state is snuffed out. Only this month a member of a group that supports the families of people who have disappeared was killed by security forces, together with her brother and her infant child, because she represented opposition. Yet the United States wants to restore military aid to that Government. Fortunately, it is having difficulty in persuading Congress to agree to that.

I pay a limited tribute to the British Government because they have so far consistently supported resolutions at the United Nations in condemnation of Guatemala. However, there are signs that there is pressure upon western Governments to restore aid and assistance. For example, economic aid is becoming more acceptable. There is talk of EEC aid for certain operations. There is no talk of military aid, of course, but the giving of economic aid invariably leads to other forms of spending, especially on military equipment.

The hypocrisy of the American approach lies in the almost naive view of the domino theory, already referred to in the context of south-east Asia. It was not a realistic theory then, and it is no more realistic now for central America. Yet, because of America's simple-minded view of that region, it is prepared to block any form of social or economic progress throughout the region and to prevent the export of advancement — whether from Cuba to Nicaragua, or from anywhere else — if it ultimately results in a change of attitude in or the political position of Mexico because of American paranoia about the Mexican boarder. Because Mexico is so important, Guatemala must be kept safe, and, because Guatemala must be kept safe, so must El Salvador and Honduras. That is why there is a bloody war in Nicaragua. The logic is so frighteningly stupid that, if it were not for the fact that many human beings are suffering enormously in that region, it would be a farce.

The Government should reaffirm that there will be no steps towards the re-establishment of diplomatic relations with Guatemala and that they support the Contadora peace process. They should not simply pay lip service to that peace process but criticise and condemn the United States when it violates the principle of Contadora. When the President of Colombia went to the United States, he felt that he had been deliberately misled by the Government. When he left the country, he told the world about how he had been misled. That is what we should be doing. We should support the action taken by the United States Congress, to which many of my hon. Friends have already paid tribute. The British Government are more faithful to the American President than even his own Congress. That is a disgrace for a nation that claims to be independent.

The subject of star wars has dominated the debate. Because of the 60 days that we have been offered by the United States Government, it is important that there should be a debate in this country about star wars. Whatever anyone may think about the merits or demerits of star wars, that policy represents a turning point in the context of the arms race and its technology.

With star wars, one side may achieve a degree of domination that has not been possible for a considerable time. Misunderstandings may arise because of the inability to grasp what the other side is doing. That may undermine the whole process of deterrence. I make no bones of the fact that I believe that Britain has no role as a military nuclear power. Nevertheless, we will be severely affected by star wars, whatever steps we take, if only because we will be technologically outdistanced and will not have the capacity to follow the lead of the United States.

The star wars concept is throwing up a shield to protect the United States against inter-continental ballistic missiles, but that is of no value in the context of western Europe to Britain or to the Soviet Union. When we consider the lack of symmetry, the threat of star wars is tremendous. Therefore, it is important that a debate should take place and that we recognise that even if the star wars programme is successful, it will threaten us enormously. If it is only 80 per cent. successful, it can give the illusion of success and may force the Soviet Union into a massive counter-response which will militate against the trust that must be built up if the talks in Geneva are to succeed.

Those talks can succeed only if trust is established between the United States and the Soviet Union. At the moment there is no sign of such trust developing, and it is unlikely to develop in view of the rhetoric from the British Government and the United States that it is necessary to have massive superiority before they are prepared to talk. The attitude seems to be that only an arm-wrestling approach to talks can achieve anything.

All my life I have listened to such talk. Yet, as each decade has gone by, no significant step away from the arms race has been achieved. In fact, there has been an intensification of the arms race interrupted by an occasional bout of negotiations. If we are serious, we must develop a climate of trust, but that trust cannot coexist with the development of the star wars programme.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I wish to deal briefly with a topic not touched upon in the debate so far, save by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in his opening speech — that of Cyprus and the eastern Mediterranean.

In examining the policies pursued by the British Government, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the Turks, the Greeks and various other people in relation to Cyprus, it is legitimate to set the scene by reminding the House that it is now 30 years since the first EOKA atrocity was committed by Grivas's gang on 1 April 1955. That period of 30 years has seen the EOKA movement, the granting of independence to Cyprus in 1960 with guarantees for the Turkish minority, the unilateral abrogation of that agreement by Archbishop Makarios in 1963, the crisis of 1967 when the Turkish minority retreated into enclaves and finally the coup d'état of Nicos Sampson organised by the Greek junta in 1974. In that year, Turkish forces intervened in Cyprus and the island was effectively partitioned, about 180,000 Turks remaining in northern Cyprus and between 500,000 and 600,000 Greeks remaining in southern Cyprus.

In the 11 years since 1974, there have been various negotiations and attempts to resolve the Cyprus problem, the Secretary-General of the United Nations has been charged to use his good offices to try to secure a peaceful solution and the British Government have made it clear that they repose their confidence in his endeavours.

Cyprus is one of the few areas in the world in which the British Government still have a substantial influence. Whatever the Secretary-General of the United Nations may say or do, the view of the British Government is very important and influential on the island. That is no doubt why the leader of the Greek community, Mr. Kyprianou, has met the British Prime Minister five times in the past 12 months.

On 17 January this year, Mr. Denktash met Mr. Kyprianou in New York with a view to signing an agreement for the resolution of the Cyprus problem. I think that all parties involved and certainly the Secretary-General agree that very significant concessions were made by the Turks in the five months of proximity talks preceding the New York meeting. Indeed, a draft agreement was prepared by the Secretary-General for signature by the two sides in New York and everyone expected that it would be signed. The Secretary-General publicly gave credit to Mr. Denktash and the Turkish community for what he described as their favourable reaction to all elements of his presentation.

To obtain that peaceful solution, the concessions made by the Turks had included surrendering about 8 per cent. of the territory that they occupied. In addition, they abandoned their previous position that the presidency of the island should rotate between the Turks and the Greeks. Those were significant concessions. They were recognised as such, and they were contained in the agreement drafted by the Secretary-General, and the Turkish community was prepared to accept that agreement in its entirety.

As we know, at that high level meeting, there was no agreement. That was due entirely to the decision of Mr. Kyprianou, the leader of the Greek Cypriot community, to challenge the United Nations plan in its entirety. That decision negated the progress made over the previous five months at the United Nations proximity talks. United Nations officials have described Mr. Kyprianou's conduct as questioning the basic principles worked out by the United Nations Secretary-General for an accommodation with the Turkish Cypriots, including, most importantly, the concept of bizonality and equal political status for both communities. Since 17 January, Mr. Kyprianou has been censured by the Greek Cypriot Parliament, blaming him for the failure of the talks between himself and Mr. Denktash. Also, recent reports show that Mr. Kyprianou is now prepared to accept the Secretary-General's documentation, but with certain provisions.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will be able to deal with this point. I believe that it is absolutely essential that the British Government support the concept of a bizonal, bicommunal federal solution. As to the reports that President Kyprianou is prepared to accept the 17 January documentation, I should like to draw to my hon. Friend's attention the fact that that was denied by a United Nations Secretary-General spokesman at a press conference in New York on 19 April 1985.

Similarly, I should like to draw to my hon. Friend's attention the fact that Mr. Iacovou of the Greek Cypriot Administration, at a press conference held in Vienna on 17 April, stated that the Greek Cypriots do not and will not agree to a territorial agreement as indicated in the documentation of 27 November 1984. They will not agree to limitations on rights of settlement, property ownership and movement in the republic, nor will they agree to security guarantees being undertaken by the republic of Turkey.

If that is the Greek attitude, there can be no possibility of achieving an agreement on the basis of bizonal, bicommunal federation with equal political status for both communities. As I am sure my hon. Friend the Minister will agree, that is the whole thrust of the Secretary-General's negotiations and attempts to achieve a peaceful solution in Cyprus. The Turkish community is simply not prepared to return to the situation that existed from 1955 to 1974.

The Greeks cannot expect the withdrawal of Turkish troops as a prerequisite to agreement, particularly when they have 17,000 men under arms themselves on the island, all of whom are under Greek mainland officers, and 5,000 of whom are Greek mainland troops.

The Greek behaviour in New York on 17 January 1985 demonstrates, as does the statement by the Secretary-General's spokesman on 19 April and the statement by Mr. Iacovou, that the Greeks are not seriously seeking a solution within the framework of the Secretary-General's proposals. Her Majesty's Government must make it crystal clear that they are committed to the bizonal, bicommunal federal state as accepted by Archbishop Makarios in 1977 and as proposed by the Secretary-General.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary spoke of the influence and importance of human rights in the framing of British foreign policy. For too long, Britain's attitude to Cyprus has been dictated by what are described as wider interests. It is not just, nor is it consistent with basic human rights, that the Turkish community should continue to live in an economic ghetto in northern Cyprus. This is particularly the case when the Turks have demonstrate their bona fides.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State whether a just solution can be achieved when about $12,000 million in aid have been given to the Greek administration since 1974 while about $30 million in aid have been given to the Turkish administration. Following the events in New York, I would ask my hon. Friend to investigate the possibility of direct scheduled flights from Heathrow to northern Cyprus and to accord to the Turkish economy the assistance which is needed in order that it may be developed in the same way as the Greek economy in the south is being developed.

On recognition, I know that the Foreign Secretary's policy is to support the efforts being made by the Secretary-General, but if those efforts do not result in a solution because of Greek intransigence, Her Majesty's Government will have seriously to consider granting recognition to the Turkish republic of northern Cyprus. At the very least, there should be de facto recognition. The Turkish community in Cyprus will listen very carefully to my hon. Friend's response.

10.30 pm

Mr. Mark Robinson (Newport, West): I welcome the fact that this debate is being held today, particularly in view of the present crossroads we have reached in international affairs. It is not just that the Soviet Union have come back to the negotiating table at Geneva and that there is a new leader in the Soviet Union; certain basic points are being made by the new leadership in the Soviet Union which are glossy and glamorous in terms of public relations but these reflect no change whatsoever in policy.

Whatever initiatives may be taken, it is what happens in the arms negotiations at Geneva that will ultimately matter. Even if a temporary moratorium is proposed, it will be of no account if at the end of the day no agreement upon deterrence can be reached. Deterrence has served us well in securing peace for the last 40 years.

The West has been modernising its generation of nuclear weapons, and the Soviet Union has, quite unashamedly, been doing the same. Paul Nitze, in his recent Alastair Buchan lecture, underlined this view of deterrence:

"The question remains, now as then"— he was referring to the time when he was involved in monitoring the effects of the two nuclear explosions in Japan—

"how to maintain a sure ability to retaliate with devastating nuclear destruction but concurrently to increase our ability to deny an aggressor the possibility of military success, and thus reduce our dependence on the threat of mutually devastating nuclear destruction."

In recent weeks, we have heard a great deal about the strategic defence initiative. One disservice that the President of the United States did to this argument was to translate it into terms of modern popular thought—the so-called star wars concept. Although it may be translated into meaningful language in the United States, it has very different connotations in Europe and in the process does much to undermine what is required to convince the public that only a strong policy of deterrence provides the best route to security.

At a transatlantic conference I attended recently in Berlin, many European delegates were at pains to point out to their American counterparts that in questioning SDI they were not attacking the United States. They felt that they had to preface their remarks in that way to explain to the United States that it was not the carping Europeans raising those issues in debate, but the fact that we needed a genuine dialogue on the whole issue of SDI in exactly the same way as that debate had been going on in America.

The Times was unjustified in a leading article in attacking, in my view, my right hon. and learned Friend in the way that it did, using terms such as "appeaser", when he was simply reiterating the arguments that have been developing on both sides of the Atlantic. He reminded his audience that the purpose of the American decision, which Britain backed, was to ensure that the necessary research on SDI was undertaken, but that that in no way meant that any decision on the implementation of an SDI initiative would be taken without proper discussion.

My right hon. and learned Friend went further and pointed out that, under the ABM treaty of 1972, the US could not unilaterally implement SDI following the conclusion of its research without negotiation with the other signatory to the ABM treaty. That important point must be remembered.

We must not allow ourselves to be seduced by the new approach to foreign affairs by the Russians. They should be reminded of their contribution to international diplomacy and to the Third world. It is all very well for the Soviet Union to tell us in the West that we must do more to help the Third world, but their philosophy for many years has been built on guns rather than butter.

It is a telling factor that, compared with the United Nations target of 0.7 per cent., the Soviet Union is well below 0.2 per cent. in its economic aid, and much of that is tied to harsh stipulations that often result in the recipient country, in meeting those stipulations, being worse off than if it had not received the aid in the first place.

The Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting will take place in the autumn. It will be an important moment in the development of the Commonwealth because there has been a big change in its leadership, and, apart from the leaders, some of the principal actors are new. For example, there are new Prime Ministers in Canada, New Zealand, India and Barbados, and the Prime Minister of Australia is relatively new.

When the British Prime Minister visited Malaysia, the Prime Minister there, Dr. Mahathir bin Mohamed, went out of his way to question some of the traditional values on which the Commonwealth was based, That frankness and informality, to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred, is extremely important, and it will be the responsibility of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers, including the British Prime Minister, to educate and lead, as it were, so as to inculcate into the newcomers the qualities of the Commonwealth which we continue to apply. Those qualities enable us to cross the North-South, East-West divide and to negotiate in a manner that is not possible in more structured and rigid forums.

Later, when the United Nations celebrates its 40th anniversary, it will be useful for that body to ponder where it has arrived after 40 years. It might consider whether many of the ritualised resolutions which it passes take it further away from the art of the possible, a concept which the founders of the United Nations and drafters of its charter carefully built into its operations, particularly for the work of the Security Council. The United Nations could learn from the Commonwealth, for example how to talk to one another and how to reach the consensus which is so important in diplomacy.

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): Two reports on European union are currently in circulation. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development knows as much as anyone about the Dooge report; he was one of its principal authors. The European Parliament report covers the same subject.

It is not necessary to spell out the dangers posed to western Europe by the Soviet Union. They are all too stark. They are written across the pages of history in blood. However, Europe faces other dangers and other opportunities. One other danger—this may seem strange—is posed by the Americans and in a sense by the Japanese. We are influenced by the Americans in every sphere. In defence, our dependence on them is obvious. In economic matters, the effect of the dollar on every other currency is evident. The Americans are benevolent friends and allies, and the alliance has lasted for more than 40 years, but will it still exist in another 40 years' time?

[Mr. Michael Knowles]

America has her own interests. For the first time last year, her trade with the far east was greater than her trade with Europe. A people's interests are bound to follow their trade, and so, in the end, are their defence interests. Europe has been given time — so far we have squandered it—to do something to help itself.

The obvious historical analogy is that of the Greek city states. Those wonderful cultures, trapped between the Roman and Persian empires, were in the end absorbed. They were absorbed by the Romans, but they might have been absorbed by either power. That is the prospect that faces western Europe, but we have time to do something about it. That is the inspiration behind the two reports.

Union is the only answer. Europeans respond to ideas and ideals, good and bad. There is still a danger of nationalism in Europe. If Britain wishes to follow a more nationalistic path, it will be hard for us to argue with other countries that may wish to do so too, including Germany and all the states that formerly constituted Germany. There cannot be one law for some and another for others.

Europeans are different from Americans. If one tells Americans to go out and make a fortune, they will respond. Their society is built on those lines. That is not true of Europe as a whole. People may make fortunes, but they respond to ideas and ideals, usually political, and wealth may be a consequence.

We have an ideal that could light Europe up. That ideal is union. Spinelli said that the new treaty would arise out of despair and not enthusiasm. He was right. There was a time when people really wanted to go forward. Now they feel that we must go forward because if we try to stand still we will fall apart. The Community is not moving rapidly enough to deal with all the major issues that face it. We must clear the decision-making process. We must return to the Treaty of Rome and do away with the Luxembourg compromise. Those are the starting points that we must tackle before we embark on anything more dramatic.

I hope that we shall have a full debate on the subject before the Milan conference. It is clear, talking to friends and colleagues on the continent, that seven out of 10 members of the Community want to go ahead with virtually another Messina conference. Their line might be simple and run, "We will hold the conference. You are welcome to come, but if you do not, we shall go ahead anyway." What will be the Government's and the House's response to that?

We made the mistake of standing back 30 years ago, believing that the Messina conference would not work. We then had to join later, on what everyone perceived as disadvantageous terms. It might be forgivable to make a mistake once, but a second mistake cannot be excused. Nevertheless, that is what could happen in the next three or four months, never mind one year. We signed the Stuttgart declaration and there were the events at Fontainebleau. The bill for signing those documents is now being presented.

I understand why the Government do not want a new treaty. The idea of having to back it through the House cannot be attractive. It will be a hard fight, but the difficulty is partly of the Government's own making. We have happily signed all of the declarations. I do not believe that what we are hearing from our friends in the Community is sheer rhetoric. The time for prevarication is past.

In the next few months, we shall have to make crucial decisions that will affect the future of Britain and Western Europe as a whole. The consequences of Messina are coming to the boil and the time for Tindemans' reports and the other failed hopes are over. People want to move. We must face up to whether we want to be part of that movement. My answer is simple. It is yes.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): The House will not be surprised if I concentrate on South Africa, perhaps to correct some of the anomalies and misnomers of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes). I tell him, as I tell those who follow the line which he follows and which the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) might take up, that it is easy, in the cosy atmosphere of Westminster, to pontificate on human rights in another country some 6,000 miles away and on how its system should be run.

Whatever wrongs are going on in that part of the world, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North lacks — he perhaps will not admit it to the House—the knowledge that South African society is probably the most complex in the world today. We do not help that society or members of it, whatever the colour of their skin, by lambasting attacks such as the hon. Gentleman made on the South African Government and those who are genuinely trying to help from within South Africa.

During the past 24 hours I have been heartened by the comments of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues that, despite all the proposals that have been put to them by the opposition parties, we are standing firm, trying to achieve some co-operation with South Africa and trying to understand circumstances there. Part of that country's problem is that many claim to be leaders. Bishop Tutu represents only the fourth largest church organisation in South Africa, but he seems to speak, as he says, for all blacks in South Africa. Many of those who put forward their own arguments, including Opposition Members, try to give the impression that their view is the only one that the black in South Africa wants to be put forward. I tell them and Bishop Tutu that there are large bodies of opinion in South Africa which are completely at variance with their opinions. Many are seeking for some co-operation from us, and some understanding of their problems. Pontification from Westminster Members in not helping.

Encouraged though I am by Her Majesty's Government's attitude to the problems in South Africa, I am discouraged by the continuing presence here of the African National Congress, and by the respectability that we seem still to be giving to the United Democratic Front. It is worth quoting an article that appeared in the Daily Express this week about the activities of the ANC, so that the House can understand that both the ANC and the UDF are bent on revolutionary change, which will inevitably mean death and bloodshed in South Africa. My quotation comes from an article on Tuesday 23 April, and the words of a leading member of the ANC, Mr. Sereste Khoabi. He said:

"This is the beginning of the intensification of the revolution in South Africa, and the violence will continue until victory is obtained.

In the past we have not indulged in the reckless killing of human beings. We attacked the economic instruments of white power.

But that will not necessarily be the case in the future.

In future we will be agressive."

Mr. Robert Hughes rose——

Mr. Carlisle: I do not have time to give way.

The House will understand that while we continue to give sanction to people using such talk, we are seen by many countries, concerned in the argument about human rights, to be harbouring terrorists who are bent on violent revolution in South Africa.

If we are to solve the problems of that troubled country, and the problems of the various races and tribes there, we must think of co-operation. I am pleased that the words that we heard from my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, and from other Ministers, have been on that basis. They are right to reject disinvestment. It was interesting to hear the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) put forward a policy that he did not have the courage to pursue when he was in office in 1976. He said that the situation is worse now than it was in 1976, but that is nonsense. Between the riots of 1976 and the position of the blacks today there is a dramatic difference. In 1976, as the Opposition will know, the job opportunities for blacks were limited, the blacks were not able to join trade unions, the wages disparity between blacks and whites was far greater than it is today, and education and other social services were much worse.

To take the words of Mr. Harry Oppenheimer in a speech to the South Africa Club only last week, one can half understand the riots of 1976 because there was no hope for the blacks then. What the South African Government have done by the many and varied changes that have taken place, changes that are far more than cosmetic for those who are trying to assist the country and understand its problems, has meant that there is hope. Those circumstances should be seen as the background for the sad events of Uitenhage in the past few weeks. I condemn and deplore what happened at Uitenhage, and I regret what happened, as every hon. Member has, but that must be seen against the background of the violence encouraged by members of the UDF and the ANC. We would do well to learn from that violence, and offer sympathy and understanding for the terrible problems that that country faces.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I should like to congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on his speech and especially one line that I particularly liked. He said that the Government intend to stand up strongly in terms of our defence and to seek to improve relationships with the Soviet Union, but not by dropping our guard in any way.

It is interesting to compare the fundamental strengths and weaknesses of the totalitarian states, such as the Soviet Union, and the democracies, such as the United States, when considering the East-West power struggle. The totalitarian state's strength is its ability to sustain armed conflict when no direct threat to the home country exists; its greatest weakness is its inability to generate real economic wealth. The great strength of a democracy such as the United States is its ability to generate enormous economic wealth; its weakness, especially since Vietnam, is its inability to conduct sustained military operations in defence of freedom and other democracies when there is no apparent threat to the mainland of the United States. We should learn that lesson and always be conscious of it.

It is always much better for us to use our economic power in preference to risking being placed in an inherently weak position where we have to use our short-term military power. If Britain had not been so penny pinching in defence, we would not have had to pay such an enormous price in the Falklands. If we had not been so penny pinching in defence before the second world war and had used our economic power, we would not have had to face the tremendous cost of that war.

Last week, when I was in Washington, I had the great privilege and honour of meeting President Reagan when I was trying to persuade Senators and Representatives—my efforts proved to be in vain in the House of Representatives—to support their President and to use economic power in Nicaragua in the defence of freedom rather than eventually face the threat with military power. In President Reagan, the free world has a dedicated friend. He is a man of political integrity who means business. The United Kingdom also has a great friend in the President.

The United States and the Soviet Union are locked in an arm wrestling exercise in Nicaragua, through the activities of surrogate states. There is a threat not only to the United States but to the whole free world. For if the United States fails to back its strong card in central America by using its wealth, it will eventually be forced to guard its southern borders with military forces. Those military forces will largely be drawn from other parts of the world, including Europe. That is a threat to us. Imagine the morale of NATO and Europe if American forces were withdrawn to defend the United States' southern borders.

I had the honour of meeting Mr. and Mrs. Gorbachev when they were in London. Although Soviet goals have not changed in any way, its style of leadership and diplomacy certainly have.

Mr. Gorbachev is alert, highly intelligent and well-educated. He is a tough and dedicated communist, a good speaker and a thoroughly professional and modern-style politician. That in itself is a new image in the Soviet leadership. Mr. Gorbachev has a sense of humour and a ready smile. In fact, he has style. He has charisma—western-style to exploit that charisma, he is prepared to use the western news media. He will not have liberal policies or policies similar to those of the President Kennedy. He is a tough Communist. But he will have a great effect on the world. It is important that we should recognise the significance of his charisma. For although it is good news for the Soviet Union, it presents a new and greater challenge for the western world.

Mr. Gorbachev will use his power in the Soviet Union to motivate the work force, and to persuade the reluctant Soviet nomenclature or elite to accept the desirability and advantages of economic change.

In China, one of the most fundamental revolutions is occurring thanks to the Hong Kong treaty negotiated by the Government. Deng Xiaoping is not communising Hong Kong; he is capitalising China. He does not have a nomenclature or an elite, because they were all done away with in the cultural revolution. He is much nearer to his revolution than the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union will see these enormous changes as a direct challenge. I believe that Mr. Gorbachev will therefore persuade the Soviet elite to accept the need for change.

Mr. Gorbachev will be the first Soviet leader to be able to use the western news media to appeal directly to western grass roots over the heads of western leaders and negotiators. That will make it harder to deal with the CND, the anti-nuclear movement and all the other internal, surreptitious and anti-democratic forces with which the West has to contend.

Mr. Gorbachev will use his power of persuasion directly and personally with western leaders. He will exploit to the full the smallest splits that appear, such as the one about the SDI programme. Some western leaders feel that to take the nuclear element out of the nuclear deterrence might be dangerous. Some may also feel that it may be more dangerous on the front line—the first defence tier may be only 55 or 60 per cent. effective, and so on.

Like many other speakers, I believe that the SDI heralds a new era. Soviet research on SDI is already with us. The implications of that are so serious and important that the subject deserves a separate debate.

The Soviet goals have not changed under Mr. Gorbachev, but the Soviet style has and will continue to change. Out will go the brutish Russian bear and in will come the new image of the Soviet Union—responsible, reasonable and reassuring. The dirty work will be done by surrogate states—North Vietnam, Cuba, East Germany, and so on. Whilst the hammer will be kept available, it will be replaced by the sharp sickle. The backdrop, however, will be the same—red, Soviet red, blood red. We must not forget that.

There are three other areas of Soviet activity which are hardly ever mentioned but which are worrying. The first is Malta. The links that the Soviet Union has forged with that Government through the Libyans deserve our attention. Libyan military hardware and men are now near the soft underbelly of Europe.

The next is Iran. If Iraq wins the war, what will happen in Iran? We hear that about 300 mullahs left Iran a week or so ago. What will be the effect of the 1926 Soviet-Persian treaty if there is a debacle in Iran? Will it provide the pretext under which the Soviet Union could walk into Iran without being asked?

Finally, there is Antarctica. I agree that the United States and many other countries have camps there. However, the Soviet Union has seven. Two of them have 2 km runways and one has a 3 km runway. There is also a regular Soviet shuttle service from Minsk via Cairo, Aden and Maputo to Vostock. Is there not a suspicion that this activity indicates more than a peaceful, geological survey going on there? In this light we must reconsider the strategic defence of the United States and Europe. All our defence forces face north, east and west, leaving the southern window open. I predict that the Falkland Islands may prove to be more important strategically for the West in the future than is generally believed today.

I support and congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend upon his speech.

11.5 pm

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): To speak at this time of night one needs a thick skin and a rapid delivery.

I want to concentrate my remarks on East-West relations. I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's positive contribution to the improvement of these relations and also that of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), who, as has already been said, paved the way for the recent visits. I very much agree that we should have a disaggregated policy towards the countries of eastern Europe, keep up the pressure on human rights, develop trading links and cultural contacts and explore the options for arms control and disarmament in all the various forums which are involved. I hope that Her Majesty's Government will continue patiently and seriously with that policy.

I also agree that we should have practical and businesslike contacts with the Soviet Union since, as the Foreign Secretary has pointed out on a number of occasions both in the House and elsewhere, rapprochement between East and West should not be based on arms control alone. Indeed, arms control is likely to be successful and to be turned into genuine disarmament only if it is against the background of a warmer and more positive political relationship between East and West at all levels and in all forums.

I also agree very much with what my right hon. and learned Friend said in his wise and cautionary words on the strategic defence initiative. Indeed, it is clear that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister takes the same view. I am heartened that there is a good deal of caution about this controversial matter, because it is clear that the Washington Administration, as the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said, are very heterogeneous in these matters. I think that one can pin a lot of faith on the very sensible views of Secretary Shultz and Mr. Paul Nitze.

If the Camp David four points, to which reference has been made earlier, are to take on their true significance, there must be no leap-frogging by the United States to catch up and then surpass the alleged state of the art in the Soviet Union; no breaking of the 1972 ABM treaty, which is still an essential pillar of the precarious edifice of arms control between the two superpowers; not early abandonment of the tried and tested doctrine of mutually assured deterrence—as my right hon. and learned Friend rightly called it—which is, of course, based on the ability of each side to inflict unacceptable damage upon the other with an assured second-strike capability; and no succumbing to the temptation to escape into technological fantasies about space defence systems at the expense of real and urgent progress on disarmament with regard to the offensive capabilities in strategic nuclear weapons of both sides.

The United States policy, as it is advanced by Mr. Weinberger and others, is in danger of putting the Soviets into a sort of Morton's fork. If they do not go ahead, they will lose credibility as a superpower in the one dimension in which they lay claim to that position. If they do go ahead, it will prejudice their more reasonable domestic objectives and give another alarming twist to the spiral of the arms race. I think it is likely that a mixture of both things will happen, that there will be no total and foolproof development of SDI, whether in this century of the next, and that ICBMs will be developed and modernised in parallel.

In the meantime we must ask whether the Americans are really keen on the research stage of SDI in order to negotiate away the subsequent stages on the pattern of the 1972 ABM treaty; or whether President Reagan, in particular, is committed to a technological dream which he may not fully understand and which was apparently sold to him by the notorious Edward Teller? If so, there is a real danger of decision-making being pre-empted by technological determinism and of the superpower relationship being fatally destabilised.

Hitherto, since the late 1940s, deterrence has been the basis of our defence in the West. Can we be equally sure that in the future any form of defence would provide sufficient deterrence? I think we should heed the adage, better the devil we know.

In conclusion, I think that my right hon. and learned Friend was absolutely right in his splendid RUSI speech to point out:

"Complete protection [against nuclear attack] is not available to any country. The best that can be hoped for is a balance of capability matched by mutual confidence about intentions."

It is precisely those two points that we in western Europe are most right to be cautious about with the present obsession in parts of the American Administration with SDI, and it is on those two points that we should found our continuing policy advice to Washington.

11.10 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I shall be as brief as possible. The visit of the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) to the United States was, fortunately, not successful in persuading Congress of the need to support the President in his attitude to central America.

Mr. James Lamond: He tipped the balance.

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend may be right — perhaps we should be grateful to the hon. Member for Winchester. It is significant that the President has suffered a major rebuff on his obsession with creating another Vietnam in central America. It is good news that Congress has voted to refuse funding for the Contras. It must be bad news for the Federation of Conservative Students who have been going around with posters saying, "Arm the Contras" and "Victory to the Contras".

The position in central America is serious, especially to world peace and in relation to the attitude of the United States towards the remainder of the world. A statement was made recently by Senators Tom Harkin and John Kerry and Congressman Norman Minetta about the attitude of President Reagan towards central America, in which they catalogued the Reagan Administration's record on central America. They said:

"The disturbing, systematic record of deceit documented by this report exposed a growing credibility gap which undermines the Administration's accountability to Congress, and threatens the constitutional separation of powers between the executive and legislative branches."

It is the opposition to President Reagan that has been mounted in the United States that is very significant at the present time.

When the Minister replies, he must come clean about the Government's attitude to central America. I listened carefully to the Foreign Secretary when he opened the debate. He said that the Government supported the Contadora process. They may well make protestations in support of that, but their record on central America is quite the opposite. Their record is, first, to refuse all aid to Nicaragua since the revolution in 1979; secondly, to give Nicaragua the lowest possible export credit guarantee rating so that there is virtually no trade; thirdly, to open aid to El Salvador and offer training facilities to the El Salvador army for its oppressive work; and, fourthly, to continue trading in arms and spares with the Government of Honduras — an aggressive Government who do not recognise human rights in their own country. When the Minister replies he should give us some facts on that.

I wish to inform the House briefly about the human rights position in El Salvador. Recently a delegate from the committee for the defence of human rights visited Britain. He said that under Duarte the number of human rights violations had gone down, but it was due to an increasing level of sophistication in the Government's methods of repression. Yet that has been used by the United States in its pro-Duarte propaganda. It is both difficult and important to counter that campaign. It is important that the House recognises that there are selective and systematic violation of human rights; there are selective and systematic killings of opponents of the Duarte Government. A civil war is still going on in El Salvador.

If the British Government continue to give aid and support to the Government of El Salvador, they are aiding and abetting that civil war. They are putting themselves outside the process the Contadora countries have mounted.

El Salvador has about 1 million refugees, and there are millions more within central America who face daily the consequences of American policy supported by the British Government. They suffer a terrible plight. Many of those people are living in difficult circumstances and have been refugees for years. Many of the children are growing up in refugee camps. That is the reality of American policy in central America.

Recently the Transnational Institute, which is based in Amsterdam, published a European response to the American crisis. It has been forwarded to the Foreign Office and to many members of Congress and of the Senate, who have been asked to support it. The report gives four views of what is happening in central America. First, it says:

"The roots of the crisis in Central America lie in the social and economic problems of the region. A durable peace in the region can only be established through political solutions and economic development, and these must be rooted in a reasonably just social order."

Secondly, it says that the tensions in central America are not manifestations of the East-West crisis, as the American Government would continually have us believe, but that they are to do with the desire of the people of Nicaragua, El Salvador, Honduras and the other countries in central America for decency, an end to hunger, and an opportunity for their children to grow up in a peaceful and just world. It is the obsession of the United States with the Monroe doctrine and the control of that region that prevents that.

Thirdly, the document calls for a diplomatic rather than a military solution. Fourthly, it says that Nicaragua, with a democratically elected Government who are determined to improve the lot of their people, should be able to do that in peace and should not be forced to spend so much of its precious resources on defending its territory against American-backed Contra forces and agents.

We should not stand aside and do and say nothing about central America when the United States is obsessed with starting another Vietnam war in that region. The Government of the United Kingdom have a role to play. If they support the Contadora process, as they say they do, it is incumbent upon them to stop aid to El Salvador, to stop military sales to Honduras and to support genuinely the search for a just and lasting peace in central America which can be achieved only by recognising and respecting the elected Government of Nicaragua and the peaceful intentions of the Nicaraguan people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Mr. Donald Anderson.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it a tradition and custom of the House that Members should attend for the opening of the debate, then disappear and only come back at the end of the debate, expecting to be called, and should then be called, when other Members have been in the Chamber throughout the whole debate except, in my case, for a brief period when I visited my son in hospital? Is that a tradition and custom of the House? If it is, it is a waste of time Back Benchers being here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the selection of speakers is a matter for the Chair. It is a very difficult exercise, particularly today when there have been so many long speeches and so many hon. Members have wanted to take part. I think the hon. Gentleman knows the traditions of the House as well as I do.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): May I begin by expressing a fellow feeling with the Minister of State who will be expected in a period of 20 minutes or so to respond to a debate which has lasted for some seven hours, with 23 speakers, on a wide variety of topics? We look forward to the many replies which he will give.

As is usual in overall foreign affairs debates, the area covered has been extensive. The many hon. Members on both sides of the House who have contributed have displayed considerable expertise. Perhaps the most effective speeches have been those which have concentrated on one subject instead of ranging widely over the world. We have reacted to the major crises and points of interest in the world today. Not surprisingly, East-West relations, the significance of the new Soviet leadership and the significance of the star wars debate have taken up a substantial part of the debate.

The starting point was the star wars speech by President Reagan, which was perhaps more reminiscent of a western film than a serious contribution to a debate on strategy. His officials, particularly Mr. Nitze and others, have been trying to interpret and re-interpret that speech, which was in very apocalyptic terms.

The Opposition and, I believe, the country as a whole felt considerable admiration for the Foreign Secretary's think-piece speech to the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies setting out the legitimate concerns of the people of Western Europe, who clearly have a major contribution to make in that debate. The points made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman were extremely valid. The psychological impact on the Soviet Union of the concept as elaborated by the United States President in his initial speech, the fears of a Maginot line in space, the deferment of consideration of the overall strategic implications of the new doctrine, the scepticism about the extent to which the dynamic of the research would be followed by deployment and the fears about where political control would be established are all major considerations which should properly be put. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) pointed out, however, they were met with a somewhat hysterical reaction from The Times and indeed from Mr. Perle who was hurriedly sent over here. It is only sad that there is some evidence of backpedalling by the Foreign Secretary since he gave that major think-piece to the RUSI.

In this, as in other areas, the Government must learn that an ally need not be blind supporter—a point made eloquently and well in the helpful contribution of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden). In too many instances we have discarded our own judgment and interests at the behest of the United States Administration. The decision to leave UNESCO, for example, would clearly not have been taken if the United States Administration had not decided to do so, with the consequent pressure of interest groups in the United States and in this country on the British Government. The same applies to our position on the law of the sea convention and, perhaps most markedly of all, to our docile acquiescence in the absurdities and contradictions of United States policy in central America, as was clearly illustrated by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) and my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke).

The absurdity of British policy was perhaps most clearly shown in the extent to which we yielded to United States pressure by sending observers to the elections in El Salvador in March and May last year but refused to send observers to the elections in Nicaragua in November. We could not even vote against the mining of Nicaraguan ports by people armed and trained by the United States Administration. Do we accept the United States analysis that Nicaragua is already behind the Iron Curtain? Do we not perceive the contradictions of United States policies — for example, in demanding power sharing in Nicaragua between the Sandinista Government and the Contras but insisting that there should be no power sharing in El Salvador between the President Duarte's Government and the FMLN/FDR?

Do we not shudder when President Reagan describes the Contras as the moral equivalent of the Founding Fathers and pledges to do everything in his power to win the central American struggle, which means by extension that if the current siege of Nicaragua, politically, economically and in every other way, does not succeed the end of the road will be direct military intervention? Yet in not one instance have the British Government in any way distanced themselves from those contradictions and absurdities of United States policy in central America. For example, do we not recognise that the record of Nicaragua on human rights is infinitely better than that of both Guatemala and El Salvador?

On the general problem of human rights, may we again applaud what the Secretary of State did in his visit to Poland? In a dramatic way, he showed this country's concern with the problems of human rights not only in Poland itself but in Eastern Europe as a whole. Apart from his singing of Welsh hymns, which, personally, one much approves of, one noticed his symbolic visit to the grave of Father Popieluszko and his meeting with Solidarity activists.

I should like to put this matter to the Secretary of State. We approve of that initiative, and the style and symbolism of his activities in Poland, but when will he, in a similar way, pay tribute at the grave of Steve Biko? When will he meet representatives of the African National Congress? When will he earn a rebuff from the South African Government as well deserved as the rebuff that he received from the Polish Government?

With regard to human rights, I simply repeat some of the questions about Hong Kong, to which I hope the Minister of State is ready to respond. Questions were raised about the Government's likely response to the recommendations of the Select Committee on Home Affairs relating to the Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong. There are roughly 12,000, over half of whom are in closed camps. Do the Government accept that they should make another effort in the hope that we can persuade, by our example, other Governments to admit those who have been languishing in the closed camps? I concede that this is a delicate matter, but perhaps the Government will tell us of the current state of negotiations with China about the composition of the joint liaison group. We understand that there are problems and that the Chinese are insisting that there be no representative of the Hong Kong Chinese included within that joint liaison group. Perhaps the Minister can say whether such is the case and what our policy is in respect of the joint liaison group.

There has been less concentration on the middle east than in most foreign affairs debates, but I should like to ask the Minister about a matter raised by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber on whether the Government accept that there is any role for the EEC in respect of the solution of the problems of the middle east, and whether it is now possible to build on the precedent of the Venice declaration. There are some signs that Syria, which, on any analysis, following the Lebanese problems over the past few years, will have a veto on events in Lebanon itself and possibly over the future of Israel, would welcome a European initiative. Everyone accepts that, because of ethnic politics in the United States, and because of the natural caution of the United States after the last debacle in Lebanon, the Reagan Administration are understandably proceeding with some caution. The signs are that the visit of Mr. Murphy as the emissary of President Reagan has not met with any real chance of success.

I shall seek now to deal with the problems of South Africa, on which I shall concentrate my remaining remarks. The matter has been touched on at length by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) and by the hon. Members for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) and for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) and others.

New forces are at work in South Africa. Domestic unrest is unlikely to fade away, as happened after previous periods of unrest in 1960 and 1976. Today it has been reported that there have been further disturbances in Alexandra, Soweto, the Free State and the Northern Cape. It would be quite wrong for the Opposition to claim that the developments since the state President's speech on 25 January have been without significance. Reform of the marriage laws affects perhaps only 1,000 people out of a population of 26 million and has only symbolic importance, but the decision to end the forced removal of blacks from white areas may have a real impact upon blacks in the Republic. Nevertheless, the essential ingredients of apartheid remain. The structure upholding white power remains in existence. There is no suggestion that the blacks, forming roughly 73 per cent. of the population, will be brought into the national political dialogue.

As for Angola and Namibia, even though the South African forces have been withdrawn south of the border with Angola they remain poised to return to Angola if they deem it necessary, and South Africa is still firmly in illegal occupation of Namibia. Negotiations have been offered to Nelson Mandela if he abandons the armed struggle, yet at the same time the South African Government arrest leaders of the United Democratic Front—people I have met like Archie Gumede and Albertina Sisulu—because they demand a non-violent end to apartheid. This is part of the reality of life in South Africa. The trial of the 16 members of the United Democratic Front who are charged with high treason is likely to begin in May and will probably last for 18 months. There will be real advance only when the black majority is taken into the political dialogue instead of the leading representatives of the black majority being placed in indefinite custody. In September 1984 they were placed in detention without trial under section 28 of the Internal Security Act 1982. Now—something which is just as bad—they are placed in detention with trial, a trial which will last for no less than 18 months.

What has been the reaction of the Government? The hon. Member for Luton, North is an ardent and consistent apologist on behalf of the South African Government and made his point about the United Democratic Front, but has he read resolution 560 that was unanimously adopted by the Security Council on 12 March 1984 and therefore was supported by our Government? It says, inter alia, that our Government, along with other members of the Security Council:

> "2. Strongly condemns the arbitrary arrests by the Pretoria régime of members of the United Democratic Front and other mass organisations opposed to South Africa's policy of apartheid;
> 3. Calls on the Pretoria régime to release unconditionally and immediately all political prisoners and detainees, including Nelson Mandela and all other black leaders with whom it must deal in any meaningful discussion of the future of the country;
> 4. Also calls upon the Pretoria régime to withdraw the charges of 'high treason' instituted against the United Democratic Front officials, and calls for their immedaiate and unconditional release;
> 5. Commends the massive united resistance of the oppressed people of South Africa against apartheid, and reaffirms the legitimacy of their struggle for a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa".

That resolution was adopted by the Security Council and supported by the British Government. It shows the extent to which the hon. Member for Luton, North, in his consistent advocacy and apology for South African Government policies, is out of step with his Government.

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Anderson: I will not give way, because I have 20 minutes in total in which to make my speech.

Although we agree with what the Government have done in the Security Council in that respect and in other matters, on the whole their attitude towards South Africa has been a policy of appeasement with which we fundamentally disagree. For example, in June of last year the Government welcomed President Botha during his visit. What did that visit achieve? Would they adopt the same attitude today to such a visit? In August of last year the Government did not condemn the new tricameral constitution. In September of last year they acted in a totally supine way on the issue of the Coventry four. In a letter to me dated 13 November 1984 the Secretary of State wrote:

"Malcolm Rifkind strongly condemned the South African Government's breach of faith and made it clear that, following the issue of warrants of arrest, we expected the South African Government to do nothing further to impede the return of the men to face the charges. I remain strongly of that view. For that reason, I do not think it would be right for us to take punitive action which would remove any prospect of bringing the four men to court."

What prospects are there now of bringing those four men to court? What reason can now exist for not taking strong action in view of the South African Government's total breach of faith after their agent, their first secretary at their embassy, had given an unconditional undertaking—had pledged the credit of the South African Government—that they would return those four men so that they could stand trial in our courts on charges of illegal arms dealing? On that matter, as in so many others, the British Government have been totally supine towards the South African Government. Imagine what would have occurred, for example, had the Nigerian Government broken faith in that way. Would the British Government have taken a similarly docile attitude?

Yet the Minister of State continues to repeat the refrain that the blacks are against sanctions—despite what my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North said—and that the courts in South Africa have a healthy reputation for independence, when that is disproved by the facts.

Do the Government accept that the Crocker initiative on Namibia is now dead as a result of the internal settlement agreed by the South Africans? The hon. Member for Wantage made some clear and logical comments on the issue. He said that there should be a constitution before elections. What validity would the participants in a constitutional convention have? He must know that there would be no chance of such a convention being accepted by the United Nations.

What is the Government's response to the call by the non-aligned movement for the whole matter to be returned to the United Nations, where sanctions should be imposed on the South Africans because of their illegal occupation of the territory? That illegality is accepted by the Government. From that illegally occupied territory, the South Africans menace and threaten neighbouring Angola. Will the Government at least give a clear assurance that they rest on Security Council resolution 435 and will have nothing to do with the interim Government?

In relation to South Africa, the Government must use both stick and carrot. They must commend any moves in the right direction but recognise the enormous gulf between what has been done and what must be done to ensure a peaceful future for that country. Do the Government accept that the EEC code should be strengthened? Are they happy that so many British companies have not filed any returns in respect of that code—major companies such as Marley? The Government are perceived to be colluding with apartheid and our credibility is at risk.

Why cannot the Government decide to meet representatives of the African National Congress? That would have a considerable symbolic significance.

Mr. John Carlisle: Terrorists.

Mr. Anderson: The apologist for South Africa says "Terrorists". There is no parallel between the ANC and, say, the IRA. The IRA may participate in elections if it wishes. The ANC, like all black opinion, is totally excluded from participation in elections. Why cannot the Government decide to meet representatives of the ANC, as they have properly met representatives of the South West Africa People's Organisation?

There will be profound changes in South Africa. We will have to show whose side we are on, and whether we support profound political and economic change in that country. Our position in respect of pressures was made clear earlier in the debate by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East; and we stand firmly behind him.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I agree with the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) about the quality and breadth of all the speeches made in the debate, but I must apologise to the many hon. Members whose speeches I shall not have time to comment on.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) and the other hon. Members who complemented the diplomatic staff of the Foreign and Commonwealth office on their work. If, as many hon. Members have said, there have been a number of important successes in our foreign policy in the past 12 months, the greatest tribute must be paid to the dedicated work of our professional diplomats who work hard and successfully in pursuing our national interests.

I listened with interest to the speech of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey). I thank him for his complimentary remarks about the speeches — and, indeed, the work—of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. His compliments compared favourably with his barbed exchange with his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond). One appreciates the strain from which the right hon. Gentleman must often suffer in his relations with his colleagues. In a recent Fabian tract, he wrote that "working only with socialists was, as Nye Bevan said . . . a policy for hermits."

No one would dream of accusing the right hon. Gentleman of hermit-like tendencies at any time in his career.

The right hon. Gentleman's comments on arms control issues and, in particular, his reaction to the recent proposals by Mr. Gorbachev, showed that there is considerable confusion within the ranks of the Opposition. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker). There is significant confusion, and I can see no clear answer to it. When Mr. Gorbachev first made his proposal a couple of weeks ago, the initial reaction of the right hon. Gentleman and of the Leader of the Opposition was to condemn the Government for not reacting more favourably to that encouraging initiative.

When the hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton raised the same point today, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East correctly said that he was not very impressed with a six-month delay of weapons which would probably not have been deployed in that period in the first place. That suggests a certain confusion, but it is nothing compared with the other confusion in the right hon. Gentleman's mind in these matters.

When NATO started deploying Cruise and Pershing missiles, the right hon. Gentleman was the first to denounce that and to call for an instant freeze on the grounds that Pershing was a most sophisticated and highly technical and dangerous weapon which would clearly be destabilising. We heard the call for a freeze again today, but on the ground that Pershing is so completely useless and the SS20s so technologically superior that it is essential to have a freeze before too many SS20s are deployed by the Soviet Union.

Mr. Healey: I regret to say that, when I made my first remark, I was not aware that Pershing II was such a bum weapon and that the United States had been compelled to delay its deployment because it blows up on the launching pad. I hope that the hon. Member will feel that he was conned as much as I was when the thing was first deployed.

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He has just confirmed to the House that he has a fixation about the need for a freeze, irrespective of whether Soviet weapons are more or less effective than NATO's. His view does not arise out of any serious analysis of the threat that the West faces from SS20s and other weapons; he simply has a fixation about the need for that reaction by the West and is not prepared to examine the matter on its merits. That is a matter of sadness and regret, because it is not up to the standards applied by the right hon. Gentleman when he was Secretary of State for Defence and which we believe he would still be capable of if he were not tied to a party with the views of which he only partially agrees.

It is unfortunate that the right hon. Member for Leeds, East and his right hon. and hon. Friends seem able only to condemn every central American country other than Nicaragua, for which they can find no fault. When he criticised the suggestion that the Government should give military training to some representatives of the Salvadorean armed forces, my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) correctly said that Salvador has an elected President and an elected Administration and that it is not unreasonable that we should give some military assistance to support a democratically elected Government in central America who are fighting insurgents. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have been the first to agree with that.

On European Community food aid, the right hon. Gentleman asked whether there was a sinister explanation for the fact that the agreed amount of food aid had been reduced from the original estimate of 40 million ecu to 26 million ecu. He alleged that there was a sinister explanation for which the Government are responsible. The original 40 million ecu was proposed by the Commission, based on the original draft 1985 budget. The Commission reduced that figure to 26 million ecu because of the changes that had already been made in the final budget. It was a technical matter and involved no element of policy. There was no disagreement among any of the member states, and the right hon. Gentleman was wrong again.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) for his comments on the White Paper which has been issued recently. I confirm that the Government will consider legislation to enable us to ensure the disposal of surplus diplomatic property and to have some influence on the location of diplomatic premises.

I listened carefully to the important speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) on Cyprus. I do not have time to go into details on that matter, but we continue to strive for a policy that will meet the legitimate aspirations of the Turkish and Greek communities there.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) criticised my position on the Dooge committee.

Mr. Jackson: He was right.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman was not right. He suggested that the United Kingdom was holding up the progress of major reform. However, I must say to him, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles), that the United Kingdom is with the majority in believing in the need to have quicker decision-making in the Community and more majority voting. We insist that it is also essential to retain the ultimate right of veto, and that view is held not simply by the three member states that expressed their view on the Dooge committee but by many other member states. Only this week, the West Germany Agriculture Minister referred to the Germany policy on cereal prices as a "vital national interest". We all know that when any EEC Minister uses that phrase, he has something particularly in mind.

Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends spoke about East-West relations. I very much agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery), who reminded the House that the Soviet Union is still an empire, and possibly the only remaining empire.

I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), not only for his kind words to me but for reminding the House that the Soviet Union in its policy has never objected to using force when other methods have not met its requirements. The examples of Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Poland have constantly to be borne in mind.

I particularly enjoyed the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), who made a thoughtful speech and rightly pointed out that if Soviet policy, and the Soviet Union, had not experienced any significant and major changes in its attitudes over the past few years, there would be an even greater need for western continuity of policy. We should not allow a volatile situation, which can only be damaging to our interests.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East concentrated his remarks on South Africa. To deal first with Namibia, I re-emphasise, as the hon. Gentleman asked me to do, that the policy of Her Majesty's Government continues to be based on Security Council resolution 435. We have made it clear that we believe that the recent developments announced by the South African Government are not acceptable either to the United Kingdom or to any of the other members of the Contact Group. That has been made clear to the South African authorities in bilateral representations made by the ambassadors of each of the countries of the Contact Group in South Africa.

I have read with interest the various articles and other material that my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) has written on South Africa, and I listened carefully to what he said. Security Council resolution 435 represents the best prospect for an internationally recognised independence for Namibia. We have always made it clear that if all the parties in Namibia—the South West Africa People's Organisation and internal parties—were to come forward with improvements or changes on which they could all agree, it would not be the business of the rest of the world to stand in the way of any change. However, that must be on the basis of the agreement of all the parties.

To a large extent, there has been a significant consensus in the policy of successive Governments, Labour and Conservative, on South Africa. We have an equal and genuine abhorrence of apartheid, and we have recognised and implemented both the United Nations arms embargo and the Gleneagles agreement on sporting contacts with South Africa. I remind Labour Members that successive British Governments have refused to countenance the policy of economic sanctions, believing that it would be inappropriate, ineffective and undesirable.

I find the right hon. Member for Leeds, East guilty of some confusion again. When he was challenged as to why his position has now changed, he suggested that it was because the situation in South Africa has deteriorated since the previous Labour Government. Not only was that view not credible to the Government, but it was bluntly contradicted by the hon. Member for Swansea, East. Although the hon. Gentleman is not especially enthusiastic about the changes that have been announced in recent months, he acknowledged that there had been some significant changes and important reforms. Although he believed that they did not go anywhere near what was required, they represented progress. If there has been progress, that does not assist the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, who seeks to justify a policy of economic sanctions, which was not accepted.

Mr. Healey: Why did the hon. Gentleman support economic sanctions against Poland to change the internal situation, but not against South Africa for the same reason?

Mr. Rifkind: First, as the world knows, the sanctions that were taken against Poland were essentially symbolic in nature to express disapproval. Secondly, they did not work. Although there have been some improvements in Poland compared with the position when martial law was announced, Poland remains a country where Solidarity is banned and freedom has not been restored.

Mr. Healey: Is the hon. Gentleman telling us that he thinks now that the Government were mistaken in imposing sanctions against Poland? If so, why does he not remove the remaining constraints on Poland's access to international credit, and so on?

Mr. Rifkind: I am saying that there may be cases where, for symbolic reasons to express disapproval, sanctions may be appropriate.

Mr. Healey: Bullshit.

Mr. Rifkind: That is a very reasoned response—one that is slightly superior to the right hon. Gentleman's earlier comments.

The arguments that we have heard until now have not been that sanctions should be imposed for purely symbolic reasons, but that they might actually work. All the experience of the international community, not just for five years, but for 50 years—whether against Italy over Abyssinia or against Rhodesia over UDI—shows that sanctions are not a method of achieving fundamental change of the kind that the House would dearly like.

It is unlikely that sanctions could be enforced effectively against South Africa. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East will be the first to admit that sanctions against Rhodesia—a small, landlocked country—proved to be extremely difficult to implement and almost impossible to achieve.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rifkind: I am sorry, but I do not have time to give way. The speech by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) was longer than the time I have available to me.

A policy of economic sanctions which was effective and sealed off South Africa from the economic activity of the rest of the world would not only damage the Republic but profoundly damage, if not destroy, the economies of a number of its neighbours. It is impossible to conceive how Lesotho, Botswana, Swaziland, Zimbabwe or Mozambique could do other than suffer enormously if sanctions were effective.

I accept that opinion within South Africa is divided. I freely accept that there are many blacks, including responsible blacks, who, whether through a sense of frustration or genuine conviction, believe that this policy would be attractive and that it should be supported. It is equally the case that many other prominent blacks in South Africa take a different view. A lively debate is occurring in South Africa, involving for example, Chief Buthelezi—a determined opponent of economic sanctions—and Bishop Tutu. Even Bishop Tutu has not yet said that he supports sanctions. He has said that he may express that view, if there is inadequate political change in the months to come.

I emphasise that this policy, which was never supported by any Labour Government and which was never advocated by the right hon. Member for Leeds, East—either at the time of Sharpeville or when South Africa was going through the worst excesses of apartheid — is hardly likely to be a sensible policy to pursue when, by the very admission of the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues at the Dispatch Box, South Africa has experienced some progress in dismantling apartheid in recent months.

We all know that the various announcements that have been made with regard to mixed marriages, freehold tenure for blacks, legalisation of trade unions, the removal of job reservations and the various other developments of considerable significance have made an important contribution to the provision of at least the possibility of peaceful change in South Africa. The great unanswered question is whether the process of reform will be sufficiently fundamental to deal with the group areas legislation and with political rights for urban blacks and, by so doing, provide the fundamental change that we all want. At least that process has begun. It is a process that we should welcome, not condemn; recognise, not ignore. We should do what we can within our power to influence——

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

12 midnight

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) is again intervening, in ths case from outside the boundaries of the House. He might like to come and listen. He might learn a few important things.

I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to have this Adjournment debate, and I am grateful to the Minister for turning up to listen and I hope to answer.

Yeovil, now known as south Somerset district council, is one of the most progressive in Britain in many ways. It was one of the first to consider installing the Piper communications system for old people. As the Minister will be aware, systems such as Piper provide elderly people with the means of emergency communications to obtain assistance. Piper uses the standard telephone system to connect the elderly person to a central switchboard which is manned by trained and qualified staff capable of providing or obtaining immediate expert help when it is required.

The system provides a natural extension of the traditional warden in sheltered accommodation. At least, that is how I and the National TV Licence Records Office see it. One might go further and say that it is how most sensible people might see it. It seems that we cannot include the Home Office in that category, but more of that later.

Piper and similar systems provide the modern new-technology method of delivering warden servic to old people. Like much other new technology, it has some significant advantages over the old ways. It is more convenient and available for old people, in particular, those in disbursed accommodation. It also enables the council to provide the same service more efficiently and cost-effectively. We are told that the Government wish to encourage local authorities to be more efficient and cost effective, but not it seems the Home Office. It seeks to penalise councils and old people who use such new efficiencies. Again, more of that later.

As common sense dictates that Piper should be considered as merely another method of providing warden service, common sense also leads one to the conclusion that it should be treated in the same way when it comes to consider eligibility for concessionary TV licences.

Being a responsible and prudent authority and perhaps even recognising prophetically that common sense is not always the predominant quality in Government Departments, south Somerset district council wrote in 1982 to the National TV Licence Records Office in Bristol to ask for its view on the matter. It asked whether it would be true that in public housing specially provided for the elderly under part V of the Housing Act, 1957 the Piper system would count in all respects as the same as communal warden service in deciding eligibility for concessionary TV licences.

The council received an unequivocal answer in a letter from the National TV Licence Records Office dated 12 October 1982. It said:

> "Thus, if the Communication System terminates at a point at which such a person is employed, and that person makes regular calls to the old people, the conditions are satisfied."

That was the case which Yeovil put forward.

[Mr. Paddy Ashdown]

"If, in addition, that person is able to direct travelling wardens to the old persons as necessary the position is doubly fulfilled."

Again, it was doubly fulfilled in the case of Yeovil.

We are cautious people in Yeovil. There then followed an exchange of letters to make assurance doubly sure between the south Somerset district council and the National TV Licence Records Office, and we were again categorically assured beyond a peradventure that Piper qualified the elderly in part V accommodation for concessionary licences.

I quote from another letter of 10 January 1983 from NTVLRO in Bristol:

"if suitable property, originally provided as main-stream housing, has been permanently modified to specially provide for the elderly standard and the Housing Manager is able to make a categorical statement"— which he could—

"in writing that the properties concerned have been permanently modified so that they can now be said to be specially provided for the elderly then, subject to acceptable communal facilities"— which were available—

"such as the warden controlled Piper Call intercomm system"— specifically said in that case—

"these will qualify."

It would be impossible to get a clearer statement than that.

If the National TV Licence Record Office in Bristol says this, can we not accept it as the definitive, the final, word? Apparently we cannot. But south Somerset district council was not, of course, to know that. So it told the pensioners in my constituency, some 700 of them, in good faith — and I understand that similar problems have occurred elsewhere, in Rugby and in Colwyn—that they would get concessionary TV licences.

As the Minister will no doubt realise, that was important to old people on fixed incomes, because Piper is not provided free of charge. Last year the rent was £26 from old people's fixed incomes. But old people in my constituency and elsewhere felt that they could pay that to get the improved service that they required and that the council wanted to offer them, because it would be offset by the concessionary licence for their TV which was promised to them according to the NTVLRO. With their limited resources, this was precisely the basis on which they budgeted.

At this point all was well. The council had acted responsibly, and the National TV Licence Records Office had been clear in its advice. Old people in my constituency and elsewhere had been able to budget for a service which they needed. But we had reckoned without the Home Office. We had made the reasonable assumption that the Home Office knew what was going on in one of the sections for which it is responsible. We were just about to be disabused of such a comfortable notion.

The first I knew about it was when I received a letter from my chief housing officer written in March 1984—18 months after the NTVLRO had said that it would be all right. He said that there was some confusion, the Home Office was for some reason involved, and could I please find out what was going on. I duly wrote to the Secretary of State, who informed me boldly, three months later, in a letter of 18 June 1984 that "We have concluded that it"—

by which he meant Piper—

"does not satisfy the legal requirements."

There was no word of why, and my first question to the Minister, which I hope that he will answer, is; what was the reason for that?

The letter goes on to admit, rather candidly, that this is "not particularly logical or fair". Those are the words of the Secretary of State himself — and that such decisions were "arbitary". Just like that, he abandoned the undertakings given by the National TV Licence Records Office; just like that he cut the ground from under the feet of south Somerset district council, which had given a promise in good faith on the advice of his own officials; just like that he dumped on 700 pensioners in my constituency and many more outside it a requirement to find £58 more this year than they had either bargained or budgeted for.

It is true that the Minister waived the remaining licence fees for last year, but that does nothing for those elderly who have been snared in what I must call the Minister's trap and who are having to find money which they had not budgeted for this year — and Piper is, of course, a resource which they will wish to continue to use.

For some of the elderly in my constituency, such casual and, to use the Minister's words arbitrary, illogical and unfair decisions — for which we have been given no reason—will mean hardship. For others it could mean getting rid of their televisions. For all it is a blow as unkind as any that they have received from the Government this year, and that, frankly, is saying quite a lot.

I have a number of questions which I hope the Minister will answer. First, is he satisfied with the behaviour of a section of his Department for which he is responsible in this miserable saga? Secondly, is he not sufficiently in control of his Department to prevent such a thing from happening? Thirdly, what steps has he taken? Have any heads rolled as a result of the inefficiencies that have caused such misery to so many? Fourthly, will he now explain precisely why — in terms that the elderly who have suffered can understand — the Piper communications system, appropriately resourced, cannot be treated in the same way as the old-style warden system when dealing with eligibility for concessionary television licences?

Lastly, how can the Minister justify this chain of events? How can he justify pulling out the rug from under the National TV Licence Records Office and its decision? How can he justify leaving South Somerset district council in the lurch, when it made a promise in good faith? How can he justify causing so much hardship to many elderly people in my constituency and elsewhere in Britain?

12.11 am

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) not only on obtaining an Adjournment debate on this issue but on putting his case with eloquence and a great deal of effectiveness. I am bound to say that coming to the Dispatch Box on this issue gives me no great pleasure, because I must seek to explain to him and, I trust, defend an action that undoubtedly has caused hardship to pensioners in his constituency, through no fault of theirs. That is the hon. Gentleman's concern, and I share it with him.

Substantial problems are associated with this development. If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me—and I know that his courtesy is such that he will—I shall try to answer the questions that he posed with such firmness and explain the background to this case.

The concessionary 5p licence scheme which has been operating since 1969 was intended to rationalise the television licensing requirements in old people's homes, where previously residents in some homes had been treated as though they were exempt from licensing, while others were required to pay the full licence fee. The scheme was to cover not only old people's homes but sheltered housing schemes for pensioners because the residents in sheltered housing schemes for retired people were considered to be in a similar position to their contemporaries in old people's homes.

I suspect that I shall carry the hon. Gentleman with me when I say that that operation from 1969 has proved, over the course of time, a source of considerable difficulty—not just to the beneficiaries but primarily to those who are not beneficiaries. It has produced anomalies between pensioner and pensioner and extreme difficulty in both definition and application. I offer the hon. Gentleman at least the partial excuse that the complexity of the scheme has led to a number of anomalies of which the Piper system and its accessibility, tragically, has been one.

The scheme was introduced from the best of motives to correct what was seen as an anomaly. Perhaps underlying it was the assumption that residence in an old people's home or sheltered housing somehow equated to need. In fact, as I think the House would agree, those assumptions have proved questionable and the scheme has proved a source of very real difficulty since its inception. The number of people benefiting from the scheme now stands at nearly 600,000. The great majority of those beneficiaries live in sheltered housing schemes rather than in conventional residential homes.

The conditions of eligibility for the concessionary licence are laid down in the Wireless Telegraphy (Broadcast Licence Charges and Exemption) Regulations 1984. Although they were updated in that year, they have, broadly speaking, continued unchanged since 1969. The regulations form the statutory base and they are the means by which the National Television Licence Records Office has to interpret its authority in granting licences. Local authorities must abide by those regulations when determining whether a scheme is admissible. Sadly, the regulations are technical. Therefore, it is inevitable that there have been certain problems in interpretation, such as that raised by the hon. Member.

Under the regulations, entitlement to the concession depends on the kind of accommodation retired people live in, and not on their personal circumstances. For old people's sheltered housing schemes to qualify, they must fulfil two specific conditions. First, the accommodation must form part of a group of dwellings which is provided for retired persons of pensionable age either by a local authority under part V of the Housing Act 1957 or by a housing association. Secondly — I must stick to the wording of the regulations here—there must be provided in association with the old people's accommodation

"other accommodation or facilities intended for the common use of all the occupants of the dwellings".

That is a crucially determining feature about the arrangements that the hon. Gentleman has described in relation to the Piper system.

It is the term "communal facilities", which is not defined in the regulations, which has given rise to particular difficulty. It has been the practice since the concessionary scheme was introduced to accept, for example, an official warden as a facility for qualifying purposes. However, when some other form of facility is provided, we can only judge in individual cases whether it can fulfil the second condition of eligibility which I have just described, that is, a facility that is common to all occupants. The question which the hon. Member has raised is essentially whether an intercommunication system can be interpreted as a facility for qualifying purposes. That is what it amounts to.

In recent years some local authorities have begun to install intercommunication systems in old people's accommodation. This enables elderly residents to contact the council if they are in difficulties or if some emergency has arisen. Clearly these systems provide a useful service, and they provide reassurance to elderly people. Certainly we would not wish to discourage local authorities from installing systems of this kind. Two or three years ago some councils represented to the National Television Licence Records Office, which deals with the applications, that the intercommunication systems were provided as an equivalent service to a warden, and should therefore count as a qualification for the concessionary licence.

The criteria by which the NTVLRO judges applications for the concessionary licence are laid down by the Home Office and it is expected to seek guidance from the Home Office in any case where entitlement is in doubt. The problem raised by the hon. Gentleman arose—I am sure no malice at all was involved—because on that occasion the Home Office was not invited to comment on the interpretation of the application by the NTVLRO. That action was not taken when local authorities first began to inquire about the acceptability of intercommunication systems as a qualification for the concessionary licence. Subsequently, when the matter was referred to the Home Office and when the Home Office took legal advice as to the position under the regulations, we had to conclude that intercommunication systems could not confer entitlement to the concessionary licence. That remains the significant point in relation to the question that the hon. Gentleman asked at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. Ashdown: I apologise for interrupting the Minister, but this is the central issue. Although it is regrettable that there was a lack of consultation, the Minister has not yet explained why he cannot allow the Piper system to qualify. After all, it is communal in all senses; it is available to all and provides a warden service in a modern manner which the Government must be in favour of; it also helps the Government to make better use of resources. What is the reason why Piper could not be regarded as a communal service when, by the ordinary tenets of common sense, everyone would have thought that it would have been?

Mr. Shaw: Our reason for not accepting intercommunication systems as qualification for concessionary licences is essentially that they do not represent a facility of substance for elderly people living in accommodation specially provided for retirement pensioners. The concessionary licence is described in the regulations as the "Accommodation for Residential Care" licence. That is the full legal description.

An official warden system could and would confer entitlement to the concession so long as the warden made regular visits to the person or persons in his or her care and provided appropriate services according to need. In our view, that could genuinely be described as residential care —that is, caring for the residents.

[Mr. Shaw]

An intercommunication system, however, is not a human and caring service provided by an individual but a communication system that is essentially technical in nature and individual in its particular application. We do not accept that residential care can be provided simply by installing such a system. If we did, the hon. Gentleman could argue that a telephone installed to provide the assistance of communication is sufficient substitute for the care that a warden service can provide.

Mr. Ashdown: There is a substantial and qualitative difference. The Piper system provides access to a resource which is in all senses the same as the resource that a warden would supply. It provides communication to a bank of people able to deliver exactly the same services but in a more efficient manner. In that sense, it is not the same as a telephone. It is a communication system in much the same way as ringing the warden's bell or putting a light on outside the house, except that it is a modern system and operates on a much more effective basis.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman will agree that in residential accommodation there are usually certain communal facilities such as lounges where wardens may meet and the relationship between the wardens and the residents is one of regular human contact. He is describing a simple connection by technical means to someone who may have nothing to do with the home. The connection may be to a council office some distance away or to a bank of voluntary workers who are not even related to the same building.

The function of the licence is to license a location, a building. The hon. Gentleman and I have television licences relating to our addresses and our power to receive, not to our individual selves as we might have as keepers of a motor car. We are licensed to receive television signals in one, two or six rooms, but it is the power to receive that determines our liability to pay the licence fee.

I beg the hon. Gentleman to understand that there is a technical difference between acceptance of the communal services provided essentially in warden accommodation for residential care and an intercommunication system which may or may not relate to the individual dwelling in which the television is located and could reach a considerable distance away. My analogy with the telephone is thus not that far removed from the type of system that the hon. Gentleman has described, although I entirely accept that the benefit to the individual occupant may be much the same whether a warden is available along the passage or there is access to assistance through an intercommunication system reaching some distance away.

The hon. Gentleman has been extremely generous and I have gone into what I regard as the guts of the issue as he raised it — that is, the incompatibility between a technical intercommunication system and the requirements for a concessionary licence. If—it is a big "if"—the hon. Gentleman is with me so far, I will try to deal with the other points that he raised in relation to his case.

As I have said, in our view the initial interpretation by the licence records office of the position under the regulations was misplaced, as my predecessor informed the hon. Gentleman by letter on 18 June. In so far as action had to be taken, it was taken in two respects. The first was to accept firmly that no further licences could be issued under that definition. Secondly, as the concessions had been offered not just to the good citizens of Yeovil and east Somerset but to some 2,200 pensioners in 32 different local authority areas and covering 110 licences, the Home Office took the view, with which I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not disagree, that as those licences were issued in good faith they should continue for their full life.

It is now the case, as no doubt is the case in Yeovil too, that those licences are expiring, and have to be replaced. Therefore it is, in our view, the correct decision that the licence fee should now be paid at the current full rate, although, having accepted that in the initial information passed to it, the council and the individuals, the National Television Licence Records Office was taking a decision that it had come to without the benefit of Home Office approval under legal advice as should be required.

Therefore, I regret the significant inconvenience that has been caused by that clear definition of the policy. It is not a change in the policy; in fact it is the policy correctly applied, though the initial decision by the licensing office was in error.

I have tried to explain why the Piper system is not acceptable. The hon. Gentleman asked me how we can justify this train of events. The problem with which we are dealing is fundamentally the problem of the original 1969 regulations. The hon. Gentleman might reasonably say to me, "Look, we are in difficulty because we have licence fees of £58, a significant sum, so surely we are running into an absurdity to have problems of this character arising?" I must share the anxiety that the 1969 regulations no longer allow us to operate a simple scheme designed to bring reasonable reductions in costs for pensioners living in sheltered residential accommodation. The disparity between 5p and £58 is now very wide. The limit to which the concession can be tightly drawn has been shown to be very difficult. Some adjustments have been made for certain categories of disabled person and an adjustment has also been made to multiple use of television sets in hotels. However, I have to agree with the hon. Gentleman's underlying anxiety that the scheme is not as watertight as it should be if we are to provide a concession that is seen to be both equitable and fair. I agree that, although improvements have been made, much should be adjusted within the scheme.

Frankly, I am not contemplating more far-reaching concessions because, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the cost of concessions under the present rate of licence fee is now very great. In withdrawing licences from pensioners as it were, we are talking about forgoing licence revenue for the corporation worth well over £300 million in a single year. Neither I nor the Government could contemplate that now.

However, I see that we should try to refine the equity of the scheme. It is still a matter that the Government—I know that it is not just my own inclination — are seeking to improve if we can within reasonable limits. We have not ruled out the possibility of making further improvements in the existing concessionary scheme, but we do not see that the answer lies in providing much broader concessions. Frankly, not only would that be unacceptably expensive, and would in any event not resolve the sorts of problem to which the hon. Gentleman has rightly drawn our attention, but intercommunication systems alone cannot, in all equity, be regarded as a reason to confer an entitlement of a 5p licence on pensioners, unless they are living in accommodation that is fully wardened and residential, and where there is human care rather than technical communication.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Twelve o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 26 April 1985

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

The Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence, through illness, of MR. SPEAKER from this day's sitting.

Whereupon MR. HAROLD WALKER, THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS, proceeded to the Table and, after Prayers, took the Chair, as DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Orders of the Day

Motor Cycle Crash-Helmets (Restriction of Liability) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

AMENDMENT OF ROAD TRAFFIC ACT 1972

9.35 am

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 10, leave out from 'law' to end of line 14 and insert—

"no person who drives a motor cycle shall be guilty of an offence if carrying a passenger who is committing a contravention, if it can be shown that a suitable crash helmet was made available for the passenger to wear at the time.".

The amendment would make regulations affecting motor cycles much more comparable to those affecting motor car seats belts. The necessary safety equipment is made available in a car and a passenger can be regarded as criminally responsible if he does not use it. Such responsibility should not devolve to a motor cyclist. The amendment would be a considerable improvement of the law. One of its advantages is that it would leave out the vexed issue of what should be the age of responsibility —14, 16 or 21—as the age of the passenger does not arise.

The amendment obliges the owner of a motor cycle who is in the habit of giving a lift to carry with him a spare crash helmet. If a helmet is attached to the pillion seat, for example, the driver will have discharged his responsibilities. We shall then have provided as we have with motor cars, and it will be up to the passenger to make use of the safety equipment—in this case a crash helmet.

Most passengers who use the front seat of a motor car do up their seat belts. A driver's duty is discharged when the passenger's attention is drawn to the existence of the seat belt, irrespective of whether it is used. Car passengers often do not wear seat belts on medical grounds or because of claustrophobia, for example. However, the driver of a car does not break the law if he carries a passenger who is not wearing a seat belt if one is provided. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister and the House will accept the amendment.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I oppose the amendment, which purports to amend clause 1 so as to make relief from criminal liability dependent upon the availability at the time of a suitable crash helmet. However, as drafted, it would relieve the rider of liability for not using a crash helmet himself if a suitable one was available to his passenger. My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) seems to have drafted an extraordinary new escape to meet a mischief that is not even found in the original law. That suggests that my hon. Friend does not understand the purpose of the Bill.

The purpose of the Bill is to exempt the rider from prosecution as an aider and abetter if his passenger is not wearing a crash helmet, unless that passenger happens to be a child. It does not exempt the rider or passenger from prosecution if he is not wearing a crash helmet. The amendment would relieve the rider of liability for not wearing a crash helmet himself and is thus, in my respectful submission, misconceived and plain bad.

If my hon. Friend wants to exempt anyone from liability for not wearing a crash helmet or for the passenger not wearing one, where a suitable crash helmet has been provided—I understand that that is what he is saying—it would be better to amend the principal Act and to specify that the regulations allow for the availability of a suitable helmet in every case. But, with respect, it is neither appropriate nor logical to amend the Bill in this way, as it would defeat the whole purpose of the principal Act, which is to make it a criminal offence to ride a motor cycle when not wearing a crash helmet, whether or not a passenger is carried. If the amendment was accepted, it would make nonsense of the Act, and I therefore ask the House to reject it.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): Crash helmets are vital for both riders and pillion passengers, but they have to be the right crash helmets. I understand why my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) has tabled this amendment, but I also understand only too well why my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), whose Bill this is, has spoken against it. I do not wish to take up the time of the House with drafting objections to the amendment, but hon. Members should note in passing that, as drafted, the amendment says nothing about what is meant by a "suitable" helmet or about by whom the helmet is to be made available. Thus there are two gaps in the information supplied by it.

However, I shall leave those issues aside, as I do not want to be nit-picking. There are more fundamental objections to the amendment, which my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington has outlined. As he has said, the aim of the Bill is to restrict liability to the person actually committing the offence of not wearing a helmet while riding or driving a motor cycle. The amendment would thwart that aim completely by protecting the rider from aiding and abetting charges only where it could be shown that a helmet was available for the passenger to wear.

I am also concerned that the amendment seems to imply an obligation on the rider to provide a helmet for the passenger. That would be of very doubtful road safety value. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough tried to make an analogy with seat belts, the situation is entirely different. Seat belts are permanently fixed in a car. It is true that they are adjustable. Their length is adjustable, and sometimes the angle over the shoulder can be changed according to whether there is a special purpose-made clip.

[Mrs. Lynda Chalker]

However, crash helmets are not fixed. There are many different types of crash helmet, and, as my hon. Friends will know, we have sought to improve their standard so that only suitable ones are worn. The only adjustment that an occasional passenger could make to a helmet that had not been bought to fit his head would be to alter the chin strap or occasionally to make alterations inside. But that is not enough. It is perhaps a truism to say that heads vary in size, but I wager that at least five or six different sizes of crash helmet would be needed for those of us in the Chamber today. That means that there would always be a risk——

9.45 am

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Small helmets on this side and big ones on the other side.

Mrs. Chalker: I am not sure about that. I think that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington might go for small helmets—[Interruption.] However, I shall not be tempted down a path which has nothing to do with the Bill.

A crash helmet that is provided by someone else for the occasional use of any passenger could be very dangerous. If it was too loose it might slip on impact, and if it was too tight it might make problems for the wearer's head. An ill-fitting helmet gives the wearer very little protection, and the rider could scarcely be expected to provide his passenger with a helmet that fitted exactly. Often it is neither practical nor safe for motor-cyclists to travel with a selection of spare helmets.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Perhaps the Minister will emphasise that the change in the design of crash helmets has made an enormous difference to head injuries, and that most accident departments are not having to deal with so many frightening head injuries. An increasing number of deaths occur as a result of necks being broken, but that is a different problem. It is important to stress that as helmets are now much better designed, lives are being saved.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. The change in helmet design over the past 10 years is a tribute to the manufacturers and to all those who have worked on the problem. Nowadays, helmets are significantly better. However, anyone who uses a very old helmet may be running a severe risk, because those improvements have now been made. We now know that better protection is afforded by helmets that have been approved, although not by those that have the awful stickers on them which can sometimes make the helmets weaker than they were on manufacture.

Quite apart from the fact that the helmet may not fit, it would be wrong to expect the rider of a motor cycle to have to carry a selection of spare helmets of various sizes. That is why I cannot commend the amendment to the House. Although I have tried to explain what a suitable helmet is, as there is no clear definition of that in the amendment and no clear drafting of by whom the helmet has to be made available, it does not make sense—despite the good intentions of my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough—to include it in a fairly straightforward and sensible Bill.

I therefore ask the House not to accept the amendment, because I think that it would nullify much of what my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington is seeking to do.

Sir John Farr: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) and my hon. Friend the Minister for their carefully reasoned arguments against my amendment. Of course, their arguments are convincing, especially the important point made by my hon. Friend the Minister about the condition of crash helmets. My hon. Friend said that not every helmet would fit every passenger. However, there are hon. Members who could not get into a standard seat belt because of their physical proportions. Therefore, that is not a parallel that she can pursue with great success.

More important was my hon. Friend's point about the condition of crash helmets. I enabled a couple of amendments relating to that point and also one on the vital need to wear a chin strap. The latter was prompted by a fatal accident in Loughborough only last week. A girl pillion rider was wearing a crash helmet but the strap was not fastened. When there was an accident she was thrown off the motor cycle, the helmet came off and she was killed.

Although I appreciate that the Bill is not necessarily the vehicle to use, I hope that the important points that have been raised will not escape the attention of the Minister when an appropriate vehicle occurs, perhaps in a road traffic Bill.

In view of that, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir John Farr: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 14, leave out

'a child under the age of fourteen years'

and insert

'under the age of 21 years'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this we may discuss the following amendments:

No. 3, in page 1, line 14, leave out 'child' and insert 'person'.

No. 4, in page 1, line 15, leave out 'fourteen' and insert 'sixteen'.

Sir John Farr: The three amendments relate to the age of the passenger. Amendment No. 2 would raise the age from 14 to 21. Amendment No. 3 is consequential on amendment No. 2, because a person of 21 is no longer a child. Amendment No. 4 would raise the age from 14 to 16.

If amendment No. 1 had been accepted, these amendments would have fallen. I wish to concentrate mainly on amendment No. 2. I do not believe that it is proper to provide only for "a child under the age of fourteen years".

I should like "fourteen" to be replaced by "21". I understand that prior to the Committee proceedings last month the Royal Automobile Club suggested a similar amendment, but specified the age as 16 rather than 21, and that that suggestion was raised indirectly with my hon. Friend's Department.

As my hon. Friend said in her forthright speech in Committee, it would be wrong to change the age of criminal liability for this offence. She explained that the cut-off age of 14 had been chosen because it was the legal age of criminal liability, below which the driver of the motor cycle was responsible for the pillion passenger if he allowed that passenger to ride without a helmet.

That misses the point. The criminal liability of a pillion passenger is not in question. It is the criminal liability of the driver as the aider and abetter that we wish to alter. I am trying to establish not whether the pillion passenger is criminally liable, but whether he or she should be regarded as responsible for his or her actions. The driver of the motor cycle can justifiably be assumed to be responsible.

The age of 21 is still widely regarded as coinciding with adulthood, but I choose that age mainly because it will cover the most vulnerable age groups, as shown in the accident statistics. I shall give the House details of accident statistics later, and at this point I shall refer only briefly to the road accident statistics for Great Britain for 1983, which are the latest available figures. In that year, 75 pillion passengers were killed, more than 1,000 were seriously injured and more than 3,000 reported injuries of varying severity. The majority of those accident victims were in the age groups up to 19, with the highest number in the group 16 to 19.

If I favour one of the three amendments, it is amendment No. 2, which raises the age to 21. I hope that it will find favour with my hon. Friend the Minister and with my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook).

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): I support the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir. J. Farr) and wish to go one stage further in looking at the reason why we both feel that the age of 14 is inadequate to protect pillion passengers.

We are concerned not with the criminal liability of the pillion passenger, but with whether the rider of the motor cycle should have some responsibility towards that passenger if he or she is aged 14 or over. The most susceptible age for young people to be taken for a ride on a motor cycle for the sheer thrill of it—without duly considering the consequences—is 14 to 19. It is not right to suggest that the rider of a motor cycle should not have responsibility for ensuring that his passenger is properly equipped.

I do not see any logical reason for distinguishing between 13 and 14 years of age. Why should the responsibility for ensuring the safety of a passenger be removed at the age of 14? With the greatest respect to my hon. Friend the Minister, I do not believe that because the pillion passenger has criminal responsibility at the age of 14, which he did not have at the age of 13, it is adequate reason for taking away from the driver the responsibility that he would have for a younger passenger.

I would not necessarily wish to pin my entire case on 21 being the right age. It is possible that 18 is more sensible. Indeed, I should even be happy with the age of 16, which would be an improvement on the present drafting. Fourteen and 15-year-olds suffer from a lesser degree of self-restraint and self-discipline than a 16-year old.

I am extremely unhappy with the legislation as drafted, for the simple reason that it offers inadequate protection to passengers in the age group mentioned.

10 am

Mrs. Dunwoody: I have some sympathy with the thought behind the amendment. While I suspect that the Minister will say that its drafting is defective, she will appreciate that behind it is the fact that motor cycles appeal greatly to youngsters.

I make no excuse for the fact that I went to extraordinary lengths to prevent my three children from riding motor cycles when they reached the age at which they could use them. I succeeded in doing so by a combination of political skills which have stood me in reasonable stead for most of my life.

In discussing the amendment, we are really talking about the danger that results from riding motor cycles. Certainly the age of 21, as proposed in the amendment, is unacceptable; it would have to be younger than that. It is nonsense to say that a person is an adult at 18 but that pillion riders up to the age of 21 should be protected.

The accident statistics are interesting. More youngsters are dying from fractures of the spine than from injuries to the head. Having spent many months being associated with a neurosurgical unit in Scotland, when my father had a stroke, I feel strongly about the need to do all we can to reduce the number of motor cycle accidents.

We should consider how to encourage people to find another form of transport. When one is hard up but must get about, a motor cycle seems not only pleasant but necessary. The amendment would not achieve what its proposers intend, and it might even distract from the real task of persuading people that motor cycles are lethal weapons and should be treated as such.

Mr. Stanbrook: While I oppose amendment No. 2, I should be prepared to support amendment No. 4 if that were put separately. That would retain the liability for prosecution of the rider as an aider and abetter in respect of a passenger not wearing a helmet, that passenger being a child under 16.

I have always regarded that to be a fair point, one which I would have accepted prior to the Standing Committee stage had I been approached in that sense, but I was not, and therefore I left the Bill as drafted. Sixteen is the age at which, at common law, parental rights over children come to an end, and 16 would, therefore, be a more appropriate age in this respect.

It would be wrong if a stranger was responsible for a child of a greater age than the age at which a parent has responsibility. It would be contrary to common sense, therefore, if the age were set at over 16. Thus I reject amendment No. 2, for not only would it be inappropriate, but when the age of majority is 18, it would be absurd to speak of legal responsibility for anyone over the age of majority right up to 21. Indeed, to do so would be offensive to the lobby that suggests that at 18 all persons are capable of taking their own decisions in life, and bearing responsibility for the decisions that they take and should be liable for their own mistakes and folly.

A child, for the purposes of the criminal law, takes us to the age of 14. A young person goes up to 17. Sixteen is, therefore, about right when we are talking of vicarious responsibility for that child on the part of a person who is a stranger in law and happens to be the rider of the motor cycle. A motor cycle rider should have responsibility not only for his wearing of a crash helmet but for his passenger also doing so, if that passenger is a child, and I suggest that 16 would be the correct age for that purpose.

Mrs. Chalker: I appreciate the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook). As I explained in Committee, the age of 14 was originally chosen because it was consistent with the provisions of the seat belt law and because it was in line with the legal age of criminal responsibility.

Hon. Members have pointed out that it is in the age group 16 to 19 that we have the awful peak—it is a truly awful peak — of motor cycle accidents. They happen for a wide variety of reasons. They sometimes happen because of the daredevil nature of those in that age group. Sometimes they happen when they could be avoided, and that is the saddest thing of all.

Part of that avoidance relates to the proper wearing of helmets, the proper maintenance of bikes and the proper actions of motor cyclists and all other road users. Whatever the age cut-off point, until we achieve a better level of behaviour on the roads on the part of all road users —pedestrians, cyclists, motor cyclists, and car and lorry drivers—we shall not achieve a decrease in the number of motor cycle accidents.

Because the accidents peak between the ages of 16 and 19, amendment No. 2—which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) said, would give a cut-off point at the age of 21 — would not be appropriate. As hon. Members have said, 14 is the legal age of criminal liability; 16 is the age at which one may start to ride a moped; 17 is the age at which one may start to ride a motor cycle; and 18 is when one may vote. Therefore, to put it as high as 21, three years after the age at which voting is permitted, would go against the excellent intentions of my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington in the Bill. It would deny the benefits of the Bill to those riders who feel most strongly about the aiding and abetting issue, which is the kernel of the Bill. For that reason I could not accept the amendment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) said that there was not much difference whether a child was 13 or 14. I am not a parent, but I have two nieces who are dear to me and I should have been horrified at their using motor cycles, however well protected they may have been, at such young ages. I may have adopted a similar attitude to their riding motor cycles as that adopted by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) to her children riding motor cycles.

Judgment comes with age. At least, that is what I am frequently advised. These young and intense years for young people often lead them to be tempted into doing things which, with a little more sense, they would not do at a somewhat older age.

That is why I now refer to amendments Nos. 3 and 4 and to amendment No. 4 with some welcome. Amendment No. 3 simply seeks to raise the age from 14. Therefore, it is very much within amendment No. 2. It is not quite right. As my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough does not propose to move it formally, I shall concentrate on amendments Nos. 2 and 4.

Amendment No. 4 interests me greatly. I have had brief discussions with the Royal Automobile Club, which would like a change from the age of 14. I mentioned that we chose the age of 14 because we were seeking to be consistent with other legislation and also the legal age of criminal liability. However, it seems to me that 16 being the age at which one can be responsible enough to learn to ride and take a test for a moped, that is the age when we should most sensibly have a change in the legal age of criminal liability in this case. Therefore, if the House shares my view that 16 is a more appropriate age, it would not be reasonable for me to offer any further objections to amendment No. 4.

However, in the House it behoves us always to remember that at whatever age the responsibility is, it must be enforceable. There is a great problem with that, the point being that under the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) the police would stop any biker anyway who had a pillion passenger who was not wearing a helmet. The question of the chin strap is difficult, and some have said that we should make a provision referring to people not properly wearing the helmet. That would be difficult to enforce.

Nevertheless, I believe that we could change to the age of 16 without losing any of the intention in my hon. Friend's Bill. Therefore, I hope that that outcome satisfies those who were not happy with 14, those who would not be happy with 21, and those who feel that there should be some movement in the legal age of criminal liability for not wearing a crash helmet when sitting on the pillion seat of a motor cycle or moped.

Sir John Farr: Once again, I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister of State for her convincing arguments.

I should like to correct the record that I placed before the House. The figure for those killed and seriously injured that I gave to the House a moment ago referred only to males. If the total of females is added, instead of the figure of 75 motor cycle pillion passengers killed in 1983, the total becomes 119. Instead of over 1,000 pillion passengers on motor cycles seriously injured in 1983, the figure becomes 1,984. The total for all severe injuries in 1983 of all motor cycle pillion passengers is not the figure that I gave, which was for males only, but 6,473.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State is acutely aware of the problem. The House must keep those statistics constantly before it. I have every confidence in her and her Department monitoring them as closely as possible so that as soon as a change in the age from 16 in an upward direction is justified, she will not hesitate to introduce the relevant legislation to the House. I hope that my hon. Friend will keep an open mind, bearing in mind those horrifying statistics. After what she has said, I have pleasure to beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 4, in page 1, line 15, leave out 'fourteen' and insert 'sixteen'.—[Sir J. Farr.]

10.15 am

Mr. Stanbrook: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister of State for her kindness and co-operation in assisting me with the passage of the Bill to this stage. It removes some of the burden of criminal liability from a small, usually young and not well-off section of our population. For that reason, I believe that it is a good Bill, and I am happy to commend it to the House.

Sir John Farr: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) on getting as far as he has done with his important Bill on motor cycle crash helmets.

We have had a useful discussion on the various amendments that were selected. I am delighted that the Bill has made progress. It is now in a slightly improved form. It could have been improved still further, but unfortunately that was not possible. I wish the Bill a speedy passage to the statute book.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: In joining my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) in welcoming the Bill, I should like to say that the underlying reason for it is extremely good and perhaps can be usefully applied in other spheres of the criminal law.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) and I practised together at the criminal Bar for about nine years, and we are both keenly conscious of the unfortunate effects that are often felt by young people who find themselves against the law, mostly without having had the slighest intention of being so and without having any real criminal intent. The Bill will lighten the burden on those who often come from deprived backgrounds or poor families, as my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington said, and get much of their enjoyment from riding their motor cycles, sometimes to the annoyance of other road users, but that is the nature of youth. When I was that age, I briefly had a motor cycle. It was only because I had a motor cycle briefly that I managed to persuade my father to buy me a car. My parents were anxious to get me off two wheels and into the slightly safer environment of four.

Therefore, the reasoning for the Bill is excellent. The improvement made today by raising the age from 14 to 16 will make a significant contribution in ensuring that we do not go too far in removing responsibility from those who have pillion passengers. I warmly welcome the Bill.

10.18 am

Mrs. Chalker: We have made it clear at all stages that this measure has the Government's fullest support. My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) has been right to say, as have others, that it is often young people and perhaps some less well-off people—but by no means all of them—who ride motor cycles. Motor cycling has an excitement and verve for those who become addicted to it. It is even greater than for those of us who have the four sides of a car safely around us. It has a thrill and special impact on its enthusiasts, whatever age they may be, especially young motor cyclists.

We are firmly and fully committed to the helmet law as an indispensable aid to road safety. As the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) has said, the reduction in head injuries, which are those most likely to be fatal, has been dramatic since the law was improved in this respect. Nevertheless, awful injuries still occur, so if we can continue to safeguard at least one part of the body we shall be doing a better job in allowing people to go on enjoying their motor cycles, which is the object of the exercise.

The Transport and Road Research Laboratory continues to undertake research on this and other aspects of road safety and to seek further ways to make motor cycling safer so that other vulnerable parts of the body can also be properly protected. Nevertheless, we should not forget that two-wheeled motor vehicle casualties still include about 1,000 killed and 20,000 seriously injured every year, more than half of them still in their teens. Clearly, we cannot afford to do anything that might increase the risk to motor cyclists.

Helmets are one of the few forms of protection that have really minimised the vulnerability of motor cyclists and their pillion passengers, and I have no doubt that the vast majority of riders wear helmets as a matter of common sense. Inevitably, however, there are just a few who in the absence of legal compulsion or the sight of a bobby on the beat may forget how vulnerable they are and perhaps be tempted to ride with unprotected heads. That is what we seek to avoid and that is why successive Governments have taken the view that helmet wearing must be required by law. This Government in no way depart from that view or intend to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington has argued that it is both unnecessary and undesirable, however, that the helmet law should include the facility to bring charges of aiding and abetting against a rider whose pillion passenger fails to wear a helmet, save in cases where the offender is a child, and the Bill now takes that into account. Indeed, the Bill is now more generous in that respect than it was when it left the Standing Committee.

I believe that people who ride motor cycles either as drivers or as pillion passengers without wearing helmets are plain crazy. At 16, they are old enough to know that that is asking for very bad trouble. That is why I believe that motor cyclists should seek to make their pillion passengers more responsible by putting the onus on them. That will be one of the consequences of the Bill, assuming that their Lordships support it as strongly as Members of this House support it. The position of drivers in relation to seat belt law is very similar and it has long been a sore point among members of the motor cycling fraternity that they have been treated differently from car drivers. We are now content that motor cyclists should not be in a different position in terms of the law on safety helmets. The Bill removes an unreasonable and anomalous feature of the law which would have continued to cause annoyance to many perfectly responsible motor cyclists.

It has been necessary to look afresh at the law on the responsibility of the individual, and I was interested to hear the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) on other adjustments in this respect. I must not, however, be tempted to stray outside my area of responsibility and away from the subject of motor cycling and crash helmets.

I give a clear assurance that the Bill will in no way impede the effective enforcement of the Bill on helmet law. That is most important. I hope that the House will therefore give the amended Bill a Third Reading today. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington on piloting the Bill through the House and I congratulate all Members who have contributed on the part that they have played in ensuring that we have ended up with a sensible measure, however small, which improves the law of this country. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 5

FURTHER DUTIES OF AGRICULTURE MINISTERS WITH RESPECT TO THE COUNTRYSIDE

'After section 41 of the Principal Act, there shall be inserted the following section—

"Further duties of agriculture Ministers with respect to the environment

41A. (1) In regard to those functions of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which may affect the physical environment, the Minister shall, so far as may be consistent with the proper discharge of such functions, endeavour to secure a reasonable balance between (a) the promotion and maintenance of a stable and efficient agricultural industry and (b) the conservation and enhancement of the natural beauty and amenity of the countryside, the protection of wildlife habitat, and the conservation of flora and fauna and geological, or physiographical features of interest.

(2) Without prejudice to its generality, the duty under the previous subsection shall apply in particular to—

(a) the making of a scheme under section 29 of the Agriculture Act 1970 (farm capital grants) and the exercise of the Minister's functions thereunder.

(b) the provision of advice under section 1(1)10 of the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1944 to persons carrying on agricultural business.

(c) the implementation of any Community obligation in relation to the common agricultural policy of the European Economic Community in so far as may be consistent with any such obligation.

(3) In the application of this section to Scotland, references to the Minister shall, where appropriate, be construed as references to the Secretary of State."'.—[Dr. David Clark.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

10.26 am

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 15, in Title, line 1, leave out 'sections 28 and 43' and insert 'Part II'.

Dr. Clark: I am pleased to give the House another opportunity to discuss a vital issue—the protection of our very beautiful and precious countryside. A similar clause was included in the Bill when it received its Second Reading, but the Standing Committee felt it right to remove that clause. I expressed the view that that was an error and regretted the removal of the clause.

Since then, we have had discussions with a view to producing a clause which would achieve the same object, but without the disadvantages which some people claimed were inherent in the earlier clause. As there was some misapprehension about the earlier clause, and as some of the comment on the radio did not match the reality of the situation, it is important that I should state categorically that the new clause has the wholehearted support of the National Farmers Union. Not only have I seen the NFU press release, but I have been in telephone contact to ensure that there is no confusion.

The new clause is supported not only by people working in agriculture but by the other major organisation in this country—the Country Landowners Association, which this morning issued a statement endorsing the new clause. I am happy to bring forward a clause on which there is such unity and consensus and I hope that the House will approve it. Many hon. Members have told me that they support it, and I hope that we shall be able to persuade the Government of the error of their ways at an earlier stage.

I felt that I should bring back a clause of this kind because of the strength of feeling throughout the country, from Lands End to John o' Groats, about the changing countryside of Britain. That concern is felt just as strongly in the towns as in the countryside. Strangely enough, the British people care passionately about their landscape and about the flora and fauna thereon. Members of Parliament have probably received more mail on this subject than on any other issue in this Parliament. That confirms the strength of feeling on this issue throughout the country.

Our constituents find the changes that have occurred in agricultural practice very disturbing. The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, when he appeared before the Select Committee on the Environment looking into the operation and effectiveness of part II of the Wildlife and Countryside Act, coined the phrase "the engine of destruction". There is no doubt that Ministers appreciate that there are problems, and it is time that we addressed ourselves to these problems and tried to grapple with them. That is why I am introducing the new clause.

I shall highlight some of the key factors that have affected the countryside over the past decade. We have lost 150,000 miles of hedgerows—a quarter of the total of hedgerows in Britain. All of us know that it is not only the visual amenity that has been lost, but the necessary habitat for animals, birds and flowers. The loss of hedgerows has gone too far, and I know that steps have been taken to rectify the situation. However, I recently visited Norfolk, to which I had not been for a while, and I was horrified at the change in the landscape. I had seen the removal of hedgerows from Lincolnshire and other parts of East Anglia, and the landscape is barren there. It is not pleasant to look at, and it does not appear to be part of the British scenery. I saw the same phenomenon in Norfolk, where the banks on which the hedgerows had been planted remain, but are denuded of growth. It is unpleasant to everyone, and we must take some action.

We have lost 50 per cent. of our ancient and semi-natural woodlands. I welcome the moves by the Forestry Commission to rectify that by increased grants for broadleaf planting. We have lost 95 per cent. of our flower-rich meadows and 30 per cent. of our wild and open moors. There is consensus across the Floor of the House that enough is enough and that we have to start working out a way to tackle the problems.

The Labour party recognises the need for a sound and efficient agricultural system. We have this problem today because of the success of the British farming industry. It has done what it was asked to do by Governments of both parties and has produced food. The basis of our agricultural production is the Agriculture Act 1947. It is odd for us to think back and realise that there was a shortage of food then. Quite rightly, it was decided that we should maximise food production. Thanks to modern technology and the EEC, in certain sectors we are over-producing our food. It does not make sense for us to continue to do so, and especially not if we do so at the cost of destroying our environment.

The time has rightly come when we must add another dimension, equal with food production, to our Agriculture

Act, and that is the preservation of our natural environment. With the agreement of the NFU and the CLA, I have introduced a tentative step in this direction by tabling the new clause.

I welcome discussion on this matter, as I think all hon. Members do. I know that the Government are worried about the new clause. They have come up with all sorts of reasons why it should not be passed. I realise that all Government Departments, including the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, must have regard to conservation under section 11 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act, but we must be a little bit more positive than that. Therefore, when we were drawing up the new clause, we went back to the Government's wording in a similar measure on the Forestry Commission. We have adapted that wording to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. We felt that if the Government found the Forestry Commission section acceptable, they would presumably find a similar clause applying to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food acceptable as well.

The Government sometimes argue that a measure such as this is unnecessary, but I hope I have shown that, with the best will in the world, and with all the moves in Brussels and the efforts on areas such as the Halvergate marshes, there is still a need for Parliament — it is Parliament which determines the broad direction of national policy — to say that we want to go a little further. We want a national guideline and a national signpost, and a national signal going from the House to the Ministry. We realise that it has been constrained in the past, but now we are asking it to have regard specifically to further conservation. I hope that the Government will accept that.

The Government may say that the new clause is unconstitutional, but that is not so. We have sovereignty of Parliament in this country, and it is Parliament, not Ministers, that makes the law. There are precedents for the new clause. For example, section 54(1) of the Transport Act 1968 directs the Secretary of State for Transport, in considering rail closures, to "have regard to any matters which . . .appear to him to be relevant, including any social or economic consideration".

We are similarly directing the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in this new clause.

The Education Act 1944 was an all-party Act passed by the coalition Government. Section 76 places a duty on the Secretary of State for Education, in providing education to do so

"so far as is compatible wth the provision of efficient instruction and training and the avoidance of unreasonable public expenditure."

It is saying there that education must operate under financial constraint. It is laid down in the Act that the Secretary of State for Education must have regard to public expenditure. I can give other examples, but those are two which clearly show Parliament telling a Department to carry on doing its job and meeting its prime responsibility, such as producing food, but at the same time having regard to something else, such as the wider environment.

I hope that what I have said has not been too controversial, and that the House will find the new clause acceptable. I know that there is good will on both sides of the House for this measure, and I hope that we can persuade the Government to accept the new clause.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I am glad to have the opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), not least because I felt constrained not to take part in the Second Reading debate. I was asked to stand by to chair all the Bills in Standing Committee C, and the hon. Member and I expected that his Bill would appear before that Committee. He was skilful in getting his Bill into Committee ahead of the line, and into standing Committee E.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): He was not the only one.

Mr. Cormack: As my hon. Friend says, the hon. Member for South Shields was not the only hon. Member so skilled.

Now, I do not have to maintain a stance of neutrality, and I am glad to have the opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member not only on his initiative in deciding upon this important subject but on his sensitive persistence. It would have been easy for him, having had an understandable disappointment in Committee, to be aggrieved and obdurate. Instead, realising that what he is dealing with is a matter of great moment, he has been skilful and persistent in his negotiations and has now produced a clause that I hope will meet with widespread and general acceptance. It is no mean feat to produce something that has the backing of both the Country Landowners Association and the National Farmers Union. It is the hon. Gentleman's implicit recognition of the fact that farmers have created the British countryside as we know it and as we love and wish to preserve it that has enabled him to reach a conclusion that is acceptable to these two very important and rightfully powerful lobbying bodies.

One statistic above all illustrates the need for the measure that we are debating: the 150,000 miles of hedgerows to which the hon. Gentleman referred as having been lost in the past decade. As hon. Members know, I have always taken an interest in heritage and conservation matters and I should not like it to be thought that my interest is confined to the "built" environment. — [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) interjects with a most unfair accusation. Most certainly it is not. The fact is that this problem has become worse and worse over the past decade.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I know of my hon. Friend's interest in arboricultural matters. He has requoted the devastating statistic of the uprooting of 150,000 miles of our hedgerows which, as he knows, are the seed bed of much of our rural tree stock. Does he know of another statistic: that it is fairly accurately estimated that during the last 30 years over one third of our ancient woodlands have been felled?

Mr. Cormack: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. He has done a great deal, perhaps more than any other hon. Member, to draw attention to the dangers facing our woodlands. I have done some research into this matter and nine years ago, produced a book entitled, "Heritage in Danger", which dealt with this subject as well as with the threat to our country houses, churches and cathedrals. At that stage it was alarming to have to rehearse the statistics relating to both our broadleaved woodlands and to our hedgerows. The danger is now very much worse. That is why it is necessary for Parliament to take action and for a united message to be sent out from this House.

[Mr. Cormack]

Not the least of the contributions of the hon. Member for South Shields to our deliberations has been the way in which he has been able to maintain all-party consensus on this issue. Such consensus is absolutely necessary upon matters affecting the arts, the heritage and the preservation of our countryside.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough) indicated assent.

Mr. Cormack: I am very glad that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) is nodding agreement. Although we differ profoundly on many political issues, we are at one in our regard for these matters. It is important that all-party consensus and all-party determination should be maintained in Parliament.

I commend most warmly the new clause. I hope that my hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will be able to accept it with good grace and, indeed, enthusiasm. It reintroduces the teeth that were extracted from the Bill in Committee. The Bill would otherwise have gone forward as a toothless wonder.

Mr. Crouch: I was unable to observe, because of the position that my hon. Friend is occupying, whether our hon. Friends on the Treasury Front Bench nodded at that point. It would help me greatly in my future activities in this debate to know whether they did nod.

Mr. Cormack: I must apologise to my hon. Friend for being more visible than other hon. Members and therefore blocking his view. However, I can tell him that both of our hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench are looking, as they always do, good-humoured, benevolent and interested. I am sure that their enthusiasm is mounting. I am not sure whether they are nodding at the moment, but I am sure that they will in a few moments. It is very important that this new clause should be accepted. As I say, it puts back into the Bill the necessary teeth. It would be very much of a toothless wonder if it went forward without the new clause. The hon. Member for South Shields—I nearly called him my hon. Friend, and in this context I regard him as a friend in every possible sense—has performed a great service and I wish him well. I urge my hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench to accept the new clause.

10.45 am

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): It might be of assistance if I intervened at this stage. Not having been able to catch your eye immediately, Mr. Deputy Speaker, has caused difficulty for my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack). I have to correct what he said. This new clause does not represent the teeth of the Bill. The teeth of the Bill are the elimination of the loopholes in the sites of special scientific interest.

Dr. David Clark: No.

Mrs. Fenner: I am sorry; it is the hon. Member's new clause and I must not argue with him about it.

Mr. Cormack: There are at least two sets of teeth. This set is a least as important as the other set.

Mrs. Fenner: I must accept my hon. Friend's view, just as I must accept the description of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) of his own clause. I listened with great interest to his introduction. It is a much more sensible measure than clause 4 of the original Bill, which would have caused very severe practical difficulties. I see that the hon. Gentleman is nodding his head and that he is aware of that fact. He has endeavoured generally to follow the wording that was tabled in Committee relating to the Forestry Commission.

Nevertheless, I have to ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the new clause. In the first place, it is defective in a number of respects. It would place a duty upon my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to endeavour to secure a balance——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Fenner: No, I should like to finish my explanation.

It would place a duty on my right hon. Friend to endeavour to secure a balance between agriculture and conservation in regard to all of his functions which may affect the physical environment. However, some of those functions, such as those dealing with fisheries and forestry, have nothing whatever to do with agriculture. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, to whom this clause would also apply, has an even wider range of responsibilities which affect the physical environment but which do not concern agriculture. Therefore I have to point out the defective nature of its description.

However, it is not only for technical reasons that I must oppose the new clause. The object of the clause, as was made clear in Committee, is based upon the assertion that agriculture Ministers are not sufficiently responsive to the needs of conservation. However, as all the evidence shows, that view of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is quite wrong. The hon. Member for South Shields has tried to undermine that evidence, but the most recent is the very successful attempt of my right hon. Friend in Brussels to make European Community agricultural legislation more sensitive to the environment. As we participate in the common agricultural policy, I am sure that my hon. Friends recognise that this is a very important new initiative.

My right hon. Friend has already begun consultations with the Department of the Environment and the statutory conservation agencies about how the special agricultural measures to be applied in environmentally sensitive areas should be implemented. An experimental scheme for the Broads has recently been announced. This is aimed at safeguarding the Halvergate marshes and their environs and is a joint initiative of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Countryside Commission.

I could quote many other examples of the commitment to securing a proper balance between agriculture and conservation which have been demonstrated by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The new clause would not create that commitment. It is already there. The new clause is therefore unnecessary and is also anomalous in singling out one Ministry from all the others, many of which doubtless have less commendable records than the Ministry of Agriculture, for special treatment in this way. Basically, it is defective and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel able to withdraw it.

Mr. Flannery: The question of nodding in the House is assuming titanic proportions. It was singularly absent when the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) was speaking. There were no nods from the Treasury Bench, and it has now emerged why. It is sad that a request has been made to withdraw a necessary clause, on which I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) for persistently working towards.

Like the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South I am a conservationist. I am a city man, but I spend my leisure moments in the countryside as a member of the Ramblers Association. I work jealously to preserve what there is in the countryside.

The new clause has wider connections with what is happening and what has happened. I worry, and I hope that all hon. Members worry, about the rain forests of the world. I wonder how many realise how the whole of our planet is being steadily denuded and how deserts are being created where at one time cities existed, many of them now under sand.

We are surely more aware than our ancestors were of the terrible problems that we are facing, not only on the planet as a whole, but in our countryside. The denuding of various aspects of the countryside in the past few years is the biggest event since the enclosures. The destruction of woodlands and trees is possibly the greatest destruction since the Norman Conquest. Somebody must cry halt, and I was hoping that the Government, after watching what has happened, would help us cry halt and lend their immense strength to the cause which my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields has so persistently and consistently pursued.

I went through east Yorkshire recently, where I was stationed during the war, and I was horrified at what I saw. Areas which I had not visited for many years had literally become prairies. Last time I spoke I said that the "prairie-isation" of the British countryside was going on apace. Somebody must stand up and point out regularly, with intensity and conviction, that if it goes on much longer we shall not merely be altering the habitat of many creatures, but that we shall, in the long run, create dust bowls and similar conditions which in time will not be conducive to good agriculture.

Much money has been made from the drive for food, but now we have a surplus. I regret the cash nexus that has developed on a grand scale and made many millionaires out of many farmers. They are not, I hasten to say after my surgery last Saturday, in my constituency, where I have poverty-stricken milk farmers coming to me about milk quotas.

As I went through east Yorkshire I was positively alarmed. The noise of the chain saw has hardly been out of the ears of ramblers in south Yorkshire and Derbyshire —areas which I know and love so well. What my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields said about Norfolk is profoundly true, but if one takes the train from King's Cross to Edinburgh one sees vast areas not only in southern England but in Scotland where the drive for food and wealth has had its impact.

I should have thought that my hon. Friend's new clause would be acceptable to all of us. Cross-party consensus has been mentioned and, when protecting our countryside, which is so dear to us, I hope that we can all join hands. I am sad that the new clause is being opposed by the Government Front Bench.

When one thinks of the number of hedgerows which have disappeared which were once so familiar, and the wildlife whose main roads those hedgerows are, the copses and woodlands, the walls and so on, one realises that the situation is appalling and that one must cry halt somewhere.

I beg Conservative Members to join hands with us and my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields to defend the countryside by passing the new clause.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I have great sympathy with the new clause. It is fair to accept that everyone on both sides of the House wishes to seek a better balance between conservation and agriculture. There is certainly a great need for that in our countryside. The destruction of habitat and valued aspects of our landscape has been described on many occasions. Therefore, we all accept the need for action.

In addition, there is a huge feeling around the countryside in support of conservation and further measures to protect our natural heritage. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) was right when he said that that feeling exists not only in the countryside but perhaps even more strongly in urban communities. There has been a huge expansion in interest in wildlife and conservation on television and in the membership of groups such as the Royal Society for Nature Conservation, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the National Trust, which shows how close the subject is to the hearts of people in Britain.

Therefore, I understand why the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) has brought forward the new clause. However, I must return, as I did in Committee, to the principle that on a private Member's Bill one must often adopt different tactics. One must be specific and exact and avoid controversy. We must be clear about our objectives. If one tries to make grand gestures in a private Member's Bill, it may become controversial and fail. Therefore, if the House wishes to be effective and practical on private Members' Bills, it has a duty to impose a self-denying ordinance on itself.

Like my right hon. Friend the Minister, I believe that the most important aspect of the Bill is the closure of the two loopholes in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. The countryside and habitat are protected by a series of practical measures and, in my heart, I do not see how a vague duty placed on the Minister will make more likely the saving of habitat or the protection of various species. I understand that it will in many ways help the general climate, but the way to make progress in this Bill is by closing two loopholes which will save habitat and protect species.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The Government had the opportunity to close those loopholes 12 months ago when my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) introduced a Bill, but refused to do so. That could have gone through the House quickly, but the Government ignored that opportunity. This Bill was intended to go considerably further, and it is sad that on occasions such as this the farmers on the Conservative Benches are again trying to stop us making major progress in defending the countryside.

Mr. Carlisle: That was an unnecessary and extravagant intervention, introducing the type of emotion and grand gesture that must be avoided in a private Member's Bill if practical advance is to be ensured.

Without any doubt, the loopholes in the Wildlife and Countryside Act have led to the destruction of habitat and to the ploughing up and drainage of sites of special scientific interest and other special sites. We know that; the evidence is catalogued. By closing those loopholes the Bill will protect habitat and take a firm step towards the protection and conservation of the countryside for future generations. I do not want that progress to be put at risk by opening up the Bill to all sorts of objections. That is why I reiterate that it is important for a private Member's Bill to be concise and practical.

At the same time, it is fair to accept that there has been a change of attitude in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. In the past 18 months it has changed substantially its attitude to farming and conservation. I welcome the various steps—I listed them in Committee — which the Ministry has taken in regard to conservation interests. However, I hope that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will take clear note of the new clause, because it represents the strong desire of people throughout the country that he should go even further in recognising the valid interests of conservation and the need for balance in the countryside. There is even more need for that desire to be taken into account by the Scottish Office. Many of its attitudes have been far less progressive than those of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and I particularly hope that the debate will be read by the Scottish Office.

Mr. Crouch: It is one thing for the Ministers and others to read the debate in the Official Report, but it is what is written into a Bill that eventually becomes good or bad law, is applied in the courts afterwards, and affects the way that we protect the countryside. I recognise the genuine way in which my hon. Friend is speaking, and that he has a great deal of knowledge, but surely it is what is written in the Bill that counts.

Mr. Carlisle: Absolutely, but before a Bill becomes law it has to go through Parliament, and there is a danger of not even closing the loopholes which have so often led to the destruction of habitat. Therefore, I emphasise that it is important to be practical if we have a real concern for the needs of the countryside.

Mr. Cormack: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Carlisle: No, I am sorry. My hon. Friend has had his chance.

I should like to mention four matters to which the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food should pay greater attention in the coming year. First, I hope that the Ministry will reintroduce pre-notification for agricultural works which attract grants. Without any doubt, the changes made in 1980 have been detrimental. To bring back the system of pre-notification would not be very bureaucratic, and it would certainly help to protect certain aspects of habitats. I understand that since the change in the system no grants have been refused by the Ministry, yet without any doubt the habitat has been damaged and destroyed by grant-related work.

Secondly, I particularly welcome the consultative paper which the Ministry has produced on drainage, and the suggestion in it that the cost-benefit analyses for large schemes will be subject to public scrutiny. That is a welcome advance, but it is necessary to go further and not to have grants for drainage, because drainage is destroying habitats and bringing new land under the plough, only to add to surpluses. That is a misuse of public funds. There is further progress to be made in that respect, and I am glad that the Ministry is moving in the right direction.

Thirdly, I welcome the extension of EEC grants to systems which bring about a proper balance between farming and conservation. That policy is in the early stages of development. We shall be watching carefully to see that the grants are used in an imaginative way. Much work has to be done on how to achieve a practical system which balances the interests of farming with those of conservation. It is easy enough to talk about integrated farming, but it is very difficult to achieve it effectively in practice.

Finally, much more needs to be done about the control of chemicals. In the past year I have become convinced that the use of agricultural chemicals is doing more than anything else to damage wildlife in the wider countryside away from the special sites. The Bill deals to a certain extent with the problem of chemicals, but in setting the direction of our research, in the development of new techniques and products, and in the general education of those in the farming industry, we must concentrate especially on the problem of chemicals, because it is the most dangerous problem facing the countryside, and we are too complacent about it.

Clearly, there is much for the Ministry to do. As I wish the Bill to proceed so that the loopholes may be closed, I shall not vote against the Government today, but I remind them that in conservation matters there will be a great deal of public scrutiny. They have much still to do in furthering the genuine wishes of many people in the country.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I found the intervention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food reactionary and appalling. [Interruption.] I say clearly to the hon. Lady that it was totally unacceptable.

The hon. Lady said that there were technical objections to what is already a retreat from the best position, which is that advocated in the Bill as originally drafted. She knows perfectly well that it is a compromise proposal, trying to insist that the Department in which she has ministerial responsibility has a duty to look after the conservation interests set out in the clause.

Even if there are technical objections—if there are, I do not believe that they are overriding or sufficient to make the Bill technically invalid—the hon. Lady could at least have shown some sign that the Department felt the need to respond to the pressures on it. I will tell the hon. Lady why the duty should be imposed on her Department. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is responsible for 80 per cent. of the land that we are talking about this morning; it is responsible for what goes on in 80 per cent. of our natural heritage. Therefore, if we are to start with one Department, it is right to start with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. There is no argument about that. The House knows my view that agricultural land should also be subject to planning consent and planning control, in the way that all other land should be.

We have to slay the dragons that are emanating from the Ministry, in alliance with the so-called Department of the Environment. It was argued in Committee by the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment—the hon. Lady made the same point this morning—that there is a constitutional objection to imposing on a Government Department duties such as those set out in the new clause. I wonder whether either Minister has considered the role of the Department of the Environment in the Netherlands. That Department sees itself as having a duty to argue for the environment and not to seek to do as little as the Government can get away with, given the pressures from Europe as well as national pressures.

It might be thought that the vested interests—the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association—are the reason for the Ministry being so resistant, but that is not so. Both bodies have said that they are in favour of the clause. It is totally unacceptable that the only remaining vestige of reaction, caution, and unwillingness to respond is to be found in the Ministry of Agriculture. What right has the Ministry to say that it is the best judge of these matters? The unions representing farming interests, the association of those who own much of the land and the conservation groups all [illegible] that the duty should be imposed.

About 53 per cent. of the sites of special scientific interest that have been lost were destroyed by intensive agriculture and the Government did not respond by closing the loophole. Indeed, in May last year the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment said that there was not a particularly good case for doing anything about the 1981 Act because it had not been proved to be failing.

It is because of the unwillingness to accept the evidence—Ministers know the statistics and how much of our heritage has been irretrievably lost—that we must act now. I hope that hon. Members will put their duty to the country ahead of the need to bail out the Government when they need support.

The hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) has a good record on conservation matters, but it is ludicrous for him to argue that merely because a private Member's Bill does something controversial and important it should be watered down. The history of this place is not that the Government dictate what legislation goes through; Parliament dictates that, and hon. Members have a right to introduce legislation. Private Members' Bills are an important part of our constitution. The fact that the Government may not like them does not mean that controversial matters should not be debated. Some of the best legislation ever passed in this country has got through because of the persistence of Back Benchers.

I pay an unreserved tribute to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). He did not respond to the kicking that he was given by Ministers in Committee by giving up, but sought cautiously and responsibly to ensure that he carried with him as many influential bodies as possible. It is not good enough to say that if the Government say no on a controversial matter, hon. Members should give up.

I do not propose to give up and I think that many other hon. Members will not give up. If this House cannot get what it wants, I am sure that the other place will try to make sure that we get the Bill right.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I thought that the hon. Gentleman would return to a subject that he mentioned earlier and on which I should like clarification. He said that agriculture should be subjected to the full rigours of planning control. I understand that that is Liberal policy. Will the hon. Gentleman expand on that?

Mr. Hughes: That is Liberal policy. I know that we have to win the argument with some of the vested interests. The anomaly has existed for a long time. The production of food is an important activity and I pay tribute to our agriculture industry for doing its duty so well. However, I do not agree that that industry should be treated differently from any other.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): I fear that the hon. Gentleman is about to move on without clarifying Liberal party policy. Is he talking only about planning permission for buildings or about planning permission for land use? Will a farmer have to apply for planning permission to change from milk to cereals or when he alters the size of his fields? Will the hon. Gentleman tell us exactly what is Liberal party policy?

Mr. Hughes: The planning permission requirement would not apply to changes of crop or a change from crops to dairy farming. It would apply to buildings and, for example, to the removal of hedgerows and woodlands. Perhaps I shall excite the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) if I tell him that, although the first arrangements have not been made, I understand that our joint Liberal assembly this year will include a major debate on that, which will put some of the details into our policy. A document that is recognised as valuable and valid by planners throughout the land has been produced and will be the basis of the discussion in September. I shall send the hon. Member for Upminster a copy of the report of that debate and the text of the resolution.

11.15 am

It should be the duty of the Ministry of Agriculture to have an overriding consideration for the whole environment, of which it is a principal steward. That is why the provisions of the Bill, closing the loopholes in the legislation affecting sites of special scientific interest——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): The hon. Gentleman has tied up farming with detailed planning controls. As I have some responsibility for rates, will the hon. Gentleman confirm whether it is also Liberal policy to re-rate agriculture?

Mr. Hughes: I suspect that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would rebuke me if——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Indeed.

Mr. Hughes: In that case, I shall not respond to the Under-Secretary.

The duty to ensure the conservation of our environment cannot be put off any longer. The ravages that have occurred since the war are on the record. I assure the House that the feeling outside is that it is about time that Parliament responded to the increasing desire of our fellow citizens to make sure that conservation is regarded as being as important as any other task of Parliament in 1985.

Mr. Chapman: I am privileged to be a sponsor of the Bill and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for South Shields

[Mr. Chapman]

(Dr. Clark) for introducing a sensible and balanced new clause which is an effort to seek reconciliation and the support of many diverse interests.

I declare an interest as president of the Arboriculture Association and vice-chairman of Wildlife Link, an umbrella organisation for 33 environment groups interested in our flora and fauna. I have to add that, using that dreadful modern terminology, they wanted to make me the vice-chair, but I reminded them that I prefer to be called Mr. Chapman than Mr. Chap, and they took the point.

It is a humbling experience to understand the dramatic changes that have taken place in our countryside in the past three decades. We should not preserve our countryside in aspic, because it must respond to changing agricultural demands. However, the frightening pace of the change over the past 30 years has caused justifiable anxiety among many people. Hundreds of thousands of miles of hedgerow have been uprooted, many acres of lowland heaths have disappeared and many upland heaths have been destroyed. More than half our fenland has been drained. The sheer scale of what has happened is frightening.

The Select Committee on the Environment, of which I am a member, investigated the effectiveness of the 1981 Act. We came to conclusions that were reached by the Minister, and part of the present Bill seeks to close the loopholes. We also came to the conclusion that we did not believe that planning controls on land use in the countryside would be relevant. We noted the heartwarming increase in the farming community's awareness of, and co-operation on, conservation matters. It is because of that change that I believe that the new clause nicely anticipates a feeling that is growing among all our constituents, whether they live in the country or the town. This is not just a matter for countrysiders. Sensible conservation of the countryside is a matter of deep concern to urban dwellers too.

If I were less charitable, I might opine that the last refuge of a Minister on a weak case is to say that a clause proposed by someone else—not by the Government; those can be changed in Committee—is defective. If it is—and the last thing that I want to do today is to delay the progress of this modest and sensible Bill—I hope that the Government will use their good offices to try to remedy the defects when the Bill is considered—as I hope that it will be—in another place.

I believe that the new clause reflects what our constituents want to see—all our constituents, as well as those who are farmers and members of the National Farmers Union. I hope that the Government will have second thoughts. If it is necessary to withdraw the clause at this stage, I hope that it will reappear, without defects, at a later stage.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) who is, jointly with me, a vice chairman of Wildlife Link.

I also wish to express support for the new clause of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), and my deep sadness that the Parliamentary Secretary felt unable to accept it. The Government have advanced various arguments for not accepting the new clause. First, they spoke about defective legislation. As several hon. Members have pointed out, that is not an argument against the principle of the clause. It is an argument for tightening up the wording. If the Government had been keen on the principles behind the clause, they could easily have suggested their own phrasing. I hope that if my hon. Friend feels that it is necessary to withdraw the clause because of its technical defects, the matter will be pressed further in another place and the defects remedied.

The Government's second argument was that the teeth of the Bill were designed to deal with the sites of special scientific interest and the closing of loopholes, rather than the principles of conservation as they relate to the Ministry of Agriculture. That is nonsense. Parts of the Bill are about tightening up loopholes, but when the Bill was passing through its earlier stages, with very broad support on both sides of the House, it was regarded as doing more than close some precise loopholes. If the Government had simply been concerned with closing loopholes, they could have done it 12 months ago and some of the 451 SSSIs damaged since my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) introduced his private Member's Bill on the matter could perhaps have been saved. However, the Government did not take that opportunity. That was sad, and for the Government to say now that the Bill was primarily concerned only with that matter is, frankly, cheek.

Thirdly, the Minister complained that her Ministry was being singled out for special treatment. Of course it is. No other Government Department has the same power to have a potentially damaging impact on the countryside heritage. It is precisely because of the power vested in the Minister that the new clause seeks out the Ministry for special treatment. The Minister's argument misses the whole point of the issue of the balance between conservation and food production.

The Minister's fourth and major argument was that the clause had been tabled because it was thought that agriculture Ministers were not being sufficiently responsive to the needs of conservation, and that the commitment was already there and the clause was therefore unnecessary. Again, that is not an argument against the principle of the clause. If the clause was not strictly needed because the work was already being done, the Government could have said that, in order to demonstrate clearly to the people that they were already doing all that was necessary, they would accept the principle of the new clause and the duties that it imposed on them. If they were already carrying out those duties, why should they complain if they were laid down in legislation?

Although there have been dramatic improvements in the past few years in the practice of the Ministry of Agriculture and in the attitudes of the farming community towards conservation and its activities, not enough progress has been made. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment himself, when he addressed the Select Committee, spoke about the engine of destruction. We have only to look at what has been happening on Exmoor, at the ploughing up of wild land and the impact of agriculture on many parts of the countryside, to see that in some respects and in some instances we have not yet got the balance right. That was why my hon. Friend introduced his new clause.

His original new clause was, sadly, deleted in the Standing Committee. It was much stronger. It sought to give the Ministry a firm duty to further the cause of conservation. My hon. Friend then produced a watered-down version that, in the mildest and most reasonable form, seeks simply to state that the Ministry of Agriculture must preserve "a reasonable balance" between the interests of conservation and agriculture. Nothing could be milder, more responsible or more sensible than that. Yet, even though my hon. Friend has gone to great lengths to make it possible not just for the farming community but for the Ministry to accept the principle of reasonable balance enshrined in his new clause, the Parliamentary Secretary still says that she is unable to accept it.

I am deeply disappointed and saddened by the Government's failure to accept my hon. Friend's proposal. If the new clause, or a similar new clause, is not reinstated in the Bill in another place, it will be a sad day for our countryside. There will be continuing destruction that could perhaps have been prevented if such a clause had been added to the Bill.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) told us that he is a townsman who frequently rambles in the countryside and therefore feels strongly about it. It is a shame that there are not more Opposition Members present to support him.

I also am an urban Member of Parliament and can speak with some feeling because I have received correspondence from constituents on this worthy measure. However, I cannot claim that my postbag has been anywhere near as large as on the Bill presented by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), which we are to discuss next Friday.

Feelings in urban areas about Bills such as this are often mixed and muddled. The conservation lobby, which is worthy but sometimes a tiny bit fanatical, brews up feelings that lead to statements which are essentially overkill. There was recently some correspondence in The Times about the alleged massacre of some hedgerow in East Anglia. The editor of that newspaper received many letters, not least from members of another place and conservation campaigners. Eventually, the farmer under attack listed the conservation measures that he had taken, such as the planting of hedgerows and spinneys and works related to water and wetlands. It would have been gracious of many of the correspondents to return to their pens to congratulate him on what he had done. We should consider this matter rather more coolly than we often do.

Although urban constituents urge on us the need for planning measures, as, it seems, does the Liberal party, they also call for greater and cheaper food supplies. They are thus putting a great onus on farmers to farm as efficiently as possible. There is a muddle and I fear that the new clause is moving in that direction.

It is difficult for any hon. Member to deny that Britain still has the finest and most varied wildlife and countryside in the world. Although I am now an urban Member of Parliament, I was born in rural Warwickshire, which is one of our finest counties. I have spent half of my life in London only because of work, so I suspect that I can speak with as much authority as the hon. Member for Hillsborough.

I hope that the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) will consider what he has said and not tend towards planning such as we have heard advocated by the Liberals. I hope that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and his colleagues will make themselves a bit clearer before next Thursday's county council elections or they might suffer for what they have said in passing this morning.

My hon. Friend the Minister should consider our policies and give greater financial support to the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service and the farming and wildlife advisory groups. We must move forward through co-operation and good will. We must recognise that the farming community has contributed a great deal to conservation. The countryside rests in its hands and it is much more sensitive to these issues than the 85 per cent. of us who live in urban areas but nevertheless scream loudly.

Mr. Crouch: Can my hon. Friend advise us what to do about new clause 5? It merely asks for the Minister to have a duty to observe the balance between food production and the conservation of the environment. My hon. Friend has spoken in favour of both. Presumably he wants the balance. Does he not want the new clause? What is wrong with it?

Mr. Tracey: I have urged co-operation and good will rather than the slightly rigid ideas in the new clause. I hope that the hon. Member for South Shields will accept the drafting advice of the Government once again and will withdraw the new clause, perhaps with a view to provision being made in another place.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on introducing his new clause. I understand the reasons for it, but I cannot support it because, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, its drafting is defective.

The hon. Gentleman might be a little ambitious in trying to secure a major change of direction in a massive Ministry by adding a clause to a private Member's Bill. Nevertheless, I wish the Bill all good fortune. It was originally a seven-clause Bill, and it is now a five-clause one. The original Bill covered the protection of sites of special scientific interest — we all want that — the mapping of national parks, marine nature reserves, the direction of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which we are discussing now, the role of the Forestry Commission, moorland and badgers.

It is a little ambitious to expect the new clause to be added to the Bill. If there is a case for the role of any major Government Department to change, there can be change only after the preparation of a Green Paper and a White Paper. The role which the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food plays today is different from the one that it played yesterday, and it will be different again tomorrow. The type of crop needed today is different from the type of crop needed yesterday, and it will be different again tomorrow. The point is that it is not for any Back Bencher to expect a new clause which seeks to shift the whole balance and direction of a Ministry to be accepted.

There are three or four Bills before us today. We have already talked about the Bill relating to motor cycle crash helmets, and that has made good progress. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), who successfully steered it through the House, did not seek to change the whole role of the Department of Transport. Had he sought to do so, he would not have got very far with the Bill. The next Bill for consideration today, the Gaming (Bingo) Bill——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should wait until we reach that Bill. He must take one Bill at a time, like the rest of us.

Sir John Farr: I was merely trying to point out that it is grossly ambitious and imaginative of the hon. Member for South Shields to expect to achieve a major shift in direction in the Ministry via a Bill which fundamentally seeks to achieve the essential protection of SSSIs and of badgers, which we all demand.

I am particularly worried that hon. Members on both sides of the House apparently do not realise what the Ministry is doing for conservation. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) rightly referred to the tragic loss of many of our forests and broadleaved woodlands. However, I have with me an article from a magazine which he may well take, the London Conserver. Three pages of its May issue are devoted to the work which the Forestry Commission has done for conservation. It is said that its work could not be better. The same applies to the Ministry——

Mr. Cormack: I should be the last not to give credit where credit is due, and I have frequently paid tribute to the Ministry and to the Forestry Commission for their achievements, particularly in recent years, but I am a native of Lincolnshire and spent the first 28 years of my life there. In that county I have seen the most terrible despoliation of one of the most beautiful areas of England. Therefore, I do not think that it is over-ambitious of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) to seek to provide some extra powers. There have certainly been good developments during recent years, but we have also lost much that is totally irreplaceable. My hon. Friend must recognise that.

Sir John Farr: Once again, I am grateful for that intervention. My hon. Friend has made a sensible intervention, and knowing him as I have done for so long, I know that he treats this matter seriously and is concerned, as we all are, for good reason. However, there are some hon. Members on both sides of the House who have implied that the direction currently taken by the Ministry is hopeless. That direction may need changing, but a private Member's Bill is not the vehicle for that. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South, must surely accept that.

Much is now being done. However, I shall be brief, as I want the Bill to make progress. Mention has been made of the farming and wildlife advisory groups which have been set up by the CLA and the NFU. There is a network of them, funded entirely by farmers and landowners, and they are working well. For years, farmers have been receiving descriptive leaflets from ADAS on how to make use of the odd, neglected corner of the farm to promote conservation, and I welcome that.

No doubt my hon. Friend the Minister will later tell the House in which direction the Ministry is moving, but perhaps now is not the right time.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I am glad that we have had an opportunity to discuss this broad subject, It is right, however, that the House should concentrate on specific issues and that a private Member's Bill should not be over-ambitious. We are looking for practical measures to benefit the environment. Consequently, we must ensure that this Bill, with its limited objectives, reaches the statute book and achieves them in respect of badgers and, above all, the three-month loophole. We must ensure that it is not lost on the plains of the grand gesture.

The Liberal party has said that it intends to introduce planning controls for farming in relation to buildings, woodlands, and hedgerows. We take note of its approach towards the countryside, but I believe that its attitude is mistaken. We should instead urge the Ministry to accept certain specific points. It is important not that the Ministry should be saddled with more duties that can easily be fudged but that it should take into account certain specific considerations.

I strongly support the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), who not only has a good track record on this subject — as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) was kind enough to say—but who has promoted some very constructive changes that are likely to have practical effect.

We must return to pre-notification of applications for grants. We cannot have grants going through after the work has been done and after any adverse conservation effects have been felt. Secondly, we must have publicly available cost-benefit analyses in relation to drainage schemes, so that we and interested bodies can check them to see whether we are benefiting farming and the countryside generally, or whether we are continuing to destroy habitat—as we have done far too often in the past—and to increase surpluses in a way that no farmer using his own money without subsidy would do.

Thirdly, we should encourage the Common Market in its provision of grants towards a balanced programme of farming and conservation. Fourthly, we must take action over chemicals. My hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt tell me if I am wrong, but if we are indeed now putting about three times as many chemicals on the land as only four years ago, that should be the subject of urgent and detailed research. Bodies such as the Game Conservancy are carrying out research, and the farming and wildlife advisory groups are also playing an important part. But the problem is so great that it cannot be overcome unless the Ministry takes the lead with a crash programme.

There should be a more specific use of chemicals, and we need to know more about the methods of application so that they can be more effective and so that fewer chemicals are put on the land. In that way, fewer costs need be incurred and less damage will be caused.

There are always fashions in these matters. Although I strongly support the move towards conservation, I do not support the farmer bashing that is becoming far too widespread and indiscriminate.

Farmers are entitled to complain that only 10 years ago everybody thought that they were angels; now everybody thinks that they are devils. They are neither. However, we depend upon the farming community more than on any other to preserve our heritage and to keep a balance in farming and conservation.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that all grants should be checked to ensure that they are spent for the purposes for which they were originally given?

Mr. Lyell: I have no evidence that they are not, but if there is such evidence I would agree with the hon. Gentleman. I am not an expert on that point. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will develop it if he thinks it important.

Most farmers are conservationists. They take an enormous amount of trouble about the landscape. Often, they need to be helped to do so, which is why I pressed the point about research into chemicals. Most farmers care for the countryside. I regret that there are some serious lapses from the generally reasonable and often high standards, and we must discourage such lapses for all we are worth. But the object of the Bill should be to close the three-month loophole and to make other comparatively limited gains. We must not let the Bill founder on the grand gesture. I ask the Minister to take most seriously the points that I have raised. If she has any objection to my comments, perhaps she would write to me.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I am in some difficulty with the new clause. My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) said that it is ambitious and imaginative. It is, and should be. My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) suggested that the new clause could, perhaps, be reinstated in another place without its defects. That is an interesting line, but I doubt whether it will happen. The new clause does not deal only with hedgerows, nor is it only about the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Our environmental policy is in some confusion.

The new clause is also about water meadows. We have been told that the public must have access to cost-benefit analysis on drainage schemes. Some of the most ancient traditions in lowland farming are being expunged from the environment before our eyes because of drainage policies and commercial pressures on farmers. Indeed, sometimes the Nature Conservancy Council has turned down requests for the preservation of water meadows on the ground that the land has already been spoiled by the use of herbicides. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) spoke of the attention that we need to give to chemicals used in agriculture. It is absurd that water meadows cannot become sites of special scientific interest because chemicals have destroyed some flora. That is a phoney argument.

Fish farming and chemicals, too, have changed the face of the land. MAFF should have more responsibility for that, and that would be encouraged by the new clause. Although water authorities usually say specifically that no antibiotics may be used in fish farms where water is put back into the drainage system of a valley, in fact fish farmers tell one, "Oh, everyone does it." Antibiotics are used as a preventative measure, not a curative measure, in fish farming.

There is confusion in our environmental policy on trees — for example, our broadleaf policy. We also have difficulty with many other aspects of countryside management. However, for the first time a wide range of interests agree with the aims of the new clause, and have written to us and said so. The Council for the Protection of Rural England, the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association all agree with the aims of the new clause. The farmers are conservationists and farmer bashing is a fruitless activity.

In my part of the world, a large proportion of the land is used as military training areas, which are also important areas of conservation. All areas, whether military, farming, plain or valley, need a positive environmental policy to protect them. That also applies to land owned by the new National Heritage Commission. I wholly support the steps that it is taking to encourage the National Trust in the protection of Stonehenge. It is all very well The Times today printing emotive pictures on its back page of barbed wire surrounding Stonehenge, but at the Stonehenge so-called free festival last year the free-living, liberal-minded participants cut down more than 1,000 trees on Salisbury plain, no doubt under some misplaced belief in a right-to-fuel argument. I understand that a similar act of vandalism was carried out by the same people at Molesworth.

Is it fair to place responsibility only on MAFF? Perhaps it is not. The Department of the Environment is also involved, and I am glad to see its Minister on the Front Bench today. He has already mentioned rates and his responsibility for that. I must press the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes)—if I could have his attention for a moment—on his party's policy on rates. Does he speak for the SDP also? This is not some cheap line; it is crucial. If there is to be re-rating of agricultural buildings, let alone woodlands, hedgerows and land, there will be a severe impact on conservation and on the cost of conservation. The new clause would ensure that the Minister takes a positive line.

I repeat that we have a confused environmental policy. I understand that trees, which may have an impact on agricultural policy — there has been a great deal of controversy about that — are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland. The improvement of marginal land and the conservation of land on the edge of, for example, the New Forest, which we might think would be the responsibility of MAFF, is in fact not its responsibility. I recently tabled a parliamentary question to MAFF on the improvement of marginal land through the use of natural fertilisers such as sewage sludge. The question was transferred to the Department of the Environment, which sent me a letter supposedly telling me what MAFF was doing—except that it did not say what MAFF was doing. The new clause would place a clear and sensible responsibility on one Minister.

I urge conservationists not to pull the rug from under the feet of those who are trying hard to move forward in the cause of conservation. Conservation is not preservation. We must look to the future. The message of the new clause is clear — we must start somewhere. This is a private Member's Bill. I am sorry that MAFF has drawn the short straw, which is of no comfort to my hon. Friends on the Front Bench who I know have moved very far in supporting the Bill. I shall listen to the comments of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) with great interest.

12 noon

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall be brief, though that will be difficult, as I am tempted to go into a number of issues because the debate has ranged widely. There were moments when you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, seemed to be signalling that it might be getting too wide, so I shall not even mention Liberal policy on re-rating agriculture.

My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) got involved in a dental argument about whether there were teeth in the Bill. I shall not follow him in his expertise in that matter. It has been fascinating to examine the large volume of correspondence that we have had about the Bill. The emphasis has shifted from the writers originally expressing views on what they called the "loophole Bill" to what they are now describing as the "MAFF duty Bill." That is fair enough, and there is no reason why the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) should not press for other changes which he wants made. Let us remember that the Bill contains an important central part. Nothing that we do must endanger the loophole-closing aspect of it.

With respect to a number of extremely good speeches, I thought that the most thoughtful was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), because what he did not say was just as interesting as what he did say. He is a powerful representative of agricultural and countryside interests, and he argued against such a duty as the new clause would impose being placed on the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

My hon. Friend pointed out—my colleagues at the Ministry of Agriculture are well aware of it—that we are at a time of transition and flux in agriculture. It may be that in due course my right hon. and hon. Friends in that Department will present White Papers or Green Papers on the whole subject. I note, for example, that the chairman of the Countryside Commission has urged such a course. It may be that a whole land use or estate use White Paper will be introduced in which we map out the policies towards land use in the round in this country.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough pointed out that, although it is understandable that the House wishes to emphasise aspects of that debate at an early stage, we need to take a more fundamental look, at greater leisure, at the whole issue, and that should involve the whole collective force of the Government over some time to ensure that we get it right. I say that because I am not sure that the best way to proceed is to approach one aspect of it in a private Member's Bill.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) made an attractive reference to his country seat. I hope that he was not thinking of moving to another place, because that would be a great loss to this House. I strongly agreed with him when he said in an eloquent speech—although he was arguing the other side of the case—that he wanted the great strength of the Government, as he described it, to be behind the conservation cause as a whole.

That is part of our argument for saying that the addition of specific duties does not necessarily address the point, because if it is not collective policy, with senior Ministers behind it, it is nothing, whatever duties may be laid on Departments. However, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary and I are not saying that we do not understand the concerns which led to the introduction of the new clause, and the remarks of my hon. Friends may carry weight with Ministers as they approach these issues.

Mr. Cormack: The Parliamentary Secretary made great play of the technical deficiencies of the clause, and I would not challenge what she said. May we take it from what my hon. Friend is now saying that detailed consideration will be given to all the points that have been made today with a view to introducing something in another place?

Mr. Waldegrave: No, that is not what I said. I am arguing that if there is a case for making such changes, there is a case for making them in a wider context than in this Bill. I said that that context might produce documents about the future direction of agriculture and of land use as a whole, the sorts of subjects to which the uplands report of the Countryside Commission addressed itself, and there are other, wider issues to be considered.

The Parliamentary Secretary made the fair point that it is sometimes forgotten that the Ministry of Agriculture is also the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and that the Scottish Office, which is tacked on to the end of the new clause, is an even wider Department. It is equally fair to point out that provisions of this type are extremely difficult to draft.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) in a sense made speeches which fitted together. They are all formidable proponents of the countryside and practical measures to improve it, and they all made eloquent speeches.

The Food and Environment Protection Bill, which is at present in Committee, is relevant to some of the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln. In due course, regulations will be introduced under that Bill and I am sure that he will cross-examine them closely. He and other hon. Members made important points about changes which they would like to see, and their remarks are part of the discussion that we need about environmental policy. Their remarks, in particular the way in which they bite on agricultural policy, were of course heard by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary.

Although the hon. Member for South Shields and I have been in disagreement about some aspects of what is proposed, we have managed to avoid personalising the matter. I regretted, therefore, the slightly venomous tone of the remarks of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). We were, however, interested in his commitment to planning controls. Poor old Gladstone must be spinning in his grave. But, then, I suppose that he has been spinning ever since his poor Liberal party became a subsidiary of the SDP.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey mentioned what he described as his great commitment to conservation, a commitment which I would not dare to challenge when expressed by the hon. Members for South Shields or for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). For that reason, I looked in Dod to find what major contributions the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey had made, and I discovered that he has a long list of special interests. Indeed, his interests are much wider than those of anybody else, covering human rights and civil liberties, youth affairs, social injustice, housing, Europe, devolution, Anglo-Irish relations, recreation, music, theatre, history and sport. There was not a mention in that lengthy entry of his interest in today's issues. I thought, therefore, that what I really heard from the hon. Gentleman was the well-known sign of a politician getting on to somebody else's bandwagon.

The hon. Member for Surbiton must be a brave man. He said that he had muddled constituents. I do not have such constituents, nor does anybody else. I am sure that our constituents, like customers in the market place, are always right. However, the hon. Gentleman rightly pointed to the way in which we sometimes have difficulty in explaining to our constituents conflicts that arise, and on that he made some fair comments, such as the way in which people want cheap and reliable food, but in some cases wish to put constraints on farmers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) and the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury made speeches which went well together. Their co-operation on the Select Committee might have been behind their similarity of interests, and we respect their views on those issues. We share their concern for the intentions which lie behind the new clause, although we do not think that this is the right way, or place, to pursue them.

A number of other Departments, from the environmental point of view, have a major impact on the countryside. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is a great enthusiast for reducing smoke emissions and air pollution. That is why I say that other Departments — responsible for transport, energy and industry, for example — have a major impact on the environment.

In view of the dramatic progress that has been made by Ministers concerned with agriculture in the past two years, it seems unfair to single them out. On those grounds, we do not welcome the new clause and I hope that it will not be forced to a Division.

Dr. David Clark: I shall follow the example of the Minister and be brief. Having listened with interest to the remarks made by hon. Members on both sides, it is clear that we have had an interesting and illuminating debate, one which reflects the concern in the country that we must get the balance right in agriculture, and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, despite what the Under-Secretary said, has an overwhelming interest in the affairs of the countryside.

It is interesting to note that the discussion is taking place not only in what might be called the middle-class and upper-market press but elsewhere. For example, I was delighted in recent weeks to see the involvement of the Daily Mirror with its "Living Britain" campaign. I wish Robert Maxwell as much success with that campaign as he has had with Oxford United. It does an enormous amount of good for such a newspaper to try to sell, in simple terms, interest in the problems that we are now discussing.

I listened closely to what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture said. I take on board her point about the defective drafting. It is always a great problem for a private Member in particular to try to draft a complex and detailed clause. I am grateful for the help that I had from the CPRE and also from the National Farmers Union and the CLA.

I hope that the Minister listened to the united message that came from the Opposition. It came in a more or less united form from Conservative Benches. The exception was the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), whose change of attitude was disappointing. However, the almost united message from Conservative Members was that they wanted to have a look at the matter. They wanted some Government action along those lines.

We have talked about reconciliation and co-operation. This is not the last chance for this Parliament to look at the Bill. In view of what the Minister said about the defective drafting, I still maintain that, because of its spirit and purpose, it was right to move it. I should like the Bill eventually to end up with that clause in it. I hope that the Minister has taken note of the messages from both sides of the House and that in some way or another the Government will look at the matter in the next few months when the Bill is still before Parliament. Personally, I hope that in another place the noble Lords will take note of my comments and that they will wish to discuss the matter again.

In that spirit, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

AMENDMENT OF BADGERS ACT 1973 S. 1

Dr. David Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 7, leave out '(2)' and insert '(a)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 2, in page 1, line 9, leave out from beginning to end of line 18 and insert—

'(b) before subsection (2) there shall be inserted—

"(1A) If, in any proceedings for an offence under subsection (1) above consisting of attempting to kill, injure or take a badger, there is evidence from which it could reasonably be concluded that at the material time the accused was attempting to kill, injure or take a badger, he shall be presumed to have been attempting to kill, injure or take a badger unless the contrary is shown.".'.

No. 3, in page 1, line 18, at end insert—

'(2) Section 2 of the Badgers Act 1973 (digging for badgers etc.) shall be amended as follows—

(a) before "If" there shall be inserted "(1)";

(b) at the end there shall be added—

"(2) If, any proceedings for an offence under subsection (1)(c) above, there is evidence from which it could reasonably be concluded that at the material time the accused was digging for a badger, he shall be presumed to have been digging for a badger unless the contrary is shown.".'.

No. 17, in title, line 2, leave out 'section 1' and insert 'sections 1 and 2'.

Dr. Clark: The Bill has been called many things. On new clause 5, it was called the MAFF Bill. There has already been reference to the "closing the loopholes Bill". For many of us, it has been the badgers Bill. In the early stages, most heat was generated on that issue. It is an emotive issue. I am sure that not a single person in the House could support the cruel pastime of badger baiting. I think that the whole House is united in that. I am pleased to be able to say that from this Dispatch Box. We have no time at all for the cruelty involved, when people dig for badgers, take them, possibly blinding them or breaking their limbs, and then set dogs upon them. That is vicious and immoral, and the House condemns it.

The real point is how we try to ensure that that "pastime" does not take place. When, back in 1979, I co-sponsored the Bill on badgers of my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), we thought that we had overcome the problem. Sadly, ingenious and detemined people have shown that that Bill, although effective, has not been as effective as it should have been. Undoubtedly, there are many cases where prosecutions are not brought because of a weakness that has become apparent in the law.

With that in mind, along with several bodies, particularly the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Royal Society for Nature Conservation and the League Against Cruel Sports, I entered negotiations with Ministers at the Home Office to tackle the problem. It was with the best will in the world that we approached those discussions. We thought that we had come up with an approach when we originally drafted the Bill. I accept that there may have been drafting inadequacies in that first clause. It was also intended that that clause would be altered if it was found to be incorrect. I do not want to regurgitate the history, but we were surprised when the Government tabled an amendment in Committee. We are disappointed with it. I shall say no more about that. It was a genuine attempt and I think that the Home Office thought that it was pursuing the right course of action.

All our legal advice has been to the contrary. I have further confirmation of that today from one of the leading counsel in the country. Talking about the previous amendment, which I am seeking to change through this series of amendments, he said:

"The amendment makes it essential that a badger is actually either killed or injured. This means, I think, that the Prosecution might have to produce a dead or injured badger"— the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) said that in Committee——

"so the case might well be far more difficult to prove. Therefore in my opinion it is a retrograde step and the amendment should be resisted."

That opinion was given by John Mortimer, QC. A similar opinion was given by Lewis Blom-Cooper, who said that, although in the strict matter of the law the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment was correct in what he said in Committee, in practice it was his view that it would weaken the present legislation.

Mr. Lyell: This matter has caused a great deal of trouble. Does the hon. Gentleman accept, despite what he quoted from those letters, that it is a fact that what was added in Committee was a new offence, and that it in no way weakened the existing law? It provided an additional protection, albeit that we may now have found further protection to add.

Dr. Clark: The great difficulty is that, once one starts down that route, one gets drawn on to tangential lines. I half accept what the hon. and learned Gentleman said. The second leading counsel's opinion was:

"What I do think is that Magistrates' Courts, in applying the law after the passing of the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Act 1985, may be inclined to impose a stricter interpretation on what constitutes an attempt than hitherto; they would do so by concluding that the relevant acts or omissions were not sufficiently proximate to the killing or injuring to constitute an attempt in law. In so doing they would be wrong in law, but one cannot escape the feeling that Parliament's intention in section 1A might be interpreted as requiring an actual killing or injuring before anyone could be convicted of an attempt under section 1."

I take the hon. and learned Gentleman's point. The amendment was moved with good intent. I am just saying that in practice the leading opinions that we sought suggested that the situation would not have been interpreted that way in the courts. I believe that today's amendment overcomes those obstacles. I do not want to pursue too much of the history.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Would it not be better for the debate not to be an inquest — [Interruption.] It would seem to be better to debate the amendment that is on the Notice Paper.

Dr. Clark: I take my hon. Friend's point. I think that I have done enough of my inquest. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department accepts that I have been fair and frank, and have tried to outline what happened. There has been a difference in interpretation of the law. The Government have put forward their interpretation, and we have put ours. We have had a meeting of minds. I hope that the amendment that I recommend to the House will find approval.

Mr. Lyell: I agree that we should get on to the new clause, but, in view of the wide circulation of misleading leaflets, it is important that the promoter should publicly recognise the constructive help that he has received from the Government and from the British Field Sports Society in producing the new clause and in seeking to promote the Bill at every stage.

Dr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman pre-empts what I am about to say, but I have been giving way in an attempt to be helpful. There have been a large number of misconceptions, misunderstandings and disputes about the law and we do not want any more. That is why the Bill is before Parliament, inadequacies having been found in both the 1981 and the 1973 Acts. Last week, a meeting was held with the Home Office, the British Field Sports Society and the Master of Foxhounds Association as well as with representatives of the amenity bodies. We all know that the League Against Cruel Sports is against hunting, but in a spirit of compromise it has dropped that objective in this instance and sought to work, almost uniquely, alongside the British Field Sports Society and has recognised that the interests of legitimate field sports must be protected. That is a step forward and I am sure that the House is grateful for the co-operation.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I am sorry to press this, but since the Committee stage Conservative Members have been inundated with literature accusing us of putting in a clause which deliberately sought to make the prosecution of offenders more difficult. As I believe that the League Against Cruel Sports was undoubtedly behind the wording of that literature, I cannot accept that that body has co-operated in a full and fair manner either with the British Field Sports Society or with those of us who have been adamant throughout that we must find a satisfactory clause. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is right in saying that that has now been achieved, but one cannot simply pass over the way in which the matter has been misrepresented to the country.

Dr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman has made his point forcefully and now, at the last moment, an amendment has been agreed. I am grateful for the assistance of the Home Office in the drafting as this was an incredibly difficult maze to negotiate, given that we did not wish to injure the interests of legitimate field sports.

Mr. Cormack: It is important to put it on record that many people who are not opponents of field sports are extremely concerned about this. For instance, the great naturalist Phil Drabble, who is a personal friend of mine, knows as much about badgers as anyone in this country and he is extremely concerned, so it is not just a question of representation by certain antagonistic bodies.

Dr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman has an excellent record in this area. It is sometimes easier for him to make these things clear to the House and I am grateful for his assistance.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I have come to listen to the debate because I am as concerned as anyone about the badgers and I respect what the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) is trying to do. My constituents have been extremely disturbed by the leaflets and stories that have been circulating. The hon. Gentleman quoted the view of a playwright, or perhaps it was a barrister, but that is not a statement of the law. That opinion concerned the way in which a magistrates court—a very low level court—might interpret the law in practice, but that is not an opinion as to the law itself.

Dr. Clark: I have been giving way not only in an effort to be helpful but in the hope that if hon. Members are able to raise points in interventions fewer of them will wish to make speeches and time will be saved later. I take the thrust of the Gentleman's comment, but we are concerned about the protection of badgers and the first level of legal protection is prosecution in a magistrates court. I was not disputing the purity of the law. I was quoting an opinion as to the protection that the law would give to badgers in practice. The object is to protect the badgers and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman joins me in that aim.

The amendment to section 1 of the Badgers Act would oblige defendants to show, regardless of the methods being used, that they were not after a badger. At present the prosecution has to prove that the defendants were after a badger, so the attempt provisions are strengthened.

The amendment to section 2 would oblige defendants to show that they were not digging for a badger. Currently, the prosecution has to prove that the defendants were digging for a badger, so here, too, the attempt provisions will be strengthened. In that sense, the provisions follow the line adopted in section 1(3) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act.

This is a very complicated matter, but for my own benefit I shall describe it in simple terms. At present, many people caught digging around badger setts, often with badger baiting equipment, have said that they were digging for foxes, which was quite legal. Because it was impossible to prove that they were not digging for foxes, prosecutions too often were not brought and it was clear that a shift in the onus of proof was needed. Defendants will now have to prove that they were digging for foxes and not for badgers, which safeguards the interests of legitimate field sports such as fox hunting.

I believe that this is a sensible amendment and I am delighted to put it forward with the backing of the British Field Sports Society, the Masters of Foxhounds Association and, I hope—no doubt the Minister will wish to say something on this—the backing of the Home Office. The arguments have been well rehearsed and I hope that the number of interventions that have been made will considerably reduce the number of speeches.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am glad to give the Government's view on this important issue, which has become even more important as a result of the public debate — much of it, unfortunately, not too well informed — surrounding the various discussions and negotiations.

I should make it absolutely clear at the outset that I speak in favour of accepting the amendment for one clear and unsurprising reason. The amendment was thought out by my officials and presented to a meeting of the various interest groups last week. When the substance of it seemed to be acceptable, the amendment was then drafted by parliamentary counsel on the instructions of the Home Office and presented to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). I therefore stand at the Dispatch Box as the parent of the amendment and not as one dragged along behind an amendment thought out and pressed by others. It is the Government's amendment and the hon. Member for South Shields has been kind enough to accept it and put it forward in his name. If there is any praise or blame to be attached to the amendment, it should be directed to the Government.

I am as appalled as anyone at the thought that, in this day and age, people can go out into the countryside with dogs, sticks, spades, or some combination of all three, and take the pleasures of the countryside as being to dig into a badger's sett and capture the badger to use it in some sport or to beat it to death. That is utterly disgraceful. It was plainly the intention of Parliament in the 1973 Act to outlaw such behaviour. I condemn such behaviour unreservedly on behalf of the Government. If the law is defective, I wish to recognise that and to put the full weight of the Government behind proposals to change it.

12.30 pm

I make it clear that that is a pious aspiration which I share not only with the hon. Member for South Shields but with a number of those concerned with wildlife matters. Some of these people have been traduced by those who seek to exploit the badger, not by beating him over the head, but by using him for partisan ends to make tendentious and wholly wrong attacks on the Government and on some of those who believe that it is legitimate for country folk to involve themselves in legitimate country sports. No one involved in such legitimate country sports, any more than someone who abominates all forms of hunting, wants anything to do with the killing or torturing of badgers.

In assembling my thoughts on this matter I have been enormously assisted by the British Field Sports Society and the Masters of Foxhounds Association, who have always been ready to work with the animal welfare group, to whose views I also attach importance. I commend in particular the approach of my hon. and learned Friend for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell), who has brought his considerable skills in the detail of the law to bear on this matter, and has been of enormous help.

The debate, both in the House and outside, has been long on tendentious but rather short on the detailed thinking that needs to be done to translate pious aspirations into effective statute law. In that regard, apart from the advice that I have received from my officials, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire stands alone. Many of those who have been most vocal in advocating the cause of the badger have been extremely limited when it has come to putting forward drafts which would be workable and made sense in the courts.

When people come to allocate blame out of what has been an unhappy story, they should perhaps give most of it to those who have sought to blacken the characters of others whose only intention has been to find a proper way out. They have aimed to find a solution which ensures that an individual walking through the countryside with his dog does not run the risk of being hauled before the magistrates. Nobody who cares about the countryside wants to stop legitimate enjoyment of it by those who are playing their part, as people have done for centuries, in enjoying the countryside and appreciating our rural heritage.

Some matters need to be put on the record. My task is not only to commend the amendment to the House as I intend to do, but to set it in the context of the debates that have taken place. I am not in favour of seeing my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) traduced in the way that he has been in some of the literature, or of seeing colleagues' postbags full of some of the most malicious assertions about the Government, none of which is grounded in fact. I put on record our involvement in this matter, and in doing so I shall go through the three drafts which have appeared before the House in order to set them in their context.

Just as I have challenged some individuals whom I have met privately to come forward with any assertion that they may wish to bring about bad faith and so on, so I shall happily give way to any hon. Member who wishes to pursue an assertion of bad faith. I do that so that I can deal with these points fairly and openly in the presence of those who will later bring our debates to a wider public knowledge.

Long before the hon. Member for South Shields had the good fortune to be drawn high in the ballot, this matter was raised with my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and myself by that most distinguished battler for animal welfare, Lord Houghton. It is no secret that I have worked closely with Lord Houghton on a number of matters in our plans to reform the law on animal experiments. We worked together on the extremely successful venture, which perhaps passed without notice at the end of the last Session but should not have done, on the sale of pets in open street markets. The law was changed to prevent the scandal of places such as Club row. That began with an initiative by Lord Houghton, and it was taken up by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) and me.

When Lord Houghton said that he was unhappy about the working of the Badgers Act, I was glad to meet him. My right hon. and learned Friend and I met Lord Houghton and Mr. Richard Course. My right hon. and learned Friend made it clear that we would look favourably at any provision to tighten up the law on badgers, with only one caveat—that it should not be used as a stalking horse to make unlawful what was legitimate field sport. Provided that that distinction could be maintained, my right hon. and learned Friend was wholly in favour of making these changes. That happened on 12 November 1984.

On 19 December, just before Christmas, I had a further meeting with Lord Houghton, at which I indicated my view that if the mischief which he wished to address was that of dogs going into subterranean refuges and the difficulty of proving that when a dog entered a subterranean refuge its owner wilfully intended to take a badger, the proper way to address it would be to import the element of recklessness into that conduct so that whether or not somebody could demonstrably be proved to have intended to take a badger by putting a dog down a hole, if a reasonable person knew, as a reasonable person would be deemed to know, that the hole concerned was a badger sett and not a rabbit warren, the element of recklessness would make it easier to prove the offence.

It is important for the House to recognise that the problem being drawn to our attention was that of dogs entering subterranean refuges. The problem, however, which needed to be addressed was that the requirement in section 1 of the Badgers Act 1973 that wilfulness was required in relation to intention to take a badger was too high a fence for the prosecution to leap over. On that basis I suggested in good faith to Lord Houghton that a provision for imported recklessness would be the way forward.

I welcome the involvement of the hon. Member for South Shields in these matters. Leaving party politics on one side, in general he has been prepared to accept the good faith of the Government, subject only to one caveat, to which I shall turn later. On 20 December 1984 I met the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) at which I offered drafting assistance on any proposal that he might wish to make relating to the badger. The difficulty that faced us at that time about the hon. Gentleman's Bill was that he had committed himself to amending the Wildlife and Countryside Act. His short title so provided.

It seemed logical to me that to amend an Act which did not deal with the badger when there was already a specific Act dealing with the badger on the statute book made very little sense and that the appropriate course to take was to amend the Badgers Act. This was discussed at a meeting between Lord Houghton, the hon. Member for South Shields and myself on 16 January 1985, at which Lord Houghton suggested that an amendment to the Wildlife and Countryside Act might be a marker and that later it might be converted into an amendment to the Badgers Act, either in the House of Lords, whose rules are more flexible than ours, or in the House of Commons. At that stage, however, we doubted whether the Badgers Act could be amended in this House, on the basis that it would be outside the scope of a narrowly drawn short title which set out only to amend another Act.

At that point we were troubled by the intervention of the dog and the difficulty of proving intent where a dog was allowed to go down a hole, whatever dark suspicions one might have. I stress that point only because the condemnation that was seen to rain down upon our unprepared heads dealt with a totally different point. One of the interesting aspects of the argument is that, like the sands of the Sahara, it has shifted as the winds have eddied and flurried. In no sense have we had at any successive point to meet precisely the same argument. However, at this point we were dealing with dogs. Therefore, when the hon. Member for South Shields drew up his Bill, he included an amendment to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, being fully aware that in due course it would have to be changed into an amendment to the Badgers Act 1973.

The hon. Gentleman is a generous person, and he was typically generous in his Second Reading speech on 8 February when he said:

> "I am pleased to say that the Home Office has helped me. The Home Secretary saw a deputation of which I was not a member, and offered general support to try to tighten up the legislation. The clause was given to me by the Home Office. I am grateful for its assistance and the time it gave me to get this point right." —[Official Report, 8 February 1985; Vol. 72, c. 1239.]

I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman was trying to make his Second Reading speech quickly, and I do not criticise him for that, but he was inaccurate to suggest that we had handed the amendment to him. We had not, but we had said that the importation of the concept of recklessness was important and we had promised to assist in making the amendment to the Badgers Act 1973 in due course.

Dr. David Clark: It is important that that point should be cleared up. If that is the case, I was under a severe misapphrension on that occasion. I still have in my possession a draft of the amendment on ministerial notepaper, which I thought had ministerial backing. Therefore, if I have misled the House it was because I misunderstood the situation, as, indeed, I think most of the amenity societies misunderstood the situation. If that is the case, I apologise to the Minister for what I said on that occasion, which appears to have been inaccurate.

Mr. Mellor: I ask the House to believe that, apart from one quibble about the suggestion that the hon. Gentleman may have made at his press conference yesterday that the Government had made a U-turn, I wholly exonerate the hon. Gentleman. It is to others that I am directing my remarks. The hon. Gentleman is in a difficult position, being committed to the countryside and being drawn into the necessary partisanship of being an Opposition spokesman. He has not much for which to stand condemned. However, it is necessary to make those points clear.

The original Bill said that the prohibition should be on using "a dog undergrbund, (whether actually or ostensibly in search of another wild animal) to take, injure or kill, or to attempt to take, injure or kill a badger if he knows or has reasonable cause to believe that it is likely to do so".

We are here dealing only with the use of a dog. That is important to the points that are soon to come.

Further consideration was then given to what the shape of the Bill should be. At that point others entered the fray, at a meeting on 19 February 1985, at which Lord Melchett and others proposed to my officials a different badger clause. It was at that point that a number of other considerations, such as the protection of the badger's sett, began to enter into the arrangements, when that had never been part of the original proposal.

I then engaged with my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West, who has only wanted, as I have, to try to make progress on this matter, to draw up a clause which would be an amendment to the Badgers Act, not to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, which would have had the consequence of bringing into law a legally cogent way of expressing the intentions which had been agreed between myself and the hon. Gentleman.

We then came to a difficulty upon which a great deal of the propaganda hangs, so I shall expose it for a moment if I may. The original clause drafted by the hon. Gentleman suggested that it was possible recklessly to attempt to commit an offence. One does not need to be a lawyer to appreciate that "recklessly to attempt" is a contradiction in terms because to attempt to do something one must have an intention to do it and then to fail. The attraction of "recklessness" in the scheme of things which the hon. Gentleman and I worked out was that it is not a settled intention. One would not have to establish a settled intention to take a badger, only that someone was reckless but that what he did would have affected a badger. To put it another way, a reasonable person would not have done it because he would have appreciated the consequences to the badger, whereas a reckless person would have blundered on.

Much turns on this. If one looks at the leaflets with which we have been showered, one sees that they all fail to recognise that one crucial point. In law one cannot recklessly attempt an act. Therefore, to give effect in legal sense, and not to commit a contradiction in terms which even Parliament, which has sometimes put the most unusual things into statute, might subsequently have cause to blush with shame about, we determined that the appropriate thing to commend to the Committee, and my hon. Friend did so, was to remove the attempt, on the basis that we wanted to keep recklessness. That passed the Committee and has been traduced in a number of documents that have been before the House.

Let me make it completely clear that it cannot be the case that, if a new offence is set alongside an existing offence, that can weaken the law. One may argue that the amendment does not do all that one wants it to do, but the idea that the amendment in some way derogates from a quite separate, free-standing offence that is already on the statute book is again legal nonsense.

The assertion contained in the badger factsheet that a conviction in Derbyshire in 1984 would not have occurred under the Bill as it left Committee is nonsense. If, when a person uses a dog, it is clear that a court is prepared to impute that that person had formed an intention to harm a badger and was attempting to do so, the prosecution would proceed under the 1973 Act and would be untouched by the new subsection (1A) which was inserted into the Bill by the Standing Committee of this House. That subsection would come into effect where it was not possible to prove an intention, but where recklessness in the use of a dog could be imputed.

Although much has been made of legal opinions, we have never to this day seen a legal opinion in writing which backed up any of the assertions. I say this in all gentleness to the hon. Gentleman. What he read out, as he acknowledged in the course of a vigorous cross-examination by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire—a man to whom, if one could sign a big enough cheque, one should always turn if in trouble in the courts—was not a legal opinion to suggest that we had derogated one whit from the strength of the law. It was a tendentious assertion that the courts might be confused, based on the rather patronising view that some lawyers take of magistrates—a view with which, on the whole, I am not inclined to agree.

Mr. Cormack: My hon. Friend is deploying his case with clarity and vigour, as we would expect, and I can completely understand why he feels aggrieved and that certain people might have behaved irresponsibly. May I suggest to him, in all humility, that the tone that he is adopting could be misinterpreted outside this House, because—I say this as a friend of my hon. Friend and not just in a technical sense—the people who have been showering us with the leaflets have been genuine in their fears. It is important to recognise that fact.

It is also important to recognise—as my hon. Friend has—the good faith of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), and the fact that, when he reads out letters from people such as John Mortimer, he is genuinely believing that, because they are eminent lawyers—as well as eminent playwrights and so on—their views have some validity. Therefore, I urge a little charity on my hon. Friend.

Mr. Mellor: I think that my hon. Friend has a point about the badger factsheet leaflet. I do not say that that leaflet was issued in bad faith. I say that its authors were misled and that they have now sought to place the blame wrongly. I hope that anyone who subsequently reads what I have to say—I am grateful to my hon. Friend for saying that it was clear; that is always an advantage—may feel, like me, that it was misleading. My venom is directed at another document which I am about to read to the House. The badger factsheet is merely misleading.

Let me state my position clearly before I move on to the other document. The Derbyshire case would certainly not have been decided differently if the law had remained as it was when the Bill left Committee, and that is an important point. I believe that the case in Retford will be dealt with by the new amendment which we shall be discussing later. That is why it will be a considerable step forward.

Mr. Golding: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mellor: Not for the moment. I shall give way in due course, but I should be given the opportunity to give way when I feel like it, rather than when the hon. Gentleman thinks I should give way.

Even my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) who wants to impute good faith to everybody—as I generally do—would have objected to the letter circulated by the League Against Cruel Sports. At a meeting in my Department last week, I challenged Mr. Course of the LACS to say whether he thought that anyone at the Home Office had acted in bad faith, and he did not pursue the matter. However, he sent out a leaflet urging his members and others to write to hon. Members. The leaflet said:

> "However, the pro-hunting BFSS puppet MPs who initially indicated their 'full support' for a crackdown on badger baiters have resorted to their usual dishonest and treacherous tactics. They persuaded another of their puppets, Mr. William Waldegrave, the Government Minister from the Department of the Environment, to propose an alternative clause on badger baiting which would, if passed, effectively wreck Dr. Clark's measure and worse still, actually weaken the existing 1973 Badgers Act. Because this was a Government Amendment, the Conservative MPs on the Committee supported Mr. Waldegrave's Amendment."

That is false and, I have reason to think, is known to be false. It is grotesque, and I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South nodding in agreement. As I have made clear, the Government amendment adds to the law and does not detract from it.

In so far as a gap in the law has been revealed by the Retford magistrates court case, the gap would have remained as yawning if we had left the Bill as drafted. It should be understood that the only difference between the Government amendment and the original proposal was that the amendment made legal sense and the original proposal did not. Their ambit was the same.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Nonsense.

Mr. Mellor: The original proposal sought to impose responsibility for reckless attempts and would not have assisted clarity of the criminal law.

As I replied in the House last week to two important Bills on glue sniffing and on drugs, in the absence of any alliance Member, the fact that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is here makes me feel sufficiently warmhearted to give way to him.

Mr. Simon Hughes: If I were shadow spokesman on home affairs, I would have been here last week. I am here to deal with an environment Bill.

If the 1973 Act had remained, without this Bill it could be argued that using an animal was covered by that Act. However, as the Bill specifically relates to animals and the use of dogs in setts, it is possible that the courts could —rather than would—have interpreted that to mean that the 1973 Act did not cover the use of animals and dogs down setts. That would have weakened the law.

The amendment proposed by the Government—at 11.15 pm on the night before the Standing Committee met —required the production of an animal at the end of the exercise. That was not in the Bill. There was ambiguity. The office of the League Against Cruel Sports is in my constituency, but I do not argue the league's case without judging its merits. There was ambiguity in the last-minute amendment of the Government and there was a risk that it could have weakened the 1973 legislation.

Mr. Mellor: If one is looking at the intention of the individual rather than of the dog, who is not on trial anyway, it is possible to rely on the 1973 Act. One would move to the amendment of the hon. Member for South Shields or of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment only if one needed to rely on something which was not a settled intention, but was recklessness involving the use of a dog.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is saying that, at most, this is a matter about which lawyers could squabble over a glass of port and a piece of Stilton. It is not the sort of error which could have led to all my hon. Friends who do not think that fox hunting should immediately be made illegal being impugned as "dishonest and treacherous" and so on. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is not attempting to defend what seems to me to be a wholly gratuitous insult directed against my hon. Friends. If others were as prepared to lay their interests aside and join in discussions to resolve problems with as much willingness as those of my hon. Friends who are interested in field sports, the House might make much more progress on a number of other pressing problems.

The amendment was proposed after my meeting on 17 April 1985 with the hon. Gentleman and representatives of a number of wildlife groups. I made it clear at that meeting that I was prepared to instruct my officials to make every effort to resolve the problem. There was a further meeting on 23 April, which the hon. Gentleman attended, as did representatives of the animal welfare groups and the British Field Sports Society. At that meeting, my officials suggested a way forward which would have involved requiring an individual to give an account of himself once a prima facie case had been established that he was attempting to take a badger. I am glad to say that that idea has found favour with the groups and is acceptable to the British Field Sports Society and to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire. Parliamentary draftsmen were then instructed to do the work, and the amendment comes before the House with unanimous support. I hope that where there was discord there will now be concord.

The amendment affects the case where someone is digging at a badger's sett, or putting a dog down the sett, and the person who sees him apprehends him—as he may very reasonably wish to do—before that person has had a chance to ascertain whether there is a badger there or to catch it. Once that evidence has been proved before the court, the man will be required to rebut the presumption that he was after a badger. Under the present law, the situation is quite different. Unless it can be shown that someone has wilfully set out to take a badger, he cannot be successfully prosecuted. If he said—even with a smirk—"I was after foxes, Guv", that might wash under the present law. It will not wash under the amendment.

I have been concerned to ensure that someone whose dog suddenly runs down a hole is not put to proof in a magistrates court, that people legitimately engaged in clearing out vermin are not caught, and that legitimate field sports are not inhibited from finishing off a hunt. I am wholly satisfied that, in all those circumstances, the necessary evidence to determine a prima facie case that the man was after a badger could not be established. It is only those who cannot demonstrate any right to be where they are, or any interest in being there, who are actually acting against the badger sett. The arguments over the past two months have been not about dogs but about the protection of the badger's sett. I suspect that it is only in the context of the badger's sett that the necessary prima facie case would exist. Thereupon, and rightly, people would be required to give an account of themselves.

If all the disharmony has resulted—as I believe it has—in much greater protection for the badger, it will have been of use. My only regret is that when, with the Home Secretary, I embarked on this task six months ago, we had no idea that some people would be so willing to impugn our motives. To slam a door in the face at the outset might have led to much less hostility than the fact that at every material point we have sought to deal seriously with the arguments.

We now have a proposal which we can commend to the House, and which not even the most distorted mind could distort. The badger is an ornament to the countryside. How it treats its animals is the test of a civilised community. I believe that Parliament will have rightly responded to the concern of the British people about the badger if it passes the amendment with acclamation.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): My hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) said earlier that he comes from Warwickshire. I also come from that beautiful leafy county—the part of it known as Arden. It remains a mystery to me why the oaks of Arden are answerable to the Secretary of State for Scotland as the Minister responsible for the Forestry Commission.

I also congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). If I had his skill in bringing forward a private Member's Bill, I should have been privileged indeed to have been the sponsor of such an excellent piece of legislation. If I had presented it half as well as the hon. Member, I should have been very pleased with myself.

All right hon. and hon. Members present are pleased that the various parties have been able to come together on amendments Nos. 2 and 3. Badger digging is quite uncivilised and utterly unacceptable. That any people should regard it as some form of pastime beggars my comprehension. It seems to me to be a straight exercise in sadism which has no place in proper society.

There is a double mechanism in these amendments which enable the prosecution, if it can cross a preliminary and not very demanding hurdle, to put a citizen to proof of his innocence. That is not a happy concept in the traditions of English law. I hope that I can be reassured on that matter, because I intend to support the Bill. Indeed, I am here today especially to support it. My reservation is narrow and I am confident that the Front Bench will be able to deal with it.

I was especially glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) said what he did because he enabled my hon. Friends on the Front Bench to explain why they felt rather keenly about some of the matters that seemed to have been directed at them with some animus and spite. I am glad that they had that chance to respond.

Rather patronising mention has been made of magistrates. Having humbly practised before magistrates' benches for some 20 years, I believe that magistrates and their learned clerks dispense an admirable form of justice and I am sure that they will look properly to the implementation of this splendid Bill when it is on the statute book.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): The only interest that I have to declare in this debate is my anxiety about the fate of the badger and my desire for the law to be amended and improved.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department about the rather convoluted history of this matter. Many Conservative Members agree with the aim and intent of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) to ensure that the law is improved. It is clearly inadequate, as it allows those who go digging for badgers to give the feeble and untrue excuse that they are digging for foxes. However, I must agree with the Minister that the original clause was something of a nonsense as it is not possible in law recklessly to attempt to do something.

The Bill went into Committee sooner than most of us expected, and the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment was only put in the tray at the Public Bill Office at 11.15 pm the night before, so there was no opportunity for the usual consultation and exchange of views. That led to great disappointment in Committee. I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell): the amendment introduced in Committee would not have weakened the law, but I thought that it was not much help either. That is why I declined to vote for it.

Some of those lobbying on the Bill have been politically motivated, but I believe that political prejudice as a basis for argument is no ally of the cause of animal welfare. Like many of my hon. Friends, I was prepared in Committee to take at face value what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment said. It is worth briefly reminding the House that on 6 March he said:

"We are trying to make an improvement in the protection of badgers . . . The aspect of the present legislation which we are seeking to improve is the fact that in some cases it has been difficult to prove intent." — [Official Report, Standing Committee E, 6 March 1985, c. 8.]

On no fewer than three other occasions my hon. Friend clearly said that he was concerned about the inadequacy of the law, and wanted to see some improvement. That is why I and several of my hon. Friends worked quietly behind the scenes to put our point that the amendment was not what was wanted, but that something more was required, and could and should be done. Accordingly, I am delighted to support this amendment.

I shall illustrate my argument in case any hon. Members question whether the law needs amending. I do not normally quote from the Daily Mirror, but on 10 April 1985 it carried an article together with a photograph of a badger. The heading is "Victim of the Brutes". The article says:

"The pitiful survivor of an evil badger-baiting session sucks hungrily at a feeding bottle. Vet Geoff Allan is trying to keep Bessie, the eight-week-old orphan, alive. She was found in a sack in South Yorkshire with her brother who later died. Their mother and another cub were torn to pieces by the baiters' dogs. The mother's jaw had been broken to give the dogs a better chance."

I find that utterly disgusting.

An article in the Daily Telegraph of 23 March shows that badger baiters have no regard at all for animal welfare. It is not only badgers that suffer at their hands. The article is headed:

"Driver Forced 11 Dogs into Boot of Car".

It states:

"A man who drove 80 miles with 11 dogs crammed into the boot of his car was fined £330 with £40 costs yesterday by magistrates at Narberth, West Wales . . . Mr. Ivor Rees prosecuting, said the inspector accused Moon"— that is the defendant—

"and three other men of using the 10 fox terriers and a lurcher to fight badgers. Moon denied this and said they were for chasing foxes."

Is any more evidence needed to convince the House that we should take a step in the right direction today by supporting the amendment?

Hon. Members have rightly raised several questions about the amendment. I take note of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor). The question is not only whether the new clauses will be effective but whether they are an acceptable way of changing the law. I understand that he was slightly concerned that we were shifting the burden of proof to the defendant. I think that he was questioning whether that was acceptable in a free society, and was saying that a man should be considered innocent until proved guilty, and should have a right to silence.

We are entitled to ask what the aim of the law is. Its aim is to achieve the correct balance between the rights of the individual and the ability of the state to secure prosecutions for abuse. There are precedents for adopting such a line. I hope that I will be forgiven for using an animal metaphor if I say that the precedents may not be on all fours with this case. However, if the police stop a motorist and wish to inquire whether he has committed the offence of driving without insurance, without a licence or without an MOT certificate, the onus is on the motorist, because he has specialist knowledge of his situation, to show the police that he possesses those documents.

I believe that a similar analysis can be made in this case. Where a person is lawfully going about seeking to rid an area of foxes that the farmer regards as a nuisance, he can show that that is the case. When a person is part of a fox hunt, he can show that he is genuinely after foxes and not seeking to take part in the disgusting practice of badger baiting. Therefore, I cannot see how this relatively modest amendment will lead to any injustice. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull is satisfied on that point.

I hope that both sides of the House will support the amendment. It raises a couple of questions. Can a rational argument for change be sustained and can a valid case be made for increasing the protection for badgers? In my submission, the answer in both cases is a resounding yes, and I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Lyell: I am glad to support the amendment. I congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on his perseverance and his approach to this difficult, and at times vexed, subject.

I speak on behalf of the British Field Sports Society. I wish to make it clear that neither I nor the society has any wish to condone or encourage the practice of badger baiting or digging. The society is strongly in support of measures that will assist in convicting those who carry out such activities, provided that such measures do not interfere with the genuine activities of fox hunting or pest control. I emphasise pest control because I do not believe that the clause contains any dangers for hunting as such. However, it does pose some dangers for the liberty of individuals involved in pest control. Parliament has a duty to look at that aspect.

Sir John Farr: My hon. and learned Friend will be aware that fox hunting does not take place in certain parts of the country, so it is necessary to adopt pest control methods to control the number of foxes, which would otherwise get out of control.

Mr. Lyell: My hon. Friend is right, which is why I was emphasising the pest control aspect. Although I do not wish to speak at length, I must refer to it. We must fulfil our duty as legislators and not produce unfair legislation when taking the fairly drastic step of shifting the burden of proof, which is what we are seeking to do.

I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department for his kind remarks. From what I have seen of both his Department and that of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, there has been a consistent effort to make constructive proposals to add to the protection of badgers.

The Badgers Act 1973 offers considerable protection. It was strengthened in 1981 and is being further strengthened today. While the hon. Member for South Shields has not sought to take party political advantage, others have. Therefore, it is fair to point out that those three measures have come about under Conservative Governments. I say that only to correct the record and not to make a party political point.

The amendment tabled in Committee undoubtedly provided an additional offence and in no way weakened existing legislation—the 1973 Act, as amended in 1981. I support hon. Members who have deplored the criticism of magistrates, who would have been perfectly capable of dealing with the legislation. I am sure that they would not have been bamboozled by the fact that to have a successful prosecution for recklessness an animal must be killed, injured or taken.

Dr. David Clark: I intervene only because I think that it will save time later. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman accept that Shooting Times did not take that view? On 29 March it stated about the amendment that was passed in Committee:

"An amendment to the Wildlife and Countryside Act, the result of Dr. David Clark's private Member's Bill, means that terrier men can only be convicted if a badger is actually killed or injured."

The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to magistrates courts. A solicitor who has been concerned with perhaps more of these cases than any other solicitor, Peter Quinn, is reported to have said that the amendment was "scandalous . . . and nothing better than a badger-baiters' charter."

I accept that that may have been an exaggeration. I mention it simply to show that there was a legal divide on the issue, with people in the legal profession taking a different view from that of the hon. and learned Gentleman. However, that is behind us now and I am satisfied with the new amendment.

1.15 pm

Mr. Lyell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point, though, with respect to the solicitor to whom he referred, it was, as the hon. Gentleman said, an exaggerated opinion. As for the article in the Shooting Times, one only needed to show that a badger had been killed or injured under the offence proposed in Committee because what had been done recklessly was to kill or injure a badger. It is inaccurate to suggest that one would necessarily have to produce a body, although to do so might have been helpful.

I agree that we are putting that difficulty behind us, and I too am happy to concentrate on the new clause, the effect of which will be to shift the burden of proof. That may cause difficulty for some people in connection with their defence, and it also emphasises an important point for the prosecution.

It is important that the standard of naturalism—of understanding wildlife and their habits and habitats—is improved. That applies both to the prosecution and those seeking to defend themselves. It is important, when a prosecution is brought, that it is established that the place where the person was found digging was a badger sett. That is not always obvious, but it can be ascertained by fresh marks—fresh droppings and so on—and fresh indications of the badger's bed.

I emphasise that, because I wish to examine the burden that is placed on the defence. There is no danger for the legitimate fox hunt. That will be well known in the locality and its objective appreciated and understood. It is a clear rule of the Masters of Foxhounds Association that one not only never hunts a badger but that if one comes close to a badger sett or finds oneself having anything to do with a badger, one withdraws, even if one is digging for a fox at the end of a hunt. Thus, the legitimate hunt is not endangered.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) pointed out, in large parts of the country there is no hunting and the digging of foxes is necessary for pest control. The tunnels, earths or setts into which it is necessary to dig to carry out that pest control are not, to the layman, immediately distinguishable, although they are to the naturalist and expert. It will be necessary for those carrying out pest contol to prepare themselves so that if somebody, misguidedly or otherwise, accuses them of badger digging they can explain themselves.

Those people can take certain measures to protect themselves. First, it is important for them to obtain the permission of the landowner or farmer. There may not be an obvious landowner, but they should go to the person who farms the land or who has an interest in it nearby and seek his permission, preferably in writing, to dig for foxes. The fox is a nuisance in such areas, and has to be controlled.

Secondly, one needs to have evidence as to why one is digging in the hole, such as the fact that foxes are known to be using it as an earth and working from it. Thirdly, those who dig at such holes should look carefully for signs of fresh or recent occupation by a badger. They should look for the droppings, the bedding and the disturbance of earth. They should be prepared for that, and if they find those signs, they must keep away. That is the object of the legislation—to protect the badger. If, subsequent to their starting to dig, they find any sign of a badger, they must clear off. Again, that is what we want to achieve. I strongly support all those things.

Those people would also be wise to be members of a recognised terrier club which has as its known and published rules duties to do nothing to injure the badger and to take the sort of precautions that I have mentioned. If they are challenged, they should explain their reasons at once, and if it is wrongly put to them that it is a badger's sett whereas they have good reason to know that it is a fox's earth, they should make that clear to those who accost them. If they do those things, they will have nothing to fear and are unlikely to be prosecuted.

This is an emotive subject, and fears have been expressed that people might bring a misguided or even a malicious prosecution. That is a little bit of a worry, but the independent prosecution service is coming forward and by autumn 1986 it should be in being. There will be more professionalism in prosecutions at all levels. I hope that it will be made clear that those who prosecute will need to be satisfied that it was a badger's sett and that they will exercise the same proper discrimination and restraint that they should exercise in any offence. Then I do not believe that there will be too much to fear.

I should like to refer to the background, because this is an emotive subject on which many people are ignorant. We are adding a strong measure of protection for the badger to a series of Acts that already give more protection than has often been recognised or accepted.

On Second Reading I mentioned the number of prosecutions that were successful in recent years. Since then I have managed to find the figures going back to the Badgers Act 1973. Between 1974 and 1978 there was an average of 14 prosecutions every year, of which more than 10 were successful. In 1979 there were 25 prosecutions, of which 24 were successful. In 1980 there were 24 prosecutions, of which 20 were successful. In 1981 there were 39 prosecutions, of which 26 were successful. For some reason, the 1982 figures are not available. In 1983 there were 57 prosecutions of which 50 were successful. We do not have the up-to-date figures for 1984, but I know of at least 33 successful prosecutions and no failures. In relation to the argument that one has to produce a dead badger to be able to succeed, 50 per cent. of all the prosecutions to which I have referred were for attempts.

[Mr. Lyell]

That shows that in the magistrates courts there are already a great many successful prosecutions. A great deal of myth is attached to the difficulty.

I have in my hands—I shall show it privately to anybody who wishes to see it—an opinion given to me by one of the societies that is deeply involved. It shows that there is a great deal of misunderstanding about the difficulties of prosecution. The society had evidence that badgers were being set upon by dogs and being cruelly mistreated by dogs with the encouragement of five men. An eye witness saw that. Nevertheless, the society's lawyer says that those concerned could not successfully prosecute. Those facts cannot be accurate. There is the clearest possible evidence of an existing offence under section 2*(a)*. It is a serious offence of which we would all hope to see those responsible convicted. There must be deep misunderstanding among some of those who are involved in prosecutions.

Therefore, I ask for a higher standard of naturalism and higher appreciation of wildlife by those who prosecute in future. People who dig for foxes will have to take sensible measures to protect themselves. I believe that this will be a powerful measure for the protection of badgers, and I am happy to support it.

Mr. Tracey: I warmly welcome the initiative of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) in introducing this change in the law. There is no doubt at all that badger digging or pestering or baiting badgers in any way is utterly repulsive to right-thinking members of the community. I know that countrymen are deeply repelled by it. Unfortunately, many cases have shown that marauding gangs of "cowboys" from the towns and cities have been going out into the countryside to do these dreadful deeds. There is no doubt at all that the hon. Gentleman has introduced a very worthy amendment.

Having sat on the magistrates bench for a number of years, I am grateful for the compliments paid to magistrates today, but I am rather worried about the presumption of guilt before innocence that has crept into the amendment. It is a cardinal principle of our law that a person is innocent until proven guilty. My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) cited various precedents in motoring law, but from my experience as a magistrate I hope that some of the mish-mash in that area of the law will not creep into serious areas such as this. In this context, I am slightly surprised that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, whom I greatly respect and who is himself a lawyer, has allowed this instance to slip through his fingers so quietly, because I believe that lawyers should be very worried by it.

I certainly do not wish to hold up the passage of the amendment or, indeed, of the Bill, but I hope that in another place noble Lords such as the Lord Chancellor and Lord Scarman will examine this closely and perhaps, with their wisdom and expertise, produce something rather more acceptable which will be welcomed by everyone.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on his initiative in this respect. I am also grateful to the Ministers involved for taking such great pains with what I believe will ultimately be a thoroughly workable clause. It strengthens the law to protect badgers, which is what we all want.

The hon. Member for South Shields has been entirely constructive and non-political. Those who seek to use matters of this kind as a stick to beat the Government will have no satisfaction today, but those who are genuinely concerned about these matters must feel that progress has been made. Only those who seek to exploit animal welfare for their own political ends will be disappointed.

Let it not be thought that badgers reside only in the country. In many parts of London the countryside comes to the town and these beautiful animals can exist there, too, but barely so. In my constituency there are badger setts not only in Richmond park but on the land that I share with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. There are also badgers on a stretch of urban land. I shall not mention the location in view of the activities of perverse people who, despite the law, will try to kill anything that moves—the kind of people who shoot at swans with crossbows, and throw darts at dogs and cats and at the deer in Richmond park.

It may be suggested that London has no interest in wildlife but a growing proportion of the population, which is still more than 6 million, feel passionately about animal welfare. More and more children now appreciate the importance of wildlife and even of the badgers within our towns and are anxious to know more about conservation and the protection of animals. I am glad that so many schools now teach children about conservation matters and I am grateful to the RSPCA for its constructive help in this respect.

I wish particularly to commend the London Wildlife Trust. The hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and for Peckham (Ms. Harman) are vice-presidents of that trust with me. It is a constructive, all-party group trying to preserve the flora and fauna within the capital in spite of the commercial pressures that are always there to clear and build on open urban land. The trust is composed not of extremists but of people who wish constructively to redress the balance of extreme exploitation in our cities.

These amendments are welcome on a day when the RSPCA announced that cases of cruelty to animals increased by 30 per cent. last year. The clause as amended is stronger and puts the onus the right way round—on those who act in a thoroughly suspicious and uncivilised manner. It does not put the onus on the state to prove such behaviour. It answers the demands of many of my constituents, who join me in welcoming any attempt to reduce man's cruelty to animals.

1.30 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: I hope that the Bill will pass today and will soon be law. The only reason that many of my colleagues have left for their constituencies today is that they know that on Wednesday an all-party agreement was reached on the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). Without doubt, it will be approved and it is to be welcomed. The difficult and complicated negotiations have produced progress. I hope that many thousands in this country, both urban and rural dwellers, will welcome what we have done and will help us in future to do even more to ensure that the wildlife habitat is better preserved every year.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) for putting fully on record what happened. Some hard and unfair things have been said in some of the outside lobbying. Some of the people who write those things, while they may care about badgers, do not appear to care about the morality of being unfair to people. That is up to them, but it is exceedingly bad lobbying to proceed in such a way. The result of such lobbying is that my right hon. and hon. Friends, when they hear about proposals for improvements in animal welfare, do not wish to get involved with those people because they feel that they will tell lies about what is intended and publish misleading pamphlets. They feel that it is not worth the candle, and that there will be no gain to anybody from proceeding with such improvements. That is why such behaviour is incompetent lobbying as well as being unfair and wicked.

We have heard some good speeches this morning. I particularly commend the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) who is rapidly establishing himself as one of the leading animal welfare campaigners. He made a number of fair points and covered the ground. He explained clearly why the clause is a major step forward.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), I am a magistrate and grateful for today's kind words about them. Magistrates are rarely misled about anything. My hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) made an important point, backed up by my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton, about whether change in the law in this way is right. However important and emotive the issue, it is essential that we should not be pushed into writing bad law. My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North gave one previous precedent for the change of onus of proof and I have a couple more which I hope will encourage my hon. Friends the Members for Solihull and for Surbiton. They fit the changes that we are making today.

The first comes from the Prevention of Corruption Act 1916. Section 2 provides:

"Where . . . it is proved that any money, gift, or other consideration has been paid or given to or received by a person . . . or agent of a person, holding or seeking to obtain a contract from His Majesty . . . consideration shall be deemed to have been paid or given and received corruptly . . . unless the contrary is proved."

That is a powerful precedent.

Section 1 of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953, about the carrying of offensive weapons, says:

"Any person who without lawful authority or reasonable excuse, the proof whereof shall lie on him, has with him in any public place any offensive weapon shall be guilty of an offence".

That is a little comparable to the cases that will have to be proved in a court under this Bill. I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton that a matter of this importance which affects wildlife will not have escaped the attention of my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor who has vetted it closely.

We have brought before the House, as was always our intention, a clause that represents good law. It will provide additional protection for the badger. I thank my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department for having put on record all the facts. The House can be proud of the work that it has done today for the protection of the badger.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 2, in page 1, line 9 leave out from beginning to end of line 18 and insert—

'(b) before subsection (2) there shall be inserted—

"(1A) If, in any proceedings for an offence under subsection (1) above consisting of attempting to kill, injure or take a badger, there is evidence from which it could reasonably be concluded that at the material time the accused was attempting to kill, injure or take a badger, he shall be presumed to have been attempting to kill, injure or take a badger unless the contrary is shown.".'.

No. 3, in page 1, line 18 at end insert—

'(2) Section 2 of the Badgers Act 1973 (digging for badgers etc.) shall be amended as follows—

(a) before "If" there shall be inserted "(1)";

(b) at the end there shall be added—

"(2) If, in any proceedings for an offence under subsection (1)(c) above, there is evidence from which it could reasonably be concluded that at the material time the accused was digging for a badger, he shall be presumed to have been digging for a badger unless the contrary is shown.".'.—[Dr. David Clark.]

Clause 2

NOTIFICATION OF AREAS OF SPECIAL SCIENTIFIC INTEREST

Sir John Farr: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 2, line 6 leave out 'three' and insert 'six'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 6, in page 2, line 14 leave out 'nine' and insert 'twelve'.

No. 7, in page 2, line 27 leave out 'nine' and insert 'twelve'.

Sir John Farr: These three amendments relate to section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) has substantially amended section 28 of the 1981 Act which has been said to be a defective provision relating to sites of special scientific interest. In certain respects, the 1981 Act may be defective. There are defects in section 28 and I congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields for incorporating a clause which, in the view of a number of hon. Members, provides the main reason for the Bill. Such questions as badgers and the Forestry Commission are very important but what is critically needed is a tightening up of the legislation relating to sites of special scientific interest.

The purpose of my three amendments is to extend the period during which a person who has been notified of an area of special scientific interest can consult and prepare his representations about that notification. The recipient has only three months in which to make a considered response. I know that the hon. Member for South Shields wishes to be fair. Therefore, I must point out to him that three months is a ludicrously short period. In my constituency there are farmers who employ no farm workers. At certain times of the year, therefore, they are working flat out and would be unable to respond to a notification from the Nature Conservancy Council. This might happen during lambing and probably at harvest time. A three-month period is unfair. It would be very difficult for a small farmer, a smallholder or landowner who received such a notification to respond within three months.

[Sir John Farr]

The Bill will block that loophole, but the recipient should be allowed a longer period within which to respond. Therefore, I have suggested in amendment No. 5 that he should be given six months in which to respond.

Amendments Nos. 6 and 7 give the Nature Conservancy Council a little more time to make a response and final decision. At the moment the Bill gives a period of nine months and I am suggesting 12 months. Although I have not entered into formal consultations with the Nature Conservancy Council, I understand unofficially that such a lengthening of the time would not be unacceptable.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand the intentions of my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) in lengthening the various time scales, but the proposed amendment to subsection (2) to increase the time for representations is unnecessary because the three-month period is a minimum. It is left to the good sense of the NCC not to seek quick responses from farmers at the times of year when they are under most pressure. Sufficient flexibility has been built in and we do not need to establish a longer minimum period.

My hon. Friend's amendments to subsection (4A) to lengthen the time for consultations from nine to 12 months run the danger of prolonging matters and we do not want to do that without good reason. It might be thought helpful in a general way to allow more time for objections and consultations, but such changes could mean up to a year of uncertainty before the resolution of a particular situation. That could be particularly trying to an owner or occupier of land, especially in the event of a notification finally being withdrawn or inconclusively lapsing.

There are possible gains from the amendments but they could only be obtained at the price of a good deal of delay and a general slowing down of the process of notification of an SSSI. As the clause, which we all welcome and which is in one sense where we started, is generally agreed, I ask my hon. Friend not to press his amendments on this occasion, although I understand why he has moved them.

Sir John Farr: I have listened to what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has had to say. I hope that there will be an opportunity on another occasion to consider afresh the matter and the evidence that I have. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3

Maps of National Parks

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 4, line 39, at end insert—

'(2A) In subsection (1)(b), for the words from "at" to "year)," there shall be substituted "at intervals of not more than five years".'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 12.

Mr. Waldegrave: This pair of amendments relates to the timetable governing the preparation and review of the maps which the national park authorities would be required to produce under section 43 of the 1981 Act as amended by clause 3.

Under the terms of the Government amendment accepted in Committee, the clause extends the scope of the maps to other areas in addition to moor and heath and requires that they be prepared and reviewed in line with guidelines issued by the Countryside Commission after consultation.

At present the clause carries forward the requirements of section 43 for the maps to be prepared within two years of commencement and reviewed at 12-monthly intervals thereafter. It would be more sensible to extend that timetable, bearing in mind that national park authorities are effectively prevented from starting work on their maps until the Countryside Commission has issued its guidelines, and that both the initial preparation and the subsequent reviews are subject to public consultation. Accordingly, the amendments have provided for the two-year period of initial preparation to begin from the date when the Commission's guidelines are issued.

The amendments will have the added advantage of substantially reducing the call on the resources of the national park authorities by providing that subsequent reviews should be carried out at intervals of not less than five years after publication of the maps rather than annually. That will mesh in with statutory arrangements governing the review of the national park plans as laid down in schedule 17 to the Local Government Act 1972. The amendment has the support of the national park authorities, the Countryside Commission and the Council for National Parks.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir John Farr: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 5, line 16, at end insert—

'(1D) At least six months before such consultation takes place the Commission shall have prepared a list of the bodies it proposes to consult and shall have such list available for public inspection.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 11, in page 5, line 16 at end insert—

'(1E) Any body not included in the consultation exercise outlined above may apply to be consulted and such application shall be considered.'.

Sir John Farr: Amendments Nos. 10 and 11 relate to clause 3 and seek to clarify the situation relating to consultation by the Countryside Commission.

1.45 pm

Under clause 3, the proposed new subsection (1B) says that

"The Countryside Commission shall issue guidelines . . . and may from time to time revise any guidelines so issued."

Subsection (1C) says that

"Before issuing or revising any guidelines the Commission shall consult such bodies as appear to them to represent interests concerned".

The two amendments have been tabled to suggest to the House, and in particular to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), that the Bill is unusually elastic and generous towards any concern, whether public or private. There should be a little more public accountability. There should be a little more of the spirit of open government on the part of the Countryside Commission. The question of whom it consults and does not consult in arrivng at decisions is of critical importance. I have every confidence in the Countryside Commission, but there should be provisions of the sort that I have included in the amendments to show how the consultation process is carried out.

Obviously, before the Countryside Commission acts, certain bodies will be consulted, such as the local branch of the Ramblers' Association, the local CLA and the local NFU, but there might be certain other bodies which feel they have a right to express an opinion—perhaps an historic right of which the Countryside Commission might not be aware. I do not think that it is right that matters should be left entirely to the discretion of the Countryside Commission and its officers, however excellent they may be, and indeed are.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I hope that the Minister will respond positively. There are many bodies which would want to be consulted. The amendment has a good deal of support, particularly from the less nationally-based bodies. There have been errors in the past. The Forestry Commission, for example, has failed to consult adequately on its document on broadleaves in Britain. I hope that the Minister, even if he says that today is not the time and place to do it, will bear the amendment in mind. Perhaps his Department will bring something forward in the other place so that the sense of the amendments can be accepted before the Bill becomes law.

Mr. Waldegrave: I appreciate the desire of my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) to ensure that all interested bodies have an opportunity to press their case for inclusion in the consultations for which the clause provides, but I believe that the objectives can be achieved without a statutory provision on the lines suggested.

There are two quite separate consultation processes involved. The first concerns the consultations which the Countryside Commission is required to undertake before issuing or revising the guidelines for which it is responsible under the clause. The second concerns the consultations which individual national park authorities are required to undertake before preparing or revising the maps for which they are responsible.

The first of my hon. Friend's amendments relates only to the consultations by the Countryside Commission. It would effectively delay the issue of the guidelines, and thus the commencement of the map-making process, perhaps for six months or so. We do not believe that the amendment would serve a useful purpose.

I have no doubt that it will be the Countryside Commission's intention to consult all the main bodies likely to have an interest in the guidelines. If any of them are doubtful about the likelihood of their inclusion, they have only to register their interests with the Commission to be considered as consultees. Perhaps that assurance will help the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

If any hon. Members have any organisations in mind, I shall be happy to pass their names to the Countryside Commission to ensure that they are not missed.

Similarly, I am sure that the national park authorities will consider any approaches they may receive from bodies wishing to be consulted on the maps.

I am entirely with my hon. Friend in his concern to ensure that there is wide and open consultation, but I am not convinced of the need to have a statutory provision of the sort proposed to ensure that consultation takes place.

Sir John Farr: One is always inclined to think that if one speaks a little longer one might get a different reply from the Minister. However, I am impressed with what my hon. Friend has said and I hope that he will look at any evidence that I produce of malpractices or injustices.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 12, page 5, in line 22 leave out from 'date' to end of line 23 and insert 'of issue of the first guidelines under subsection (1B).'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Title

Amendment made: No 17, in line 2, leave out 'section 1' and insert 'sections 1 and 2'.—[Dr. David Clark.]

1.50 pm

Dr. David Clark: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill was brought before the House as a consensus measure. It was the result of hundreds of hours' work and was supported by amenity lobbies, the CLA and the NFU. We have had a bit of a battering en route. We made it plain at the outset that this was not a single issue Bill, and that has been a worry to a number of hon. Members at various stages.

The Bill strengthens the protection of badgers, which will meet with almost universal approval. It also strengthens the protection for sites of special scientific interest, and everybody agrees that that was badly needed. The important mapping clauses will ensure that we know which are the key areas of our national parks and that we can protect them.

The Forestry Commission has a good record in many respects, and the new duty imposed on it will add to the protection of our environment. Of course, I am disappointed that we have not persuaded the Government that a similar responsibility should be imposed on the Ministry of Agriculture. However, I hope that, in accordance with the views expressed on both sides of the House, the matter will be considered in another place.

Little mention has been made of marine nature reserves. I feel that the provision of such reserves is vital. I have had meetings with Ministers at the Department of the Environment and the issue is being watched closely. If no provision is made for marine nature reserves within the next few weeks, perhaps the other place will look at the matter.

I thank hon. Members for their contributions to an interesting series of debates.

1.52 pm

Mr. Greg Knight: I support the Bill, as amended, and I hope that it is given a fair wind in another place.

I am particularly glad that the House has supported amendments dealing with the protection of badgers. That will be warmly welcomed in Derbyshire where we have had problems. Badger setts in the county have been dug out at the rate of about one a week.

I express my appreciation of the work of the Derbyshire naturalists' trust, which has provided me with information, and I am grateful for the support of some of my hon. Friends in Derbyshire, including my hon. Friends the Members for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris), for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) and for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins).

[Mr. Greg Knight]

There was some acrimony because of leaflets which were distributed after the Committee stage, but we can all be pleased that we have got it right in increasing the protection for badgers. My only remaining wish is that the Bill should reach the statute book as soon as possible.

1.53 pm

Sir John Farr: I echo the congratulations to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) whose Bill is a notable step forward, particularly in the protection of badgers.

I know of no hon. Member who has anything but respect for badgers and a firm conviction of the need to strengthen protection for them. The badger is a bit defenceless nowadays, especially with the sonic underground listening kits which some so-called sportsmen use. The badger needs protection and help by the sort of Bill which the hon. Member for South Shields has presented.

To put it mildly, there is no desperate need for part of the Bill. We had an interesting debate on the duties of the Ministry of Agriculture.

The only other significant measure in the Bill not touched on in the debate, because of a lack of time, is the amendment to the Forestry Act 1967. In the May issue of the London Conserver, produced by the London conservation group, there were two or three pages about the fantastic record of conservation work done by the Forestry Commission in its forestry lands. There were some photographs too. I am not convinced that the Forestry Commission is lagging behind. That article suggested to me that it has a forward-looking policy on conservation, and I am not sure that any steps needed to be taken.

I congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields. He was ambitious to begin with. He is still ambitious, but I am delighted to welcome his Bill.

1,56 pm

Mr. Lyell: I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), and I congratulate the Ministers on the constructive work that they have done with the hon. Gentleman in producing the Bill. The measure represents significant advances for wildlife and the countryside. I am delighted that the three-month loophole has been closed, and I am delighted, too, with the strengthening of the law in relation to badgers. The law will now apply to the gangs who simply wander round digging recklessly at holes without any clear idea of what they want to catch. The Bill will play a real part in stopping such activities.

I am grateful for the way in which the hon. Gentleman has kept all those who are interested involved with the progress of events. I wish the Bill success in another place.

1.57 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on the progress of his Bill. My constituents will be delighted by its successful passage. After we left the Chamber following the Second Reading, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) said to me, "It is all right—we have saved the badger." However, when I started to receive letters from worried constituents, I began to have doubts. Common sense has prevailed. There has been a victory for the sensible pressure applied by people who care about animals.

The hon. Member for South Shields is one of the supporters of my Horses and Ponies Bill. I hope that later today the Government will look favourably at that Bill too.

1.58 pm

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): I offer the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) a warm and generous tribute, not only for selecting such a Bill after being successful in the ballot, but on the way in which he has conducted it. He has gained a degree of popularity which cannot last. He had better enjoy it while it does.

The hon. Gentleman has done a great service to those who love the countryside. I am sure that he will accept the good wishes of my many constituents who have taken the matter to heart. I am here to support the hon. Gentleman today. God bless the Bill and speed it on its way.

1.59 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) must be blushing, but all the plaudits are justified. He has sought the co-operation of all those who are interested. The Bill does not do as much as we would have wished, but it certainly improves the lot of badgers, ensures that SSSIs are preserved rather than ruined, allows people better to look after and enjoy the national parks, and enables people to enjoy the forests in the knowledge that conservation will be one of the guiding lights of those who deal with afforestation in Britain.

The Bill is worthy of this place. It is worthy of a more explicit and less mundane title. Perhaps it should be called "The Wildlife and Countryside (Amdt for the Better) Bill" or the "Wildlife and Countryside (Improvement and Conservation) Bill". That is what it is. We hope to improve it still further elsewhere, but even in its present form it is much to be welcomed and the hon. Member for South Shields is much to be congratulated.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am happy to join those who have wished the Bill a successful and rapid passage to the statute book. I congratulate the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on picking a subject which has enabled us to make some useful gains.

The hon. Member had the difficult task of playing a little poker and pushing us a little further than we initially wanted to go. He has persuaded the Government to take some steps, although there is no question of his having to push us on the matter of protecting badgers and the closing of loopholes. I know that he is the first to accept that.

We are pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess), who has joined us at the end of our debate. He need not have worried about the letters that he has received from his constituents. If he had heard my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department earlier today, he would have known that some of the accusations were quite groundless. We spent some time showing how irresponsible they were. My hon. Friend had nothing to worry about then, and has nothing to worry about now, and we welcome his support for the Bill.

I should like to thank some of my hon. Friends for the part that they have played in helping to negotiate through the House a Bill which has received such general assent, especially my hon. Friends the Members for Harborough

(Sir J. Farr) and for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell). I am sure that I have missed some important person, but they have played an important part in ensuring that we have a useful, positive and sensible Bill, although it is not as wide as was originally intended.

Several hon. Members have expressed hope about things which might be added in another place. That is entirely for another place, but I remind the House how fragile a ship is a private Member's Bill. Those who want to open wide arguments must assess the risk of doing that. It is difficult to avoid an animal analogy. Once the cat is out of the bag, or the badger is out of the sett, it is difficult to get it back in again. The Bill in its present form should go forward rapidly and provide useful additions to the law protecting badgers and wildlife habitat.

I have said before, but would like to repeat to the House, that the Government recognise that if there is no progress on marine nature reserves in a given time—I should say 12 to 18 months—we must have another look at the matter. I am advised that we are relatively near, with any luck, to achieving——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: What is "relatively near"?

Mr. Waldegrave: I have just said what relatively near is. If we have not achieved progress within the next 12 to 18 months, we shall have to look at the matter again.

The Bill is sensible and practical. It provides additional protection for habitats and national parks and puts an additional duty on the Forestry Commission, which it is delighted to accept. Its latest proposals and consultation papers on broadleaved deciduous woods demonstrate that. The House can be proud of the Bill. I hope that nothing, however well intentioned, interferes with its speedy and smooth passage to the statute book.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Gaming (Bingo) Bill

Considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

2.3 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), who is unavoidably unable to be present today, I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The House and many people in the country will be grateful to my hon. Friend for his work in bringing the Bill forward. It might be convenient if I remind the House of the purpose behind the Bill. It makes changes in the gaming legislation to allow licensed bingo clubs to join together for the purposes of playing games of bingo for maximum prizes of up to £50,000.

The Bill calls these bingo games "multiple bingo". The Bill has a little bit of history. Two years ago a Bill was introduced in another place by Lord Harmar-Nicholls with the same intention of seeking to help bingo clubs. As hon. Members may be aware, there has been a steady decline in the fortunes of bingo clubs in the past decade or so. The annual reports of the Gaming Board for Great Britain have made sorry reading for the bingo halls. The bingo clubs, which rightly believe that apart from generating income they also provide a useful social facility for their customers, felt increasingly handicapped in trying to compete with other forms of recreation. The advent of newspaper bingo added to their sense of concern.

To its credit, the licensed bingo industry considered what could be done positively to turn round the position in which it found itself. It came up with several ideas and it turned its mind to the possibility of fresh legislation, not because it necessarily wanted to turn to the Government for assistance but because it found that its scope for making more attractive the form of recreation that it provided was restricted by the array of controls found under the Gaming Act 1968. The authors of that legislation —this is an observation rather than a complaint—chose to deal with bingo in an analogous way to casinos, where hard gaming was available. The result has been that bingo on licensed premises—not the so-called bingo played by reading a newspaper—is subject to a great number of controls.

Among other things, the controls operate to limit the size of the prizes that may be offered. Thus, although the Gaming Act 1968 did not preclude bingo clubs from getting together in order to pool the stakes received to go towards larger prizes, the size of the prizes is pegged to £3,000 in any one week. That effectively limits the number of clubs that can profitably take part in a joint game of bingo—known as link bingo—to a handful of clubs. Most of the link games involve no more than four bingo clubs.

The Bill introduced by Lord Harmar-Nicholls sought to stem the tide flowing against bingo by amending the law to allow clubs to join together in games of bingo on a group, regional or national basis. By so doing, the clubs could offer more attractive prizes. At that stage the Government were not able to lend wholehearted support to the Bill but helpfully pointed the way towards further talks between the industry and the Gaming Board, and identified the problem areas.

The Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough proceeds on a similar basis to the earlier

[Mrs. Virginia Bottomley]

Bill debated in the other place, but benefits from the discussions that have taken place in the intervening period. I trust that today my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will be able to confirm that the Government are content for the Bill to make further progress and, in anticipation of that happy outcome, I thank him on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough for the co-operative and constructive approach that the Home Office has adopted towards it.

The Bill provides for multiple games of bingo to be played within a predetermined period on licensed premises for a number of prizes, none of which may exceed £50,000. That figure represents a useful increase in the prizes that may be offered in bingo in this country, but no one can surely regard it as excessive. It does not compare with the prizes offered by some of the other activities with which bingo must compete, such as the football pools or newspaper bingo, and I remind the House that with bingo the prizes are offered in return for a modest stake. Moreover, the amount of money which may be asked of players is tightly regulated along with the conditions under which games of bingo are conducted.

The remainder of the Bill puts in place a system of control so that games of multiple bingo are organised or co-ordinated in a way that accords with the standards demanded by the Gaming Board.

I hope that hon. Members will agree that the bingo industry deserves the modest boost which this Bill seeks to provide. It is not so long ago that bingo was providing a form of social recreation for average daily attendances of 500,000 people. We all know that those who tend to look at bingo for their enjoyment are not ideally placed to find other forms of recreation. There are more than 9 million pensioners in this country, two thirds of whom are women. A recent survey found that 85 per cent. of those who enjoyed bingo were women, and that the average age was about 52.

I believe that this Bill will make a substantial contribution towards alleviating one of the difficulties of old age. For the most part, we cope with health problems and financial hardship in old age, but loneliness and isolation are very difficult to overcome. The Bill will make a significant contribution to the leisure of people in that age group. I remind the House that the bingo industry provides a source of employment for thousands of members of staff and, through the levying of duty on bingo, a source of revenue for the Government.

With those words of explanation on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough, I ask the House to give the Bill a Third Reading.

2.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): It was with great pleasure that I listened to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley). I am most grateful to her for stepping into the breach created by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), who is unavoidably absent today. The House will want to congratulate him and my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West on steering the Bill through its parliamentary stages. He was drawn 19th in the ballot — not the easiest position. However, the Bill is here. He must have had some help. I think that the benevolent smiles on the faces of the organisers of our business prove that, so we should not forget them when handing out praise.

The Home Office supports the Bill and the purposes behind it. It will allow bingo clubs to join together in much larger numbers than has previously been possible and allow them to offer more attractive prizes. The Bill represents a second attempt in recent years to give effect to that intention. On the last occasion, a few years ago, when a Bill was debated in another place, the Government felt the need to be a great deal more cagey and circumspect. I am happy to say that many of those reservations have now melted away.

The first point of which we have had to take account has been the decline that has bedevilled the bingo industry in recent years. Attendances have fallen, clubs have closed — and are continuing to close — and the trade, quite naturally, wishes to stem the decline of the past 10 years. One does not have to be an avid bingo player to share some of the sadness of the trade at the pattern of decline. I do not suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West is a regular denizen of her local bingo club, any more than is my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough.

No one should doubt the importance of bingo in the lives of a good many people, especially women, in the community. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West brought out that point from her experience of social work in the community. For many people, a weekly or twice-weekly visit to a local bingo club provides a priceless form of recreation. The bingo club provides not only an interest but a useful meeting place away from home. Of course, there is also the attraction of winning a prize, which adds to the interest.

The decline of bingo, by itself, would not be a reason to pass legislation. Part of the reason that we thought that the time had come for legislation lies in the way in which the attempt to clamp down on the excesses of commercial gaming in the 1960s — embodied in the 1968 Act — sought to deal with bingo at the same time as casino gaming. Therefore, bingo found itself bound up with a licensing system and a very detailed network of control. Inevitably, its ability to compete with other forms of leisure is impaired by the fact that it must observe the rules over almost every aspect of bingo.

We took account of what some regard as the rather hard position in which bingo finds itself because of the inevitably difficult decisions that the Government must take about other forms of gaming. I am sure that I do not need to persuade the House that they need to be the subject of rigorous control. That is why I make no apology for the controls.

The Bill proposes an amendment that would allow clubs to choose to join together in games of multiple bingo, and prizes of up to £50,000 could be offered from the aggregated stake money. We have had to look at the issue with care, and a good deal of discussion remains ahead about the way in which games of multiple bingo will be played. We are aware of fruitful talks that have been held between the gaming board and people who might be responsible for running games of multiple bingo. They have cleared up many questions that were initially in our minds when we had to determine whether to permit the practice to go ahead.

Now that we have a better idea of how games of multiple bingo will be played, it is clear that we are talking about a grander version of what is known as linked bingo, which may already be played under the provisions of the Gaming Act 1968. Multiple bingo will be played at a specified time each evening and involve the use of a central computer, with each of the participating bingo clubs having its own terminal. Bingo clubs wishing to take part in a game of multiple bingo for that evening will indicate their intention to participate by means of the computer equipment.

There is still some way to go before the joint games of bingo contemplated by the Bill may be played in practice. It will be necessary for representatives of the bingo clubs to have further talks with the Gaming Board so that the board may be satisfied with the proposed arrangements and can issue a certificate of approval. The Home Secretary will want to consider, after consultation with the board, what regulations should be made under the Bill. I believe that such obstacles can easily be pushed aside.

I am delighted to support the Third Reading of the Bill. We believe that the measure incorporates a number of safeguards and that it may, therefore, safely proceed to the statute book. We hope that the further negotiations prove successful and that games of multiple bingo played in accordance with the terms of the Bill will provide the assistance that the bingo clubs are seeking.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Official Secrets Act (Amendment) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.16 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Government are in a mess over section 2 of the Official Secrets Act. They used it last year to bring a prosecution against Sarah Tisdall and were successful in that prosecution. They then used it to bring a prosecution against my constituent, Mr. Clive Ponting, and, fortunately, they were unsuccessful. The Old Bailey verdict in that case represents a tribute to the good sense of a British jury. The upshot of that decision is that the Government are in a complete fix about whether they can use section 2 of the Act.

In the case of Cathy Massiter, who revealed detailed evidence about what was happening in MI5, the Government decided not to prosecute. The Government investigated the case of Lord Lewin, and decided not to prosecute. Having considered the case of Commander Wreford-Brown, the commander of the Conqueror, who revealed details of the Conqueror's course long before the information was declassified, they decided not to prosecute.

All of that is evidence that the Government do not know what to do about official secrets, and particularly about any proposed or considered use of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act. By introducing the Bill I am doing the Government a favour, for I am seeking to remove the problem from them by removing section 2 from the statute book.

Section 2 has been widely criticised—for example, by the Franks committee long ago, by a series of eminent judges and lawyers and by the present Home Secretary —of course, when in opposition—who described it as indefensible. It has also been criticised in many letters that I have received since laying the Bill before the House. One which may be of interest to hon. Members was from Mr. Chapman Pincher. He wrote to me at the beginning of February to say:

"Dear Mr. Smith,

I wish you well with your Bill to abolish Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act. It is 13 years since I gave evidence on that issue to the Franks Committee and successive governments have done absolutely nothing."

The Bill is an attempt to ensure that the House of Commons will seek to do something; to tackle a problem which Governments of all political persuasions — we should remember that it was a Liberal Government who brought in the Official Secrets Act — have failed to tackle.

The basic points that must be made are simple. Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act is an absurdity. It is a catch-all section which covers every piece of paper that crosses any civil servant's desk, any information to which a civil servant is privy, any details about where, how or on what he is working. It is quite simply nonsense that a civil servant should be subject to potential criminal prosecution for revealing details of any sort whatsoever about his work. The common examples which have been quoted frequently in the House stand as testimony to that absurdity.

For example, it is an offence under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act to reveal information about where the tea comes from that is supplied to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food canteen. It is also an offence to receive that information. It is nonsense that we should have on the statute book a piece of legislation which covers every detail about what civil servants do.

[Mr. Chris Smith]

More importantly, the Official Secrets Act is more insidious than that. It is not just an absurdity that it has such a catch-all nature and effect. It is also a dangerous piece of legislation because it can be, and has been, used by Governments—again of both political persuasions, but particularly this Government—for political purposes. If the Government do not like what a civil servant has done or said, even though that doing or saying may have had no genuine impact whatever on national security, simply because they are politically embarrassed, they may decide to use section 2 for their own political purposes. I believe that that is what happened in the case of my constituent, Mr. Ponting. I fear that we still have on the statute book an Act which enables Governments to proceed in that manner. It is for that major reason—the political danger of having that measure on the statute book—that I wish to see section 2 removed.

I hope that in the brief time available the House will not simply allow the measure to be talked out, because it is a serious issue. It is an issue of major public concern, and many Governments have failed over many years to do something about it.

In introducing the Bill I am offering the House an opportunity to clear the decks of this long-discredited piece of legislation. I know that the next Labour Government will do so, but I hope that this Government will be a bit more enlightened on this issue than many others and bring forward some of their own proposals. In place of section 2 we need a much tighter definition of national security and espionage, with which section 1 purports to deal, but does so ineffectively.

At the same time, we need to replace this highly discredited piece of legislation with full and proper freedom of information legislation to open up the over-secretive processes of government in this country.

In that spirit, I commend this very simple, direct and proper Bill to the House. I hope that it will be overwhelmingly supported and read a Second time.

2.24 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) is certainly right in saying that his Bill could not be shorter or more straightforward. It consists of just two clauses, the first of which reads:

"Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 is hereby repealed."

The second reads:

"This Act may be cited as the Official Secrets Act (Amendment) Act 1985."

For 15 to 20 years successive Governments have been bedevilled by the problem of how to erect a modern mechanism for the protection of official secrets and have found it difficult to arrive at a conclusive answer. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, however, is not a man for the half tones, the half lights or the subtleties of the situation. He simply comes in with his size 15 boots and says, "Just throw the whole thing out and end the problem." The hon. Gentleman's approach reminds me of the late Professor Maitland's observation that for every complex human problem there is an answer that is simple, plausible, easy, obvious and wrong. We can rely on the hon. Gentleman's unerring instinct for the wrong answer to bring him here with a measure of this kind, and he will not be offended if I say that it provided a light conclusion to a heavy morning's legislation on badgers, bingo and the like to hear him put the case with such spurious charm for a measure which is no more attractive to me than it would have been to the last Labour Government.

If the hon. Gentleman's Bill were enacted, section 2 of the Official Secrets Act would be repealed and the improper disclosure of official information could be dealt with only under section 1. Subsection (1) of that section provides for it to be an offence:

"If any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State—approaches or is in the neighbourhood of, or enters any prohibited place", a provision which clearly does not concern us in this instance, or:

"makes any sketch, plan, model, or note which is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be . . . useful to an enemy", which is the classic case of spying.

The third and final part of subsection (1) makes it an offence if any person

"for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State . . . obtains, collects, records, or publishes, or communicates to any other person any secret official code word, or pass word, or any sketch, plan, model, article, or note, or other document or information which is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be . . . useful to an enemy".

I have quoted those provisions to illustrate the fact that section 1 protects documents only if they are disclosed

"for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State" and only if the disclosure is "calculated to be or might be or is intended to be . . . useful to an enemy".

In other words, it is a fairly narrow offence intended to deal only with spying and related activities.

No responsible Government—far be it from me to speculate about whether some future Labour Government would be responsible, such a circumstance being likely to arise so far in the future, if ever—could accept that section 1 should stand alone, because grave damage could be inflicted even if the information would not be useful to an enemy or was not disclosed for a purpose prejudical to the interests of the state.

I cannot believe that the hon. Gentleman is really suggesting that any unauthorised disclosure not falling within the narrow ambit of section 1 should not be addressed by the criminal law. What of the person who reveals information entrusted to us in confidence by the Government of another state? What of the person who releases information likely to be useful in the commission of an offence? What of the person who releases documents revealing confidential commercial information or personal details given by individuals in the expectation that they will be held in confidence? Does the hon. Gentleman really believe that the criminal law has no part to play in those serious cases?

The hon. Gentleman might well ask whether we could not rely on internal disciplinary measures, and there are instances where these are sufficient. Equally, there are cases where they are not. Furthermore, the sanction which is so often mentioned in this context, the sacking of the perpetrator of the unauthorised disclosure, can, by definition, be directed only against those currently in the public service. However, it is not only those who are currently in the public service who might be possessed of information which could fall into any of the serious categories.

If the hon. Gentleman were to have his way, no sanctions could be applied either against people who have left the public service or against those, such as Government contractors, who have never been in the public service, because some of those——

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday 14 June.

Marina (Ilfracombe)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): A short while ago, we gave a Third Reading to the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill. It was a pleasure to be in the House to support the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), whose Bill is important to my part of the world. I congratulate him because the preservation of the countryside is of paramount importance to Members with constituencies such as mine, which includes Ilfracombe and Exmoor, about which I shall speak.

It is now nearly three years since the Ilfracombe harbour extension became the keystone of my policy for my constituency. No one is in any doubt about the natural beauty of Ilfracombe or the unnatural decline in its business and industrial position. This is the third time that I have had the honour of bringing this matter before the House. I look forward to the reply of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who was gracious enough to reply to my debate a few months ago.

I have never seen the logic in seeking to make a seaside town such as Ilfracombe into a factory-based industrial centre. It is good to have factories, but equally it is clear that any firm locating a factory so far from its market, and probably from its raw materials, will always have difficulty in justifying that factory when times are hard. I congratulate Pall Europe, Coutant Electronics and several less-known firms who work hard, employ staff and prosper in Ilfracombe and the adjacent areas. We must consider how best the resuscitation of the economy can come about, while, equally importantly, the natural beauty and the pleasure of living in Ilfracombe are not harmed.

My conclusions are straightforward. We have the sea, we have the seashore and the beautiful hinterland from Lee to Berrynarbor and back over to Exmoor. It is on this natural beauty that we should build for the future. Development must be related to sea, to shore and to things that can be harvested from land or sea. This includes factory and industrial premises, but they will be an adjunct to the sea and the shore rather than the main employer of the future. Tourism is as much a harvest of land or sea as is farming or fishing.

I congratulate the North Devon district council—the EEC is also involved—on accepting the problem and putting its hand into its pocket to commission the Coopers and Lybrand report and for taking a positive stance over the issues raised. I was disappointed in parts of the report and do not accept in particular its low forecast of marina income. I congratulate the Ilfracombe town council on its support, and organisations such as the hoteliers and the guest house associations, which have been of the greatest help to me. I also thank the many grant-aided bodies which have spoken and offered help, provided—as always—that someone else does something on the way along.

If Ilfracombe is to expand the harbour must be expanded. I have carried out surveys along the English side of the Bristol channel and on the Welsh coast. There is no form of major safe harbour or marina development anywhere along the northern coasts of Somerset, Devon and Cornwall. Organisations as disparate as the Royal National Lifeboat Institute, which does not have a sea berth for a lifeboat in the area, and the Swansea city council, which has a marina but nowhere to sail to on our side, wish that we had a marina in Ilfracombe. There are some minor boating and fishing facilities but nothing that touches the potential of Ilfracombe or its potential harvest from the sea.

The first requirement is a harbour extension and an inner harbour which does not dry out. Then as night follows day, or in this case perhaps I should say as light follows dark, all the good things will follow to help Ilfracombe through into the 21st century. In 1984 the English tourist board produced, in conjunction with Wallace Evans and Partners, "The Study of North Devon and Somerset Yacht Harbours". The conclusion was that Ilfracombe would be the most desirable place for a major scheme.

We need a marina for 250 boats; harbour facilities for fishing boats, pleasure craft and ferries; harbour facilities for commercial and private fishing; and all the ancillary services to serve the new maritime extension to Ilfracombe: hotels, restaurants and allied developments to cope with all these new features. Shops, workshops and warehouse facilities will be needed. This will result in jobs, jobs and more jobs for our people. It will mean not just jobs for sailors from elsewhere, but jobs for young people in the docks, on the boats, in the shops and workshops. It will mean jobs for the young, including those without special skills, who will revel in the healthy, open-air life. It will also mean jobs for older people, including those who are possibly less skilled. There will be a great need for people to tend the shops, maintain the equipment and, not least, guard the premises. It will result in jobs in both existing and new firms.

Prosperity will not come from talk. If it did, every hon. Member would be a millionaire. None of this is a pipe dream. All of it is readily attainable, but, first, we need the will to carry out the work and, secondly, an organisation which can pull together the strings of economic Ilfracombe, beautiful Ilfracombe and environmental Ilfracombe, not forgetting the residents of Ilfracombe, so that neither commerce nor conservation reigns supreme but work together for a harmonious and prosperous future.

The loss of development status was a heavy blow to Ilfracombe but, although useful, it was never the key. To some extent it may have been the lock on our minds, as we sought grants when we ought to have sought opportunities. My believe is that the way forward is to find that genuine, good body which has the experience and the reputation to be acceptable not only to the population of north Devon but to the economic and environmental bodies in the great world outside. I do not believe that such a body is impossible to find. On the contrary, I have spoken to a number of organisations which might fill the Bill.

Today I am happy to be able to announce publicly for the first time that one organisation which is interested in helping fills my bill entirely. The trustees of the Dartington North Devon Trust decided last week that they wished to help Ilfracombe, if at all possible. I welcome their support with open arms. Dartington is well known and respected in the west country. In north Devon in particular the Dartington North Devon Trust has done a great deal to help us with youth training and many other projects, both social and economic. I pay special tribute to Dr. David Davies, the director of the trust. It is no coincidence that a man of his calibre should have been appointed to the Warnock commission.

A first meeting was held in this House between Dartington "chieftains", the chairman and the chief executive of the North Devon district council and myself some weeks ago. I believe that it will prove to have been a fruitful meeting. But the trust is by no means the only body that is interested. I hope that other commercial interests, including marina operators, which have been in touch with me will join us in the battle for prosperity. The locally based Ilfracombe and North Devon Heritage Wall Committee, soon to become a trust, I hope, has received substantial pledges of cash support and has, in turn, promised that this money will be made available to help build the harbour wall. Mr. Alan Kift, who originally brought to me the concept of the Ilfracombe initiative, and Mr. Nigel Vince are among the main sponsors of this committee. I pay tribute to them and to their fellow committee members, Mr. Peter Rawle and Councillor Ron Green. Councillor Green, who owns the Harcourt hotel, has offered free accommodation to an interested group of investors. Those men typify the hard workers of Ilfracombe. I must not fail them, and nor must the committee.

There is no shortage of well wishers. Devon county council, North Devon district council and Ilfracombe town council will support us. I trust that the British Tourist Association will sell us overseas and that the English tourist board and the West Country tourist board will participate. Locally, the North Devon Manufacturers' Association is one of the best, if not the best, of such organisations. Various chambers of commerce and trade and many other excellent voluntary organisations will help.

As I said earlier, the RNLI would like a water berth for its lifeboat. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food must surely approve of a decent fish quay and fish landing facilities and the Welsh tourist board — yes, Welsh — would wish to see a port on our side of the Bristol channel. Lovely Lundy Island needs a port of embarkation for visitors, and Exmoor national park will get welcome tourists from across the water in Wales.

The list of those who can offer support is almost endless. There is the Countryside Commission, the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas, which has done so much to help in our part of the world, English Industrial Estates, builders of many local light factory developments, and the Sports Council, which will provide the water sports in the extended harbour.

The Department of Trade and Industry will be involved as we improve both the trade and industry of the whole area. As we improve the environment the Department of the Environment, too, must come to us. If the next step is to find an organisation to research and put together a package, along the line somewhere finance will be needed from within the area. I understand that the Government cannot provide everything for everybody.

The sea wall extension in itself will not earn money. I praise the efforts of the Heritage Wall committee which will help us and which has pledged money running into tens of thousands of pounds. That shows the extent of local support and so far that support is still local. I am prepared to subscribe to whatever development corporation or company takes up the challenge and I believe that many others will do the same as well, with faith in the project and hope for an ultimate dividend.

It may be that whoever builds the sea wall, if we cannot get national or international Government to do the work for us, or at least subscribe considerably, may also have to be given the right to some part of the rewards from the business that will follow, perhaps through a right to marina, hotel or fish quay development. In a commercial world, those who give their time and effort are entitled to a fair reward.

I am in constant contact with the most important body in the whole matter—the North Devon district council. It controls the harbour and owns much of the adjacent land. It is a good council, full of truly independent men and women of all political shades. It is now up to that council to decide what priority and, in due course, how much finance it may be able to make available for Ilfracombe.

I look forward to the day when one ferry will be back from Swansea as another leaves for Lundy. I look forward to the day when trawlers will be landing fish for sale or for processing at Mullacott Cross. I look forward to the day when young people can carry on water sports in the extended outer harbour as the older generation perhaps watches from seats around the harbour. I look forward to the day when the tourists come to mess about in boats in the inner harbour, buying their food, fuel and sails from the traders of Ilfracombe, while the young people of Ilfracombe work to support the fun and the finances of that lovely town and the surrounding areas, all of which will benefit, from Exmoor to Barnstaple, from the success of Ilfracombe harbour.

Finally, and from my side, I look forward to the arrival of the link road, far more important than all the development grants, together with the improvement of the road from the motorway up over Blackmoor Gate and the A39 from the Exmoor side as well.

We are awaiting a ministerial pronouncement on stage 2A of the inquiry into that road. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to help on that because the decision is overdue. That on stage 2B from South Molton to Barnstaple should be with us by the end of the year and work completed around 1988.

There are so many national, provincial, local and statutory bodies that may be able to help, without mentioning the EEC social and regional funds.

The Department of the Environment has responsibility for environmental management, regional affairs, environmental protection, and sport and recreation. Ilfracombe is not within the Exmoor National Park but is, as agreed by the National Parks Authority and the English tourist board, an integral part of the park economy.

The Department of Trade and Industry is responsible for regional assistance under the Industry Act, regional policy, tourism, and small firms. Would not Ilfracombe make an ideal enterprise zone. Many departments are involved—the Department of Transport and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The problem is, which will be responsible?

The fish quay and fish landing facilities might qualify for grants under section 2 of the Fisheries Act 1955. The tourism part might receive aid from the English tourist board, for which the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is responsible, although the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry deals with the subject.

Surprisingly, there are no specific grants that I can find available from the Department of Employment for starting a project which will improve employment. It might be possible to employ people on the youth training scheme or the community programme. Whether the EEC can help, now that we are no longer receiving regional funds, I do not know, but I believe that the EEC has been asked by the district council—it did so in time, by the end of March—to see whether funds can be made available to help Ilfracombe's fine but somewhat derelict pier, which is an integral part of the harbour.

The grants system is so complex that it is possible that in some way other grants might be available which I have been unable to find. Whoever takes up the job of "umbrella" man or woman to the project, with a base in Ilfracombe town, and employment for, say, two years, will have to take up the many and varied ideas that have been floated, to discuss their finance, to check on environmental considerations, and to seek prospective developers.

I ask the Minister to give me some assurance on the Government's attitude to this essay in self-help. Will he list now—or later in correspondence, if the list is too long—where we may look for help and whether the Government will look with favour on our request?

I am proud to represent an area which is fiercely proud and independent, where we Devonians have been joined by many "incomers" from up country, and where we all work together for the health and harmony of our most beautiful part of Britain.

As a footnote for the Minister — we entered the House together on the same day; he is a young man—I should like to say that, thanks to the Outlandos trust, founded by the Police pop group, and chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen), a generous award has just been given to the Ilfracombe youth and community centre to help with the purchase of musical instruments. I am delighted that arrangements are in hand for me to make the presentation. But I offer my hon. Friend the promise that, if he can help us, we shall serenade him on his next visit to Ilfracombe. Since the money is funded by the Police, perhaps their hit single, "Message in a bottle" would be the appropriate tune. I look to the Minister to be tuneful and helpful to a good area.

2.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. David Trippier): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) on his speech, and on his customary diligence in raising important matters which affect his constituency. As he has indicated, the various matters that he has drawn to the attention of the House traverse a number of Government Departments, including my own. I shall endeavour to cover as many points as I can in the time available to me. In any event, I give him an undertaking that I will draw the attention of the various Departments to the subjects which have been raised in the debate.

Since the Government published the White Paper on "Regional Industrial Policy" in December 1983, I have been impressed by the enthusiasm with which the people of north Devon have drawn to the attention of Ministers the problems of Ilfracombe and the ambitions and plans that they have for the town's future. I venture to say, however, that enthusiasm needs to be generated and nurtured. That has been done in no small measure by their representative in this House, my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North, whose advocacy on behalf of his constituents is second to none. They are indeed fortunate to have such an able and tenacious MP. He saw my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, last December and has managed to secure three debates on the subject in just over two years. As a result of those debates, and the dozens of letters received from his constituents, Ministers can honestly say that they are fully aware of the problems of the area.

My hon. Friend has drawn my attention to the economic study of Ilfracombe and the associated feasibility study of packages of schemes which might be promoted in or around Ilfracombe, and which was commissioned by the North Devon district council. I have seen the final copy of the report, and the number of schemes put forward for consideration by the council is very impressive and ambitious.

A seaside resort containing such facilities as a fishing quay, winter gardens, cable car, first-class hotel and other facilities would, I am sure, be attractive to many people but, like most things in life, as my hon. Friend has implied, such schemes do not come cheaply, and finances have to be secured.

The five possible options put forward in the report each contain different combinations of the schemes assessed. The common factor in them is that all have a grant element of one form or another written into costings. That is not a bad thing, provided, of course, that grants are available, but, as my hon. Friend has pointed out on numerous occasions, access to grants from the European Regional Development Fund was lost — except during the transitional period—when the Barnstaple and Ilfracombe travel-to-work area lost its assisted area status.

In four of the options, it would appear that if grants were not available the packages would fail on purely financial grounds, but interestingly one package appears to be financially viable even if no grants were available. Admittedly, that option excludes the marina scheme which I understand from the report would be extremely popular with local people.

My hon. Friend has stated today and on a number of other occasions that there should be a good road link from the M5 motorway to the north Devon coast. The proposed north Devon link road, together with the planned bypasses of Barnstaple and Bideford, will provide an excellent route.

The first stage of the A361 of the north Devon link road between the M5 at Sampford Peverell and Tiverton has been open to traffic for just over a year, and progress is being made on the other two stages of the link road.

A public inquiry was held in the early part of last year into stage 2A of the link road between Tiverton and Newtown. The inspector's report following the inquiry was delivered towards the end of October 1984 and is under consideration. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Environment hope to announce their decision shortly.

My hon. Friend will be aware also that the public inquiry into stage 2B of the link road, between Newtown and Barnstaple, was concluded last month. The report of the inspector is awaited.

Proposals for the A39 Barnstaple bypass similarly were the subject of a public inquiry and my hon. Friend may know that the inspector's report was submitted last month and is being considered.

My hon. Friend has stated the importance of tourism in Ilfracombe and I accept that tourism there has been in decline for a number of years and the town is currently one of the most depressed of the south-west's traditional seaside resorts, with relatively poor facilities and accommodation. A further erosion of its market position is likely if steps cannot be taken to reverse the decline and, against that background, I understand the district council attaches considerable importance to the harbour and marine proposal which it sees as a catalyst for revitalising the local industry and attracting new investment from the private sector.

The council has been in touch with the non-statutory West Country tourist board to discuss its proposal and the WCTB agrees that a major tourism development is necessary if Ilfracombe is to have a brighter future as a resort town. Funds for the section 4 tourism grant scheme administered by the English tourist board are limited and, although some help might be available via the scheme for individual elements of the development, I accept that it could not provide a material contribution towards the cost of the harbour project as a whole.

On a more positive note, the Government will continue to provide support for the area's tourism industry through its funding of the statutory English tourist board's promotional and development activities, including the scheme of selective financial assistance for tourism projects which the board administers under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969. As I have said, the West Country tourist board has already had contact with north Devon concerning the proposed harbour and marina project and will be happy to provide advice on any other development proposals that the council and local entrepreneurs may have.

A number of local tourism projects have also benefited directly from assistance under the section 4 scheme. Since the scheme was extended to the whole of England in August 1982, grant offers totalling £154,700 have been made to 21 tourist projects in north Devon.

My hon. Friend has spoken of the desirability of reviving the fishing industry around Ilfracombe and I should like therefore to explain about the aid available from the FEOGA farm fund. The aid is available for investment projects which improve the conditions under which agricultural and fisheries products are processed and marketed. To be eligible, projects must meet the conditions laid down in EC regulation 355/77 and must involve investment facilities covered by programmes submitted by member states and approved by the Commission. New fisheries programmes for England and Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland respectively have been submitted to the Commission and are awaiting approval.

The scheme is discretionary and if a project is successful it will receive up to 25 per cent. of eligible costs from the EEC. The Commission selects for aid those projects which most closely meet the aims of the scheme and awards are made, by the Commission, twice a year. I should emphasise that an important condition of the scheme is that work should not have started on the project before the Commission acknowledges receipt of the application. Grant cannot be awarded for work already started.

I am informed by my colleagues in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that, although aid has not yet been sought under this regulation by processors in the Ilfracombe area, developments involving marketing and processing activities at Ilfracombe could be eligible for consideration for FEOGA grant. Since 1977, seven applications from within Devon and Cornwall have been successful in attracting aid, receiving some £400,000 from the EEC funds.

If it can be shown that there is real potential for commercial fishing development from Ilfracombe, very limited grant might be considered under the Fisheries Act 1955 for that part of the harbour cost which could be identified as relating to that development.

The position with regard to fishing potential remains as stated in the debate on 7 February 1983, when it was explained that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food had no knowledge of significant unexploited fisheries potential in the Bristol channel area. I can only reiterate that if commercial assessment of such a potential indicated a need for harbour development in north Devon, grant might be considered for approved costs under fisheries legislation to the extent that it could be demonstrated that there would be a benefit to the fishing industry. My colleagues in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be pleased to give any assistance concerning eligibility of projects in Ilfracombe.

My hon. Friend will be aware that on 23 April the Ports (Finance) Bill had its Second Reading. Clause 6 repeals section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964 which gave the Secretary of State for Transport power by order to prohibit harbour development works. This completes the process of the freeing of port development started a year ago when my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport revoked the Harbour Development Order which gave effect to section 9. It reflects the Government's earlier decision that it was no longer appropriate to retain this regulatory control, which latterly applied only to harbour developments over £3 million. The effect of ending the control has been that, subject to compliance with other relevant statutory requirements, promoters of port development are free to proceed with commercially desirable developments if they can secure adequate financial backing.

Before concluding, I would like to quote a few words used by my hon. Friend in the debate in February 1983 on Ilfracombe harbour. He said:

> "There is an inaccurate belief that Members of Parliament are magicians, with better or worse rabbits in the hat, or that we have magic wands. This is a case not for magic wands, but for the local council to think through and to decide how a project should be organised and controlled." — [Official Report, 7 February 1983; Vol. 36, c. 666.]

It is clear from what we have heard today that the local council has taken an initiative and started the wheels in motion.

We recognise that there are problems in Ilfracombe and also that the people who live and work there want to see a halt in its decline and to put the town on a sound industrial and social footing through the harbour project. I sincerely hope it will succeed. I can assure my hon. Friend that when any project in Ilfracombe appears to be eligible for assistance under existing schemes of support it will be given every consideration by the relevant Government Department.

I once again thank my hon. Friend for drawing these important matters to the attention of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 15 April 1985

PRIME MINISTER

Rates

Mr. Murphy asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's current policy towards the abolition of the domestic rating system.

The Prime Minister: In the course of their studies of local government finance, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and his colleagues are examining afresh, amongst other things, the question of how in the new system local revenues might best be raised. The Government will make a statement in due course as a preliminary to wide consultation.

Strip Searches

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Prime Minister if she will take steps to ensure that statistics on the annual number of strip searches made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prisons distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners, are recorded centrally in the same way for England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, respectively.

The Prime Minister: No. The need for statistics to be kept is a matter to be determined according to the individual circumstances obtaining in each jurisdiction.

Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Prime Minister whether any Departments additional to those given in her answer to the hon. Member for Belfast, South on 2 April, Official Report, column 523, and her answer of 1 April, Official Report, column 413, and Cmnd. 9094 have been involved in meetings at official level under the auspices of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council.

The Prime Minister: In addition to the departments implied in the question, officials from the Department of Education and Science have also attended meetings of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council at official level.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Prime Minister how many officials from the Cabinet Office have attended meetings at official level under the auspices of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council; and if she will list the dates and locations of such meetings and the subjects discussed.

The Prime Minister: Officials attend meetings under the auspices of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council according to the subjects under discussion. It is not the practice of Her Majesty's Government to give information about meetings of officials.

Residential Hostels

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister which Department is primarily responsible for the funding of voluntary residential hostels for single homeless alcoholics, drug addicts, ex-offenders and former psychiatric patients.

The Prime Minister: In so far as hostels and other forms of shared housing for the single homeless and other groups with special needs are provided by housing associations registered with the Housing Corporation in England, the Department of the Environment is primarily responsible for capital funding, and for revenue support where this is necessary in relation to housing management costs. According to the client group, housing associations may seek further assistance with revenue costs from other sources including local health and social services authorities and the Home Office. Hostels are also provided by other voluntary organisations which do not receive any support from Exchequer funds.

Ethiopia

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister if she will tabulate in the Official Report the tonnage of cereals to be sent to Ethiopia, as agreed at the Dublin Heads of Government meeting of the European Economic Community setting out separately the tonnage: delivered to camps, in transit on land or sea, purchased not transported and balance not purchased, together with a statement relating to the timetable of the programme.

The Prime Minister: The European Council in Dublin agreed a target for cereals food aid for the Community and its member states for delivery to African countries in 1985, but did not agree allocations to individual countries. The available information on commitments and deliveries of cereals food aid to Ethiopia by the United Kingdom and the European Community since the Dublin Council is as follows:

	Commitments since 4 December		Deliveries since 4 December from previous commitments (tonnes)
	Amount (tonnes)	Delivery Schedule
United Kingdom	15,000	Delivered to Ethiopian port in February	6,500
European Community
—food aid programme	70,000	For delivery to Ethiopian port in stages—June to August	45,000
—emergency aid	37,000	For delivery to Ethiopian port in stages—April to May	25,000

Notes:

(1) Distribution within the country is undertaken by the Ethiopian Government or by international and voluntary agencies, with monitoring by the World Food Programme, and is subject to ex-post accounting.

(2) No information is available on deliveries by other member states of the Community.

Recycling Waste

Mr. Thornton asked the Prime Minister whether the Government intend to give a Minister overall responsibility across Departments for recycling policy as recommended in the Trade and Industry Committee Report on "Wealth of Waste".

The Prime Minister: A Department of Trade and Industry Minister will have special co-ordinating responsibilities for issues which relate to reclamation and recycling. I have asked my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to assume this responsibility. He will not have decision making powers in areas which are properly the responsibility of other Ministers but he will have a particular responsibility for identifying any inconsistencies or omissions in Government policy, which would then be dealt with through the normal inter-departmental processes. He will also handle Parliamentary debates and questions on general recycling matters which extend beyond the responsibilities of individual Ministers.

The Government's full response to the Select Committee is being made public by the Committee today.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Flats (Leasehold Enfranchisement)

21. Mr. John Fraser asked the Attorney-General if he will discuss with the chairman of the Law Commission the subject of leasehold enfranchisement for flats.

The Solicitor-General: Leasehold enfranchisement is a question of policy, not law reform, and therefore unsuitable for reference to the Law Commission. On the technical aspects I have nothing to add to the answer I gave the hon. Member on 14 January 1985.

Loughborough University (Incident)

Mr. Adams asked the Attorney-General if he will request a report from the chief constable of Leicestershire concerning alleged criminal offences committed by students at Loughborough university on the evening of 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have no power to require a chief officer of police to provide a report of the nature suggested. However, I understand that the Leicester constabulary has informed the Home Office that it has received no complaint of any criminal offence alleged to have been committed by students at Loughborough university on the evening of 1 April.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement in respect of Arthur Andersen's report on the Crown Prosecution Service and publish its findings.

The Attorney-General: Messrs Arthur Andersen & Co. was commissioned by the Home Office in May 1984 to undertake a management consultancy survey to assist the Director of Public Prosecutions in determining working procedures and staffing levels of the new service. It expects to present its final report by the end of this month. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary intends to publish the report as soon as practicable.

THE CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

St. Alban's, Teddington

Mr. Jessel asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will publish in the Official Report, in respect of St. Alban's, Teddington, all the press releases issued by the commissioners.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The commissioners have only published one press release in respect of the redundant church of St. Alban Teddington, namely on 28 January 1985. This release, which was made jointly with the diocese of London, was issued solely in response to a report published by The Victorian Society on this building. The text was as follows:

ST. ALBAN THE MARTYR, TEDDINGTON

The Victorian Society has published a Report on the redundant church of St. Alban the Martyr, Teddington. This Report contains a number of serious inaccuracies; for example, about the care of the building since it was declared redundant and the fate of some of its contents.

Following protracted consultation with Richmond Borough Council and the GLC, the London diocesan authorities reported to the Church Commissioners that they had been unable to find a suitable alternative use for the building. The alternative courses for consideration under the relevant Statute are either preservation by the Redundant Churches Fund or demolition.

The present position is that the Commissioners, with whom the final decision rests, await the advice of their independent Statutory advisers before they consider carefully and then decide which of these two courses to pursue. Before giving its advice, the Advisory Board for Redundant Churches is consulting the Redundant Churches Fund about the likely cost of repairs and future maintenance, and as to whether the Fund has money available for these purposes.

Mr. Jessel asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will publish in the Official Report, in respect of St. Alban's, Teddington, all the written recommendations made to the commissioners by the redundant churches fund together with the commissioners' responses.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The redundant churches fund has made no written recommendations to the commissioners. However, under the provisions of the Pastoral Measure 1983, the advisory board for redundant churches has consulted the fund. The views of the fund were expressed to the advisory board in a letter dated 31 January 1985. I am sending a copy of the letter to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Jessel asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will publish in the Official Report, in respect of St. Alban's, Teddington, all the written recommendations made to the commissioners by the Council for the Care of Churches together with the commissioners' responses.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Council for the Care of Churches has made no written recommendations to the commissioners. However, under the provisions of the Pastoral Measure 1968 and its successor, the Pastoral Measure 1983, the council makes reports on churches likely to be declared redundant. The only expression of the council's view with regard to St. Alban's Teddington and the nearby church of St. Mary's was made on 15 February 1973 about four years before the church was declared redundant.

Mr. Jessel asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, on what date the Church Commissioners received the advice of the Advisory Board for Redundant Churches on the redundant church of St. Alban's Teddington; and when the commissioners intend to publish their decision.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The final advice of the advisory board for redundant churches was received by the commissioners on 20 February 1985. The commissioners' announcement about the next steps to be taken with regard to the future of this redundant church will be published when the advisory board's advice and all other relevant factors have been fully considered.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Muscular Atrophy

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what Government funded research is at present being conducted into the cause and cure of muscular atrophy.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. I understand that the MRC is currently funding 37 projects into the cause and cure of muscular atrophy and that total expenditure on such research in the financial year 1983-84 (including expenditure on projects which could prove relevant to muscular atrophy) amounted to £1·1 million. I understand that research work relevant to muscular atrophy may also be conducted in universities and medical schools using funds allocated for teaching and research on the advice of the University Grants Committee, but details of such work are not collected centrally.

Scientists (Medical Research)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made by universities or other employing bodies regarding the establishment of a career structure offering continuity for non-clinical basic scientists engaged in medical research; and what steps are being taken in this direction.

Mr. Brooke: These are matters between employers and their employees on which my right hon. Friend has no information.

Universities (Private Grants)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the current trend in the level of private grants to universities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend is encouraged by indications that universities are increasing their income from private sources. Between the academic years 1981-82 and 1983-84 universities' incomes from endowments, donations and subscriptions, and from non-public grants and contracts, has increased from £91 million to £134 million, an increase in real terms of about 33 per cent. But income from such sources still represents only a small proportion of total income and my right hon. Friend believes that there is scope for continuing improvement.

Research

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will take steps to collect information centrally from the individual universities and other institutes of higher education regarding the number of staff engaged in research full-time who hold (a) tenured posts and (b) untenured posts; and, in the case of those who hold untenured posts, how many are excluded by their conditions of employment from their right to redundancy pay, or to challenge unfair dismissal;

(2) if he will take steps to collect information centrally as to (a) how many permanent posts are available in medical schools for non-medically qualified researchers, (b) how many such researchers are employed on a short-time contract basis and (c) how many medical schools in the United Kingdom include in their conditions of employment for such researchers the obligatory waiving of statutory rights to redundancy, unfair dismissal, and so on;

(3) if he will take steps to obtain central records relating to the number of contract research staff currently supported by short-term grants in universities, medical schools and other institutes of higher education who are under 30 years, between 30 and 35 years, or over 35 years; what proportion of these is women; how many of these are on (i) five-year contracts (ii) three years or less; how these figures compare with (a) 10 years ago and (b) five years ago; what proportion of these are supported by the Research Council as compared with charitable sources; and what is the breakdown for the individual research councils.

Mr. Brooke: No.

Studentships and Fellowships

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to obtain information as to the number of applications from graduates for PhD studentships and post-doctoral fellowships at institutes of higher education currently pending and, in respect of such applicants, the number who obtained their first degree (a) in the United Kingdom, and (b) overseas; and how these figures compare with those of 10 years ago.

Mr. Brooke: No.

Nursery Education

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of three and four-year-old children in each local authority area are (a) in full-time nursery education and (b) in part-time nursery education; and how this compares with each of the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: The percentages of the three and four-year-old population attending nursery schools and classes in maintained nursery and primary schools in England for the past five years are as follows:

Thornfield School, Heaton

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will arrange for an inquiry to be established into the standards of education and the levels of punishment at Thornfield school, Mauldeth Road, Heaton Mersey, Stockport.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend does not intend to establish an inquiry regarding Thornfield school; standards of education and discipline are matters for the Stockport local education authority, which maintains this special school for children with emotional and behavioural problems and is responsible for its day-to-day operation.

Universities (Complaints Procedures)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about complaints procedures in universities.

Mr. Brooke: Universities are responsible for determining their own procedures, under the terms of their founding Instruments, my right hon. Friend is concerned however that universities should have appropriate machinery for dealing with complaints of various kinds and looks forward to the outcome of the consideration that the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals is giving to these issues.

International Youth Year

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what funding is provided for the English national co-ordinating committee for International Youth Year 1985; what percentage is available for political campaigning; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Grants to the committee, up to 31 March 1985, have amounted to £133,850, and a further £115,000 has been offered for 1985-86 subject to the normal conditions applicable to such grants. The committee undertakes a number of activities in connection with international youth year, and grant aid is not generally allocated for separate aspects of this work.

Student Grants

Mr. Adams asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation to permit the withholding or abatement of grant in the cases of students proved to have been involved in the commission of public order offences.

Mr. Brooke: Under the Mandatory Awards Regulations local education authorities have the power not to grant an award to a person who has, in their opinion, shown himself by his conduct to be unfitted to receive one.

University Grants Committee

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will increase the proposed level of allocation to the University Grants Committee for 1985-86 by an amount equivalent to the estimated increase in the burden on universities of the higher employers' national insurance contributions announced in the Budget.

Mr. Brooke: This matter is under consideration.

Deaf School Leavers

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what special educational facilities are provided for young deaf school leavers to enable them to cope with their handicap and seek employment.

Mr. Dunn: These matters are the responsibility of local education authorities and schools. Information on local arrangements is not collected centrally.

Deafness (Research Projects)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, of the money allocated for medical and scientific research, what proportion and how much was spent on sensory problems in the last year for which figures are available; how much was spent on the problems of (a) deafness and (b) sight; and if he will list the research projects concerned with deafness supported by his Department.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council is the main Government agency for the promotion of scientific research in the United Kingdom. The council's annual report for the financial year 1983-84 indicates that the MRC allocated approximately £25 million to projects on (or which could prove relevant to) an understanding of vision, hearing, the central nervous system, the neuromuscular system, the cerebrovascular system and other sensory systems and pain. This represented about 22 per cent. of the MRC's grant-in-aid of £113·7 million in that year which itself constituted about 22 per cent. of the total science budget. The annual report shows that, of the total I have mentioned, £2·9 million is attributable to vision research and £2·2 million to hearing. I understand that the MRC is currently supporting about 50 projects on deafness, and I will write to the right hon. Member with details.

I understand that research work on sensory problems, including hearing and deafness may also be conducted in universities and medical schools using funds allocated for teaching and research on the advice of the University Grants Committee, but comprehensive details of such work are not available.

Teacher Training

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will propose changes in the training of teachers to equip them correctly to explain the democratic procedures of Parliament and local government.

Mr. Dunn: The criteria for the approval of courses of initial teacher training issued in April 1984 include the requirement that students should be given an understanding of the type of society in which pupils are growing up and of the relationship between the adult world and what is taught in schools. In particular, they should be equipped to help pupils acquire an understanding of the values of a free society and its economic and other foundations. Over the next three to four years all initial teacher training courses will be reviewed against the criteria by the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education, which will advise my right hon. Friend whether existing courses should continue to be approved and whether proposals for new courses should receive approval. My right hon. Friend has no plans to issue more specific guidelines on the content of initial teacher training courses.

Higher Education (National Insurance Contributions)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has made of the increased costs to (a) universities, (b) polytechnics and (c) colleges and institutes of higher education in England and Wales imposed by the changes in national insurance contributions; and if he will take steps to match these with an increase in grants.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 4 April 1985, c. 697]: The Department's estimate of the increased cost in the first full year of the changes in national insurance contributions for universities and other centrally funded institutions of higher education is about £10 million. The implications are under consideration.

It is estimated that local authorities will gain overall from the changes: no estimates have been made for particular service sectors and the Government do not have details of all salaries and wages paid by local authorities.

HOME DEPARTMENT

"Death Stars"

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to ban the sale of the kung fu weapon known as Death Stars.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Metropolitan Police (Handbook)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a copy of the handbook just issued to members of the Metropolitan police called "Principles for Policing and Guidance for Professional Behaviour".

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend did so on 2 April.

"Nuclear Winter" Theory

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, as part of his monitoring of research into the nuclear winter theory, he will seek to obtain a copy of the study of Messrs. Turco, Toon, Ackerman, Pollack and Sagan.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The conclusions reached by these scientists were published in late 1983 and have long been available to the Department.

Badgers

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on current Government policy regarding action to counter the baiting of badgers; and if he will indicate what recent representations he has received on this subject.

Mr. Brittan: Badger baiting is illegal under the Protection of Animals Act 1911. The Badgers Act 1973, by making it an offence wilfully to take, kill, injure or dig for badgers except in particular circumstances, excluding sport, gives them additional protection. The Government are sympathetic towards any reasonable measure which will strengthen the protection afforded to badgers without jeopardising legitimate activities such as field sports or pest control. They have therefore welcomed the efforts made by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) in his Bill to amend the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to extend the law in this area and tabled an amendment during Committee stage which offered significant improvement on existing legislation. The amendment was agreed and the Government are now considering if any further amendment is possible within the policy constraints outlined.

In the last six months, I have received representations on this subject from many hon. Members, members of the public and conservation groups.

Metropolitan Police (Siege Tactics)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to (a) the circumstances surrounding the siege in a chemist's shop in Lea Bridge road, Leyton, on 2 April, (b) details of the associated police operation and (c) whether the police sought any assistance from the army in dealing with the incident.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that at approximately 9.30 am on Tuesday 2 April Mr. Gary Osbourne entered a chemist's shop at 585 Lea Bridge road, Leyton, London E17, armed with a shotgun and took hostage the pharmacist, Mr. Malik, and his assistant, Miss Paul. Armed officers surrounded the premises and contact was made with Mr. Osbourne by intercom. At about 11.30 am the hostages were released unharmed and at 12 noon Mr. Osbourne surrendered and was arrested. No shots were fired and the police did not seek assistance from the army. Mr. Osbourne has been charged with possessing a loaded firearm with intent to endanger life.

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prison East Sutton Park in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(2) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Drake Hall in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(3) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Askham Grange in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(4) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Styal in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(5) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Durham in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(6) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Cookham Wood in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(7) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Bulwood Hall in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(8) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Holloway in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(9) how many strip searches were made on girls at Drake Hall custody centre in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(10) how many strip searches were made on girls at East Sutton Park custody centre in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(11) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Risley remand centre in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(12) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Pucklechurch remand centre in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners;

(13) how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Low Newton remand centre in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners.

Mr. Brittan: This information is not available.

Alcohol (Wholesaling)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to require a licence for the wholesaling of alcoholic beverage.

Mr. Brittan: I have at present no plans to do so.

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have served sentences of less than one week at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, in the past three months.

Mr. Brittan: According to the records held centrally, about 30 persons were initially received into Birmingham prison in the period 1 December 1984 to 28 February 1985 to serve sentences of less than one week.

Cannabis

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is his policy towards (a) the possession and (b) the smoking of cannabis;

(2) what is his response to the editorial on the law relating to cannabis in the edition of Police Review dated 5 April, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Brittan: It is my firm policy that there should be no change in the law relating to cannabis.

Crimes Against Children

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from each chief constable as to the number of children who were (a) murdered, (b) abducted and (c) sexually assaulted in 1984 and to date in 1985; how these figures compare with the previous five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his area of responsibility in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Butcher: The information requested is not held centrally within the Department and given the changes to the machinery of Government over the last 20 years some of the information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Following is the information which is readily available:

"Wealth of Waste"

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will explain the reasons for the delay in the submission of the Government's reply to the report of the Trade and Industry Committee entitled the "Wealth of Waste", HC, 1983-84, No. 640; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Select Committee's report was published on 19 December, just before the Christmas recess. In the preparation of the Government's response, there had to be consultations between several interested Departments and consideration given to the views of outside bodies. It was therefore agreed with the Chairman of the Committee that some extension of the normal timescale was in order. As was indicated in an earlier reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) on 2 April 1985 at column 469, the Government's response was delivered to the Committee on 25 March.

Pesticides

Mr. Body asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total quantity of organophosporus pesticides manufactured in the United Kingdom annually.

Mr. Butcher: There is no information available on the quantity of organophosporus pesticides manufactured in the United Kingdom but figures for the value of sales by United Kingdom manufacturers are published in table 1 of the Business Monitor PQ 2568 Formulated Pesticides, copies of which are in the Library.

These estimates were revised in the Q3/84 monitor following a major review of the register of businesses used for Business Statistics Office inquiries. Exchange Risk Cover

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why the Government's exchange risk cover on European Investment Bank loans to private industry in non-assisted areas was terminated on 31 December 1984.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The rising costs of operating the exchange risk guarantee scheme and the availability of alternative sources of finance led to my decision to withdraw the scheme for lending outside the assisted areas under the new Community instrument. This took effect from 31 December 1984, with suitable transitional arrangements being agreed with agents. This decision was taken as part of a more general review of the effectiveness of the scheme.

Post Office

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to his statement on 2 April, Official Report, columns 1073-9, concerning the use of an optical character recognition machine at Mount Pleasant sorting office, he will make a statement on the agreements relating to the use of the machine and the date of their termination.

Mr. Pattie: No. That is a matter for the Post Office and the Union of Communication Workers.

Silk

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the total value of (a) imports and (b) exports of silk and silk products into and from the United Kingdom in each of the last 10 years; and what each of these figures is as a percentage of total textile imports and exports in each of those years.

Mr. Channon: The information is as follows:

Notes:

(i) These definitions for textiles and silk do not include items of clothing or raw materials. Silk and silk products included as part of other headings are also excluded.

(ii) Due to changes in classification between SITC/R1 and SITC/R2 in 1978 it is not possible to provide corresponding data prior to that date.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has concerning the value of the annual output of the silk and silk product industries in each of the other member countries of the European Community.

Mr. Channon: The readily available information is in the table.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has concerning the tonnage and value of tussah silk imported from China in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Channon: Tussah silk is not separately identified in the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Statistics.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what regulations currently cover the import of tussah silk into the United Kingdom from China.

Mr. Channon: Imports of certain woven fabrics of tussah silk from China are free of quantitative restrictions provided they are certified as such by the appropriate Chinese authorities. Such tussah silk fabrics are those containing not less than 50 per cent. weight of tussah silk and exceeding 585g per 10 square metres in the gum or 485g per 10 square metres degummed. All other silk fabrics exceeding 585g per 10 square metres in the gum or 485g per 10 square metres degummed are subject to a quantitative limit of 65 tonnes per annum from China, as provided by Council Decision 84/657/EEC of 18 December 1984.

Buggy Pushchairs

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his proposed regulations concerning the safety of child buggy pushchairs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: As stated in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on 19 December 1984 at column 288, I hoped to lay draft new regulations before the House this spring. However the EC Commission considers that in their present form the regulations would create a barrier to trade and has asked for their introduction to be suspended until this question has been resolved.

The Government rely on safety grounds as justification for the regulations. I cannot say at present when the regulations will go ahead.

Copyright Protection

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many Patent Office officials sit on, or are associated with, committees or legal or administrative bodies linked to copyright protection.

Mr. Butcher: One Patent Office official acts as secretary to the performing right tribunal which was established by the Copyright Act 1956.

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all Patent Office research projects over the past three years which have wholly or partly been funded by legal or administrative bodies linked to copyright protection.

Mr. Butcher: There have been no such projects.

Exports

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the value of United Kingdom visible exports of non-oil manufactures per head of those employed in the manufacturing industries for each of the years 1980 to 1984, explaining the basis of computation.

Mr. Channon: The information requested is as follows. The figures represent United Kingdom exports of principal products of industries classified to the manufacturing sector (divisions 2 to 4 of the Standard Industrial Classification 1980) divided by the corresponding June estimates for United Kingdom employees in employment.

Exports per head by the manufacturing sector

1983	7·9
1984	9·2

Small Businesses

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he intends to make any changes in the advisory services provided by his Department to small businesses.

Mr. Trippier: I do not at present plan any further changes to the advisory services provided by my Department to small businesses following those I announced on 27 March when I launched the new support for business package. Under this package all DTI support measures have been grouped under four headings in order to make it easier for firms to understand what is on offer.

Business and technical advisory services are one of the headings in the package, and there are three main elements to these services. They are:

(1) Advice for small firms
(2) Products and process consultancy
(3) Grants for new technology feasibility studies

A change in the assistance available under the products and process consultancy heading is that the eligible firm size is now 1-500 employees for all the services available, which widens the scope for small and medium sized firms to benefit than was the case hitherto. Further details of the assistance available can be found in the Department's Support for Business pamphlet, a copy of which is being placed in the Library.

Yarrow Shipbuilders

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration will be paid in cash by GEC to British Shipbuilders for Yarrow Shipbuilders; what percentage this represents of the total price; and whether this sum is to be paid on the handing over of the yard to its new owners.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend has consented to the sale of Yarrow Shipbuilders Ltd. to GEC on the following terms.

	£ million
Payable for the shares, in cash by GEC on completion of the sale	17·15
Loan to be repaid by Yarrow Shipbuilders to BS on completion of the sale	3·08
Dividend to BS declared by Yarrow Shipbuilders before completion	10·00
Estimated payment to be made March 1986 by Yarrow Shipbuilders to BS for group tax relief	3·70
Total	33·93

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the details of the loans outstanding to date to Yarrow Shipbuilders, and if they will be settled prior to the sale of Yarrows to GEC.

Mr. Butcher: There is currently a loan of £3·082 million owed by Yarrow Shipbuilders to British Shipbuilders. This loan will be repaid on completion of the sale to GEC.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been paid in dividend by Yarrow Shipbuilders to British Shipbuilders in each year from 1980-81 to 1984-85 inclusive.

Mr. Butcher: In the year ended 31 March 1981 Yarrow Shipbuilders declared an interim dividend of £44,000 for that year.

In the year ended 31 March 1982 the company declared a final dividend of £20,475,000 for the previous year. This dividend took into account profits made by the company since nationalisation; no dividends, other than the interim dividend of £44,000 paid in the year ended 31 March 1981, having been paid previously.

In the year ended 31 March 1983 the company declared a final dividend of £5,116,000 for the year ended 31 March 1982.

In the year ended 31 March 1984 the company declared a final dividend of £4,067,000 for the year ended 31 March 1983.

In the year ended 31 March 1985 the company declared a final dividend of £6,343,000 for the year ended 31 March 1984 and an interim dividend of £10 million in respect of the period 1 April 1984 to 22 February 1985.

Company Reports

Mr. Ryder asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the following companies last filed their reports: Leisure Arts Centre Ltd., Gomba Holdings UK Ltd. and Arena Holdings Ltd.; and whether they were filed within the statutory period.

Mr. Fletcher: There is no company registered under the name Leisure Arts Centre Ltd. However, a company registered as LLAC Ltd. last filed an annual return and accounts on 10 October 1984. The annual return was eight months late, but the accounts were filed within the permitted period. Gomba Holdings UK Ltd. last filed an annual return on 26 June 1984 and accounts on 22 December 1983. They were 4½ months and seven weeks late respectively. Arena Holdings Ltd. was incorporated on 23 December 1983 and no annual return or accounts have yet become due.

Scrap Metal

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his discussions with the British Scrap Federation in respect to the export of scrap metals to Spain.

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend the Minister for Industry recently met the British Scrap Federation, when discussion concentrated on the availability and price of scrap.

During the meeting reference was made to the escalating price of scrap sold to Spanish producers. The federation pointed out that the Spanish price reflected the dollar price (the United States being the dominant influence on prices) and was not above the world market price.

During the 26 March Steel Council Ministers while noting the recent fall in the price of scrap in the EC agreed that the European Commission should investigate the effect of Spanish purchases on the Community market.

Industrial Building Allowance

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make an announcement about the future of the 100 per cent. industrial building allowance for small industrial premises.

Mr. Trippier: The 100 per cent. industrial building allowance scheme ended on 26 March 1985.

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to publish the results of the review undertaken by his Department of the 100 per cent. industrial building allowance for small industrial premises.

Mr. Trippier: The results of the review will be published shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Meat Exports

Mr. Beggs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total value of claims for payment of advance export refunds on meat under European Economic Community regulation 565/80 for which payment has still to be made to Northern Ireland exporters for meat accepted by the Intervention Board during November 1984, December 1984, January 1985 and February 1985, respectively.

Mrs. Fenner: This information is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Intervention Grain

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he has made in securing intervention grain for Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Fenner: There is no provision at present for the transfer of intervention grain to deficit regions of the Community.

Pesticides and Herbicides

Mr. Cartwright asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what representations he has received about his Department's specification of the Draize procedure in the testing of pesticides and herbicides; and what response he has given;

(2) what efforts his Department has made to find an alternative to the Draize procedure in the testing of pesticides and herbicides.

Mrs. Fenner: The most recent representation received by my Department came from the Lord Dowding fund for humane research. The reply explained that while in vitro methods for the assessment of severe eye irritation (as opposed to the in vivo Draize test) may be of value as preliminary screening methods for use with compounds or products for which the eye irritation potential is unknown, their ability to detect the relatively low level of eye irritation which may be caused by many pesticides has yet to be adequately demonstrated. I am advised that some in vivo testing is necessary but our pesticides data requirements are currently being revised in order to reduce animal testing to the minimum.

Products containing components already known to be irritating to the eye will not be required to be tested undiluted; active ingredients and formulations which are severe skin irritants, or which are strongly acidic or alkaline, may be assumed to be eye irritants and thus will not have to be tested in concentrated form; there is also a strong recommendation not to test in the eye materials known to be corrosive to skin. Furthermore, where substances of unknown irritancy need to be tested, application should be made initially to one animal only, before proceeding to a further two animals, provided it is not shown to be strongly irritant in the first animal.

Agriculture Council

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the Agriculture Council in Luxembourg which took place from 1 to 4 April.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) on 3 April at column 614.

Quangos

Sir Philip Holland asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions in the 12 months to 31 March the Banana Trade Advisory Committee submitted advice to his Department; and what action was taken by his Department on each occasion as a result of the advice given.

Mrs. Fenner: The Banana Trade Advisory Committee meets once a month. In the light of its advice, my Department makes recommendations to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the issue of licences for the import of bananas from the dollar area to the importers of bananas from the Windward Islands and Jamaica, to whom we have obligations under the Lomé convention.

Sir Philip Holland asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) on how many occasions in the 12 months to 31 March the Hill Farming Advisory Committee for England, Wales and Northern Ireland submitted advice to his Department; and what action was taken by his Department on each occasion as a result of the advice given;

(2) on how many occasions in the 12 months to 31 March the Agricultural Economics Technical Committee submitted advice to his Department; and what action was taken by his Department on each occasion as a result of the advice given.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Veterinary Investigation Service

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now make a statement on the efficiency study of the Veterinary Investigation Service.

Mr. Jopling: I have now completed consideration of the report of this study which I commissioned last year. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

The report contains 37 recommendations designed to reduce Exchequer costs and increase the efficiency of the service. The proposals fall into four main categories, the main thrust of which I endorse.

First, I agree with the study officers on the need to establish clear objectives and management priorities in the VIS, in particular as regards research and development work. Implementation will form part of the action now in train following last year's study of ADAS (of which the VIS is a part) by its Director General, Professor Bell.

Secondly, the study advocated action to recover a greater proportion of the costs of the service. Again, action to implement these recommendations will proceed in step with the similar recommendations on charging for ADAS services in Professor Bell's report.

Thirdly, the study officers proposed a reduction in the number of centres from 24 to 15 but with an increase in their average size.

I have already received representations from many Members on behalf of farmers and veterinarians expressing concern that the services offered will be adversely affected if particular centres are closed. I have taken careful note of these representations, but I believe that it should be possible to continue to meet the essential needs of the industry from fewer centres.

As to the specific proposals, I believe a strong case has been made for closure of the centres at Northampton, Chester, Liverpool and Cardiff. I also recognise the case for closure of the centre at Gloucester subject to satisfactory alternative arrangements for continuing the important work done there on badgers and tuberculosis control. As regards the centres at Leeds and Lincoln, the need to service the important pig industry in Humberside may require the retention of one or other of these centres or the opening of a new one.

I have commissioned cost appraisals of the options. I have also commissioned cost appraisals of the study officers' proposals for opening 2 new centres to replace the centres at Truro, Starcross, Winchester and Wye. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are agreed that the proposal for closure of the centre at Aberyswyth should not be pursued.

Finally, a new management structure for the VIS is recommended. I have some reservations as to the detail of the study officers' proposals but this is for consideration in the light of the new infrastructure of the service that is finally agreed.

The total savings achievable as a result of the study recommendations will depend on the outcome of the further studies and of the consultations with outside interests which I am now setting in train. I would hope that these consultations can be completed over the next two months.

Milk Producers

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those member countries of the European Economic Community in which no comprehensive list of milk producers exists.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the answer of 7 December 1984, Official Report, column 295, and 19 December 1984, Official Report, column 201 onwards, if he will provide the latest available figures for the quantities of produce stored in European Economic Community food stores in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Prices

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the average market prices and intervention prices (or equivalent) for all the main European Economic Community farm products for each year since 1973 (a) for the European Economic Community as a whole and (b) for the United Kingdom separately.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985, c. 420]: Information on common intervention prices is set out for the main commodities in table 1. Intervention prices applicable in the United Kingdom are shown in table 2. Indications of market price movements are shown in table 3 which contains index numbers for main commodities from the European Community index of producer prices of agricultural products. Details of average market prices in the United Kingdom are shown, for recent years, in table 29 of the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1985" (Cmnd. 9423): data for earlier years are contained in previous White Papers, copies of these are obtainable through the Library of the House.

Outgoers Scheme

Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress made on the outgoers scheme for dairy farmers.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 3 April 1985, c. 63]: Milk producers are being given a second chance to enter the outgoers scheme. Both those who did not apply last year and those who did not accept the initial offer may claim the payments for going out of milk production. The scheme is however being reopened for a limited period only. The necessary application and claims forms may be obtained from the Ministry's divisional offices and should be completed and returned by Friday 3 May 1985. Claimants will have to stop selling milk by Friday 7 June 1985 at the latest. The Milk Supplementary Levy (Outgoers) Scheme came into operation on 24 July 1984. Producers who wished to surrender their quota as outgoers were invited to make application to join the scheme by 28 August 1984. The aim of the scheme was to take in 2·25 per cent. of the quota for England and Wales, a total of 289 million litres. Initially a total of 4,826 producers applied, offering to surrender four times this amount of quota. So far 1,463 producers with 234 million litres have confirmed their wish to give up milk production and a few cases have yet to be settled. The majority however have decided to stay in milk production after all. This allows a second chance to be offered to producers generally.

Any producer who sold milk in England and Wales and qualified for a quota allocation from April 2 1984 can apply provided that they have not previously benefited under the non-marketing of milk, dairy herd conversion or farm structures (payments to outgoers) schemes. Claims from tenants will need to be supported by their landlords.

Outgoers' payments can be either:

(i) For loss of profits in the five years immediately after the date on which production of milk for sale ceases. Such payments will be made at the rate of 2·6p a year for each litre of quota which are to be given up under the scheme; or

(ii) As compensation for the surrender of quota at the rate of 13p per litre, with a total lump sum due being paid out in five equal annual instalments.

Payments under the scheme will be taxed as income if they are made in respect of loss of profits or as capital, if they are made as compensation for the surrender of quota. In each case the first payment will be made as soon as possible after the date on which milk sales have ceased and subsequent payments will be made at yearly intervals thereafter.

When outgoers submit their claims they will have to give several undertakings. The most important of these are that they will give up their quota allocation in its entirety and that they will not be involved with the production of milk for sale as long as the Community milk quota regulations last.

Trees (Imports)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what grounds his Department or others refuse a plant health licence or certificate for the purpose of importing trees or parts of trees from Scandinavia.

Mr. John MacKay: I have been asked to reply.

The importation of forest grown conifer trees over three metres in height is prohibited because at this size they are potential hosts of harmful organisms which could pose a threat to British tree stock.

A small number of licences are granted by the Forestry Commission to permit entry from October to December of cut "Christmas trees" of this size traditionally gifted from Scandinavia for public display during the festive season. Only exceptionally are licences granted for the import of trees for any other purpose.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will indicate (a) how many Christmas trees were imported into the United Kingdom from Sweden or Norway in 1984, (b) what steps were taken to ensure that such trees were pest free and (c) what size limits and other criteria were used in deciding whether to allow an import to take place.

Mr. John MacKay: I have been asked to reply.

Thirteen Christmas trees were imported into Great Britain from Norway or Sweden in 1984. These were large trees over 3 metres in height traditionally gifted for public display and imported under individual Forestry Commission licences; each was accompanied by a phytosanitary certificate issued by the plant health authority in the exporting country and was inspected on arrival by a commission plant health inspector. No Christmas trees were imported into Northern Ireland from these countries.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Khartoum North Power Station

26. Mr. Lester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects Khartoum north power station to be operational.

Mr. Raison: It is expected that reliability trials will be completed by the end of April and the station will then become fully operational.

Sub-Saharan Africa (Aid)

31. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how the special United Kingdom aid programme in sub-Saharan Africa will be co-ordinated with that of the World Bank.

Mr. Raison: We expect to agree in advance with the bank proposals for associating our money with the African special facility in joint operations in particular countries. Where the bank makes a commitment we would express our part of that commitment in a separate aid agreement with the beneficiary. We would be working together to support specific reform programmes.

Desertification

32. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what studies are being financed by his Department into the problem of increasing desertification of the regions south of the Sahara.

Mr. Raison: We have commissioned research into soil moisture content in sub-Saharan Africa, at Reading university, using data from the METEOSAT Satellite; climatic trends in the Sahel currently being undertaken by the university of East Anglia; suitability of tropical hardwoods for growing in arid zones by the Commonwealth Forestry Institute at Oxford; and a simple technique to estimate direct recharge from the rainfall level to the groundwater system by geochemical methods being carried out in the Sudan by the British Geological Survey. We also support the United Nations environment programme and OECD initiatives in the area of desertification.

Ethiopia

33. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give his most up-to-date estimate of the need for food aid for Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: The latest estimate of the need for food aid is 1·33 million tonnes, as agreed with the Ethiopian Government representatives at the United Nations conference in Geneva on 11-12 March. Of this, current pledges total about 1·03 million tonnes. We expect the balance to be covered by other pledges not yet allocated to specific countries.

Expenditure

34. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the main items of expenditure and the total sums expended from the contingency reserve within the Vote for overseas aid in the year 1984-85.

Mr. Raison: The main allocations were for emergency and food aid for disaster and refugee relief, bilateral country programmes, multilateral contributions, British Council and voluntary agencies.

The provisional forecast of spending from the contingency reserve allocations for these items is some £44 million in 1984-85.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Credit Card Companies (Infraction Proceedings)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the formal letter sent to him by the European Economic Community Commission on 19 February on the question of the possibility of infraction proceedings on the exempt status of credit card companies in relation to their value added tax transactions.

Mr. Rifkind: Exchanges of correspondence with the Commission concerning the possibility of infraction proceedings are not made public.

ENERGY

Fuel Costs

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) whether he will publish the latest available comparisons of industrial contract gas prices for the United States of America, the United Kingdom, Japan, Germany and France;

(2) whether he will publish the latest available comparisons of industrial electricity prices for the United States of America, the United Kingdom, Japan, Germany and France;

(3) whether he will publish the latest available comparisons of domestic natural gas prices for the United States of America, the United Kingdom, Japan, Germany and France;

(4) whether he will publish the latest available comparisons of domestic electricity prices for the United States of America, the United Kingdom, Japan, Germany and France;

(5) whether he will publish the latest available comparisons of heavy fuel prices, including tax, for the United States of America, the United Kingdom, Japan, Germany and France;

(6) whether he will publish the latest available comparisons of retail petrol prices, including all taxes, for the United States of America, the United Kingdom, Japan, Germany and France.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The latest available comparisons of energy prices, for the countries and fuels specified, relate to the third quarter of 1984, and are shown in the table.

	Average revenue from sales of gas to households in pence per therm	Average revenue from sales of electricity to households in pence per kwh	Average price of petrol in pence per litre	Average revenue from sales of gas to industry in pence per therm	Average revenue from sales of electricity to industry in pence per kwh†*	Average price of heavy fuel oil to industry in £'s per tonne

Source: OECD.

* It should be borne in mind when interpreting these figures that industrial electricity prices generally vary according to time of year, because of the seasonal element present in most industrial tariffs. Hence a different picture might be obtained for a different time of year, depending on how the seasonal components in the individual country tariffs operated.

† Data from alternative sources produces a different picture. For example, Electricity Council figures show that as at 1 August 1984 for industrial consumers with an annual maximum demand of 2,500 kw at 40 per cent. load factor, average prices paid were:

	p/kwh
France	3·32
Germany	4·30 – 5·39
Japan	5·81 – 6·33
United Kingdom	3·62 – 3·98
USA	5·69 – 10·64

‡ Average for 1983.

‖ As of 1983 original ex-tax prices paid by industry and households are no longer available for France and these figures are OECD estimates.

¶ Prices exclude taxes, which are levied by the states and which vary between 2 and 6 per cent.

Note: (i) The prices shown above for gas and electricity are based on average revenue per unit consumed. In general this will differ from the price derived for a given level of annual consumption.

(ii) International comparisons of energy prices are difficult to construct because of incompatibilities in the basic data. They require careful interpretation because of movements in exchange rates and variation in the timing of tariff revisions between countries. The above figures are based on exchange rates prevailing for the year 1983 and the third quarter 1984 as appropriate.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether, in light of the publication on 5 March 1984 by the then United States Energy Secretary, Donald Hodel, of the isotopic composition of plutonium received by the United States from the United Kingdom under the mutual defence agreement of 1958, he will reconsider his Department's earlier withholding of details of this matter.

Mr. Goodlad: No.

North Sea Oil and Gas

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total amount and value in 1983-84 of (a) the oil and (b) the gas, produced offshore in the North sea (i) north of latitude 55° 50′ north and (ii) south of latitude 55° 50′ north.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The total amount of oil and natural gas liquids (NGLs) produced offshore in the United Kingdom sector of the North sea north of latitude 55° 50′ north in 1983-84 was 118.6 million tonnes, with a value of £17.6 billion. No oil is produced offshore south of this latitude and only a small amount of NGLs-0·2 million tonnes, worth £29 million.

In the same year 11 billion cubic metres of gas, valued at £656 million, were produced north of latitude 55° 50′ north, for disposal to BGC. South of this latitude 27 billion cubic metres of gas were produced, valued at £510 million.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EC/Israel Co-operation Council

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the current work of the European Community/Israel Co-operation Council and United Kingdom participation in it.

Mr. Rifkind: The EC/Israel Co-operation Council last met on 20 February 1984 when the operation of the EC/Israel co-operation agreement was reviewed and the Community confirmed its assurance that the implications of enlargement for the agricultural exports of its Mediterranean partners would be taken into account. The Israeli Government have requested a meeting of the Council in 1985, but no date has yet been fixed. The United Kingdom plays a full part in the preparations for and is represented at meetings of the EC/Israel Co-operation Council, although only the Presidency and Commission speak on behalf of the Community.

Sir Antony Acland (Visit to Israel)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the recent visit to Israel by the permament under-secretary of state, Sir Antony Acland.

Mr. Luce: The permanent under-secretary of state of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office visited Israel from 19-24 March. He held talks with the Director-General of the Israeli Foreign Ministry on the Middle East and other international issues. He also called on the Israeli Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence and met a group of Palestinians from the occupied territories.

Hebrew

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements are made for diplomats to receive training in modern Hebrew, along the lines of the detailed arrangements for Arabic described in the answer of 18 July 1984, Official Report, column 243; and how many serving diplomats have received training in both languages.

Mr. Renton: Intensive training in Hebrew, for which the Diplomatic Service has a much smaller requirement (one officer every four years) than for Arabic, is carried out in Israel.

The students attends an ulpan (a language school which is part of a kibbutz) for a course of five months' duration. He lives on the kibbutz and participates in its activities. He spends a further period of about two months at a university before taking up a diplomatic post in Israel.

No serving officer has been trained in both Hebrew and Arabic, though one Arabist currently in London has some knowledge of Hebrew.

Diplomatic Representation

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which countries the United Kingdom is represented by a third country.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom is represented by third countries in Argentina, Guatemala, Iran and Libya.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those countries whose Governments have not been accorded diplomatic status by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom does not have diplomatic relations with the following States:

Albania	Cambodia
Argentina	Guatemala
Bhutan	Libya

United Nations Secretariats

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the Departments which have provided funds to support the work of the secretariats for the United Nations International Years of the Child 1979, Disabled People 1981 and Youth 1985; and if he will indicate in each case the amount of money involved.

Mr. Renton: The Overseas Development Administration made a voluntary contribution of £150,000 to the secretariat for the international year of the child. It also made £90,000 available for two special projects overseas. Of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's assessed contributions to the United Nations regular budget about £41,000 can be attributed to the secretariat for the international year of the disabled person. So far about £38,450 of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's contributions to the regular budget can be attributed to the secretariat for the international youth year.

Peru

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports were received by Her Majesty's Government of the press conference held in Lima by President Belaunde Terry on 2 May 1982 prior to receipt of the report from Her Majesty's ambassador in Lima sent at 01.44 GMT on 3 May 1982; from where these were received; at what times; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I have nothing to add to the answer which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave the hon. Member on 29 March. at column 293.

Anglo-Irish Encounter Organisation (Funding)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any grant in aid is made by any foreign Government to the Anglo-Irish Encounter Organisation; and if he will make a statement on the contribution of his Department under Supply Estimate, class II, vote I, to that organisation.

Mr. Renton: The Government of the Republic of Ireland have also provided funding for the Anglo-Irish Encounter Organisation. We contributed £17,000 in 1983-84, £20,000 in 1984-85 and have made provision of £24,000 for the use of the Organisation in 1985-86.

Eugenics and Genetic Engineering

Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of any discussions the Government have held and programmes they have negotiated in relation to eugenics and genetic engineering, including research programmes (a) in the European Economic Community and (b) in the United States of America; and what proposals there are for any such further discussions and programmes, harmonisation of laws and international agreements in that field of activity.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom complies with a European Community Recommendation of June 1982 on the registration of work on recombinant DNA. A sub-element of the Community's five-year research programme in biotechnology, agreed in December 1984, concerns genetic engineering.

Aspects of the research undertaken at the European molecular biology laboratory, of which the United Kingdom is a member, also concern genetic engineering. The United Kingdom takes part in discussions in the scientific and technological policy committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development on the safety and use of genetically engineered organisms.

As to the specifically human aspects, the United Kingdom participates in discussions in an ad hoc committee of experts at the Council of Europe established to examine the ethical and legal implications, including the feasibility of harmonising laws among member states. Non-governmental British representatives attended the conference on the life sciences and mankind organised by the Japanese Government in March 1984, and there will also be a British contribution to the follow-up conference which the French Government are to hold between 18 and 22 April.

Latin America (Human Rights)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all reports published in the last three years by the United Nations Human Rights Commission regarding countries in Latin America.

Mr. Renton: In each of the years 1983, 1984 and 1985, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights had before it reports from its special rapporteurs or representatives on the human rights situation in El Salvador, Guatemala and Chile and also reports from its Special Envoy to Bolivia on the provision of Advisory Services to that country. Copies of these published reports are available in the Library of the House.

Torture

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why he added a qualifying statement to the United Nations convention on torture which the United Kingdom has recently ratified; if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the qualifying statement; and whether other countries added similar statements.

Mr. Renton: The following statement was made on signature of the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

"The United Kingdom reserves the right to formulate, upon ratifying the Convention, any reservations or interpretative declarations which it might consider necessary."

This was to reserve our position should we consider any such reservations or declarations necessary for technical or legal reasons on ratification.

Of the countries which have signed thus far, none has made similar statements.

British Air Space

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many diplomatic representations protesting at intrusions by aircraft of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics into British air space have been made since the Government took office.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 21 March 1985, c. 575]: No such representations have been necessary.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Self-employed Persons

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the total of net receipts of tax from self-employed taxpayers for each of the last five financial years.

Mr. Moore: The available information relates to tax units (ie counting married couples as one unit) whose main source of income—usually but not always the largest source—is self-employment income, and is in terms of the total liability to income tax in each tax year including investment income surcharge and the liability on income taxed at source.

Year	£ billion
1980-81	2·6
1981-82	3·1
1982-83	3·5
1983-84*	3·5
1984-85*	4

* Provisional estimate.

The tax will normally be received partly in the tax year and partly in the following year.

Over the period from mid 1980 to mid-1984 the number of self-employed person is estimated to have grown by almost a quarter.

European Monetary System

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the consequences of the United Kingdom joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system for United Kingdom control of domestic money supply; and what other studies his Department has conducted on the implications for United Kingdom economic management and policy of collective decisive-making as part of the system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 14 February 1985 at column 290.

Pound Sterling

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions since the end of 1982 the exchange rate of the pound sterling against those currencies within the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system has varied by more than the limits permitted by the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

HMSO

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the reasons for changing the staffing of those dealing with Members' requests for Her Majesty's Stationery Office publications at the Nine Elms depot; if the current standard of service will be maintained; what are the financial savings which have resulted; and if the Vote in support of the Stationery Office has been reduced by a similar sum to the savings.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Freeports

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will carry out a review of the areas which were given designated freeport status and report progress in each area.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Postmen (Tips)

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of postmen liable to be taxed on tips; and what is the expected revenue in the latest financial year for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore: I understand that about 175,000 people are employed by the Post Office, of whom some 125,000 are postal officers on rounds. Tips received in the course of a postman's duties are part of his taxable income in the same way as his other earnings. I regret that information is not available centrally on which to base an estimate of the number of Post Office employees who receive tips, nor to distinguish the amount of tax due on them.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if his Budget calculations of net revenue changes from alterations in employers' national insurance contributions included the public sector.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Tax Allowances

Ms. Clare Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if his Department's proposals on changes in married couple's tax allowances were currently in force, what take-home pay a married woman seeking to return to work would have to command to be better off than staying at home.

Mr. Moore: Under a system of fully transferable allowances, the net income of a family would increase if a married woman returned to work, whatever the level of her earnings.

Value Added Tax (Appeals)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has reached a decision on the question of appeals against value added tax penalties following representations made to him on the enforcement powers of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

Mr. Lawson: Yes. In the light of representations made by interested parties and comments from a number of hon. Members I have decided that the appeal arrangements set out in the exposure clauses should be enlarged to provide additional safeguards, as of right, for the tax-payer. The Finance Bill will accordingly provide that, where penalties or surcharges are to be assessed by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, it should be a defence for the tax payer, for all matters short of fraud, to demonstrate to the commissioners, or on appeal to the VAT tribunal, that he had exercised all due diligence and had a reasonable excuse for failing to comply with the VAT law in question.

Value Added Tax (Keith Report)

Sir William Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if his legislative proposals in the Finance Bill for the implementation of the value added tax recommendations of the Keith committee report will include any change in the proposal for assessments to counter possible loss of tax, jeopardy assessments, included in exposure clauses published by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise in November 1984.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have decided that no such clause should be included in this year's Finance Bill. The Government remain of the view that there is merit in the Keith committee recommendations for action to prevent the disposal of assets so as to avoid payment of tax debts. Both my hon. Friend and some other respondents to the consultative document have, however, drawn attention to certain problems in the jeopardy assessment approach. The proposal will therefore be deferred to allow Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to undertake a further review of the best means of achieving the intended purpose.

Value Added Tax (Advertising)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate how much tax he expects to raise from the imposition of value added tax on newspaper and magazine advertising; what impact this will have on employment; and how much of the value added tax revenue will come from advertisements placed by charities.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Covenants (Tax Relief)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate how much revenue he expects to lose by the increase of the limit on higher tax relief for covenants.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Member to table 4.2 of the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1985-86.

Value Added Tax (Charities)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate how much revenue he expects to lose by the exemption from value added tax of computers purchased for medical use by charitable bodies.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Minimum Income Level

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate (a) the number of P11D forms concerning benefits in kind which would be submitted,

(b) the loss of revenue and (c) the administrative cost saving in a full financial year, if the minimum income level were raised to £9,500, £10,500, £11,500, £12,500, £13,000 and £14,500 per annum, respectively.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1985, c. 395]: The following table shows the effects on the number of P11D forms estimated to be required for 1985-86 if the various limits proposed by my hon. Friend were to apply:

Level of threshold £	Number of forms P11D with benefits (thousands)	Direct revenue cost £ million	Administrative savings† £ million
9,500	1,600	30	+2·4
10,500	1,350	60	nil
11,500	1,100	85	0·2
12,500	1,000	100	1
13,000	950	115	1·4
14,500	800	130	2·7
15,000	700	*135	3

* Revised from estimate of £125 million given on 21 February at column 567.

† The figures for administrative savings show the position as compared with 1984-85, and take into account the increased number of forms P11D expected to be received with a £8,500 threshold.

Tax Revenue

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the percentages of total tax revenue in 1982-83 and 1983-84 derived from income generated through the ownership of stocks, including shares, bonds and gilts.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 3 April 1985, c. 688]: Information on which to base a precise estimate is not available, but the amount of basic rate income tax deducted at source from such income, that was not subsequently repaid, is estimated to have been around 2½ per cent. of total tax revenue in 1982-83 and 1983-84.

National Insurance

Sir William Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will break down his estimate of the extra revenue, over the present limit, in a full year, which will accrue to the Exchequer from the abolition of the upper limit for employers' national insurance contributions to indicate the amount to be raised on emoluments up to an annual maximum of £16,000, £18,000, £20,000, £25,000 and £30,000, respectively.

Mr. Ray Whitney: I have been asked to reply.

The Government Actuary's estimates are:

Annual Earnings £	Additional revenue from secondary contributions in a full year £ million
Up to 16,000	75
16,000-18,000	125
18,000-20,000	125
20,000-25,000	200
25,000-30,000	125
over 30,000	150

WALES

Birth Statistics

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the mean birthweight and standard deviation for (a) total births, (b) live births and (c) stillbirths in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively, in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested for 1980 to 1983 is given in the following table; comparable figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Mean birthweight and standard deviation in Wales: 1980 to 1983

(Grams)

	1980		1981*		1982		1983

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the mean birthweight and standard deviation for (a) total births, and (b) live births in 1983 and 1984, respectively, for each health authority in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested for 1983 is given in the following table; comparable figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Mean birthweight and standard deviation for district health authorities in Wales: 1983

EMPLOYMENT

Unemployed People (Centres)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what political activities are permitted or encouraged at centres for unemployed people at which there are full-time workers provided by the Manpower Services Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: None. The Manpower Services Commission funds a number of centres under the community programme but it is a specific requirement of the programme that projects do not involve political activity or have political objectives.

Silk Textile Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give a breakdown by region of the numbers of people employed in the silk textile industry in each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department's employment statistics are analysed according to the 1980 standard industrial classification which does not separately distinguish the silk textile industry.

Enterprise Agencies

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what assistance he makes available for the formation of enterprise agencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department does not normally make assistance available directly to enterprise agencies. However a few agencies have received some support as part of projects under the community programme.

Visual Display Units

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received relating to the possibility of health hazards arising from working with visual display units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Health and Safety Executive has received inquiries at national and local level from employers, trades unions, members of the public and others about the possible health effects of VDUs. The executive continues to keep the subject under review.

Labour Statistics

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the rise in the rate of unemployment in the Wealden constituency in the last 18 months; and what is the level of unfilled vacancies.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is available in the Library. On 14 February 1985 the total number of unemployed claimants in the Wealden constituency was 2,089. The corresponding figure for August 1983 was 1,749: there was an increase of 340, which may partly reflect seasonal factors. Unemployment rates are not available for parliamentary constituencies; the smallest areas for which rates are calculated are travel-to-work areas. Vacancy figures are not available for parliamentary constituencies; but vacancy data for jobcentre areas are in the Library.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, for the latest available date, the numbers of under 20-year-olds unemployed for (a) less than one year, (b) one year and (c) more than two years plus, by region.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The figures relate to unemployed claimants on 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age is available.

Numbers unemployed aged under 20 years

Region	Up to one year	Over one year	Over two years
South East	101,306	20,493	5,043
East Anglia	11,844	2,399	646
South West	29,726	5,151	1,105
West Midlands	46,340	14,614	3,913
East Midlands	28,067	6,359	1,483
Yorkshire and Humberside	44,692	12,558	3,216
North West	61,451	18,779	4,634
North	32,294	10,838	2,662
Wales	26,373	7,405	1,835
Scotland	55,114	16,492	4,565
Northern Ireland	13,997	5,392	1,508

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state for Silloth ward (a) the total work force, (b) the number of unemployed, (c) the number in employment in Silloth and those who live in Silloth ward and (d) the number in employment in the Silloth area but who travel in from Marsh ward, Waver ward, Wampool ward, Wigton ward, Tarns ward, Aspatria ward and any other wards.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information in the following table is taken from the 10 per cent. sample of the 1981 census of population.

	Number
Economically active residents of Silloth	1,300
of whom:
out of employment	140
in employment	1,160
Persons working in Silloth	670
of whom living in:
Silloth	440
Marsh	0
Waver	80
Wampool	20
Wigton	10
Tarns	30
Aspatria	10
Elsewhere	80

The number of persons working in Silloth may be to some extent understated as not all respondents described their workplace in sufficient detail for it to be allocated to a ward.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state for Waver ward (a) the total work force, (b) the number of unemployed, (c) the number in employment in Waver ward and who live in Waver ward and (d) the number in employment in Waver ward but who travel in from Marsh ward, Silloth ward, Wampool ward, Wigton ward, Tarns ward, Aspatria ward and any other wards.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information in the following table is taken from the 10 per cent. sample of the 1981 census of population.

	Number
Economically active residents of Waver	890
of whom:
out of employment	50
in employment	840
Persons working in Waver	900
of whom living in:
Waver	340
Marsh	20
Wampool	0
Wigton	80
Tarns	50
Aspatria	0
Elsewhere	160

The numbers of persons working in Waver may be to some extent understated as not all respondents described their workplace in sufficient detail for it to be allocated to a ward.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what was the total number of people employed in mineral oil refining in Great Britain (SIC 1980: Heading 1401) for each year since 1970;

(2) what was the total number of people employed in "Other Treatment of Petroleum Products" in Great Britain (SIC 1980: Heading 1402) for each year since 1970;

(3) what industries are covered by the new heading 140 (1980 SIC) not previously covered by MLH 262 and 263 (1968 SIC); and what has been the total number of people employed in them in Great Britain for each year since 1970.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table gives, for June each year since 1971 (1970 is not available), the estimated number of employees in employment in minimum list headings 262 and 263 of the 1968 standard industrial classification, and group 140 of the 1980 SIC. Information for activity headings 1401 and 1402 is only available from the September 1981 Census of Employment which showed there were an estimated 23,400 employees in employment in activity heading 1401 and 6,500 in activity heading 1402. Estimates of employees in employment since 1981 have been analysed according to the 1980 SIC only.

The industries covered by minimum list headings 262 and 263 correspond exactly to those covered by activity headings 1401 and 1402, respectively. Any slight discrepancies in the two series are caused by the rounding of figures on the old classification.

Wages Inspectors

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many establishments or work places in Wales were inspected by wages inspectors in Wales in 1979 and 1984.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the following table:

Wales	1979	1984*
Establishments at which pay was checked by visit	2,097	1,249
Establishments at which pay was checked other than by visit†	485	401
	2,582	1,650

* Provisional.

† Since 1979, in addition to checks by visit, a number of other successful methods for checking the pay of workers have been developed. A detailed explanation of the inspectorate's methods of checking pay and the results in 1983 is given in pages 451 and 452 of the October issue of the "DE Gazette". A copy has been placed in the Library.

The figures for the number of establishments where pay was checked by methods not involving inspection visits include multiple firms whose head office is located in Wales whose branches are in other areas.

Wages Council Workers

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many complaints regarding illegal underpayment of workers covered by wages councils in Wales were received in 1979 and 1984.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The wages inspectorate in Wales received 610 complaints from workers in 1979 and 579 in 1984.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers in each of the past five years in establishments in Scotland covered by wages councils were found to be underpaid; and what arrears were assessed in each year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the following table:

Scotland	Workers found to have been underpaid	Arrears assessed
1980	3,860	303,103
1981	2,805	272,200
1982	1,965	226,264
1983	1,959	217,317
1984*	1,592	210,359

* Provisional.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many establishments were visited in Scotland by wages inspectors in each of the past five years; how many were found to be underpaying in each year; and if he will express those underpaying as a percentage of all those visited in each year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the following table:

	Scotland
	Establishments where pay was checked by visit	Establishments visited and found to be underpaying one or more workers	Proportion of establishments visited and found to underpaying one or more workers (see note below) percentage
1980	3,847	1,437	37·3
1981	2,443	1,085	44·4
1982	2,055	864	42·0
1983	2,939	914	31·1
*1984	2,773	845	30·5

* Provisional

Note:
These figures cannot be taken as an indication of the general level of compliance as the inspectorate tends to concentrate visits on establishments which are more likely to be underpaying.

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers in Scotland are currently covered by wages councils; what are the wage rates for each category of employment; how many instances of underpayment were discovered in 1984; and how many employers were prosecuted as a result.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of workers covered by wages councils in Scotland is not available.

I refer the hon. Member to my reply on wages rates to the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) on 4 March 1985 at column 364.

In 1984, 1,592 workers in 845 establishments in Scotland were found to have been underpaid. No employers were prosecuted.

Wages Inspectors (Scotland)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many wages inspectors were in post in Scotland in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the following table:

	Scotland
	Authorised posts for wages Inspectors	Wages Inspectors in post
1975	15	14
1976	15	14
1977	15	15
1978	15	13
1979	15	15

1981	13	10
1982	13	13
1983	13	13
1984	13	13

Wages Council Legislation (Prosecutions)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what were the fines imposed on conviction of those successfully prosecuted under wages council legislation in 1978, 1982 and 1983; and if he will give separate Scottish figures for each year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Fines totalling £1,574 in 1978, £1,425 in 1982 and £370 in 1983 were imposed by the courts for offences under the wages council legislation. There were no successful prosecutions in Scotland in these years.

Community Programme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, using the results of the second postal survey of community programme participants, and in respect of (a) the 18 to 24 years eligibility grouping and (b) the over-25 years eligibility group, he will indicate what percentage of (i) men and (ii) women were employed at the time of the follow-up survey; for each sub-group what percentage were former (I) full-time married-participants and (II) full-time single, widowed, separated or divorced participants; and for each given percentage if he will give the further breakdown according to the then current (x) full-time or (y) part-time employment status of former participants.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission carried out a second postal follow-up survey of community programme participants in November-December 1984. Full analysis of the results is not yet complete, but a report will be placed in the Library of the House as soon as it becomes available.

Unfair Dismissal

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the expected reduction in the number of unfair dismissal cases which will be referred to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service or come before industrial tribunals as a result of the extension of the qualification period for unfair dismissal claims against all employers to two years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the year to 31 December 1983, the latest period for which comprehensive statistics are currently available, 30,076 complaints of unfair dismissal to industrial tribunals were referred to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service. 10,381 proceeded to an industrial tribunal hearing. About one in four of the unfair dismissal applications received by the tribunals and referred to the service, and one in five of those requiring a tribunal hearing, were from employees with less than two years' qualifying service. There can of course be no certainty that this pattern would hold for any future period. It is intended that the extended qualifying period will apply only to employees starting work with a new employer on or after the date that the order implementing the change comes into force. The full effect of any reduction in caseloads will not therefore be felt until some two years after the coming into force of the order.

Disabled People

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the cost of Government training schemes and special employment measures for disabled people; what expenditure was incurred through the Manpower Services Commission; what was the average number of disabled people participating in the scheme for each year since 1972; and what is the estimated expenditure for 1984-85.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is set out in the table below. All the expenditure is administered by the Manpower Services Commission.

Year	Government training schemes					Government special employment measures for disabled people
	Number of disabled people completing training courses	Cost £m's	Number of disabled people entering the Youth Training Scheme	Cost £m's	New beneficiaries of special schemes (eg special aids adaptations etc.)	Cost £m's	Average number of disabled people in sheltered employment	Cost £m's	Number of disabled people participating in employment rehabilitation	Cost £m's

1984-85 estimate	3,600	N/A	5,150	8·6	4,415	2·4	15,600	78·9	13,500	17·1

Notes:

1. Figures include disabled participants in the Training Opportunities Scheme and in other training courses specifically for disabled people.
2. Separately identifiable costs for training disabled people are not available and cannot be obtained from a simple pro rata apportionment of the total because the cost of training courses specifically for disabled people tends to be higher than the average.
3. The figure for 1982-83 relates to an MSC estimate of participation on the Youth Opportunities Programme; estimates for earlier years are not available. Figures for subsequent years are collected from placings by the Carriers Service.
4. Costs for disabled people are not separately identifiable and have been attributed on a pro rata basis.
5. Information on special schemes is not available before 1977-78.
6. Participation is measured by the number of people leaving employment rehabilitation courses during the year. Prior to 1977-78 disabled people participating in employment rehabilitation were not separately identified.

Safety Representatives

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the number of trade union appointed safety representatives who were functioning within the terms of regulation 4 of the Safety Representatives and Safety Committees Regulations in each year from 1978 to 1984 and for each of the main industrial groupings in the standard industrial classification.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not available. A survey carried out by the Health and Safety Executive in 1979 indicated that around three quarters of employees in manufacturing and some other sectors were covered by safety representatives.

Workington

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state, when selecting Workington as a core travel-to-work area, what wards were (a) in stage 2 grouped to form job foci, (b) in stage 3 grouped round the foci and what foci were grouped together to form proto travel-to-work areas, (c) added to the proto travel-to-work areas in stage 4 and (d) in stage 5 allocated to the remaining area with which they had the closest community link.

Mr. Alan Clark: The review of travel-to-work areas conducted last year identified two job foci in the Workington travel-to-work area. These were

(i) the Aspatria ward of Allerdale, and
(ii) the Castle, Dalton, Netherhall, Northside, St. Michael's, Stainburn, and Westfield wards of Allerdale.

The next stage added the Ellen ward to the first of these areas and the wards of Moorclose, St. John's, and Seaton Moor to the second.

Stage four of the algorithm used in the review added Tarns ward to the first of these areas and the wards of Ellenborough, All Saints, Ewanrigg, Harrington, Salterbeck, Broughton, Flimby, St. Bridget's, Dearham, Clifton, and Crummock, together with the Distington ward of Copeland, to the second area.

The fifth stage resulted in the joining of these two areas to form the Workington travel-to-work area.

Carlisle

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state, when selecting Carlisle as a core travel-to-work area, which wards were (a) in stage 2 grouped to form job foci, (b) in stage 3 grouped round these foci and what foci were grouped together to form proto travel-to-work areas, (c) added to the proto travel-to-work areas in stage 4 and (d) in stage 5 allocated to the remaining area with which they had the closest community link.

Mr. Alan Clark: The review of travel-to-work areas conducted last year identified six job foci in the Carlisle travel-to-work area. These were:

(i) The Wigton ward of Allerdale
(ii) Wards 2, 6, 7 and 13 of Carlisle
(iii) Ward 12 of Carlisle
(iv) Ward 15 of Carlisle
(v) Ward 17 of Carlisle, and
(vi) Ward 18 of Carlisle.

The next stage resulted in four proto travel-to-work areas:

(i) Wampool and Wigton wards of Allerdale
(ii) Wards 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 13 of Carlisle
(iii) Warnell ward of Allerdale, Wards 1, 3, 4, 5, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19 and 20 of Carlisle and the Hesket ward of Eden, and
(iv) Ward 18 of Carlisle.

Stage four of the algorithm used in the review added wards to the first two of these areas; Waver and Boltons wards of Allerdale were added to the first area while Silloth and Marsh wards of Allerdale were added to the second area.

The reallocation in the fifth stage of the algorithm resulted in the Carlisle travel-to-work area which consists of the district of Carlisle plus the Boltons, Marsh, Silloth, Wampool, Warnell, Waver and Wigton wards of Allerdale.

Coventry (European Social Fund Projects)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many projects in Coventry are currently in receipt of European social fund money.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are 12 projects in Coventry currently receiving money from the European social fund. The grants total £1·7 million.

Job Sharing (Coventry)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in the Coventry travel-to-work area took advantage of the job sharing scheme in 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: Two jobs were split in the Coventry travel-to-work area in 1984 under the Government's job splitting scheme involving four people in part-time work.

Youth Unemployment (Coventry)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to combat youth unemployment in the Coventry travel-to-work area.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Our economic policies are designed to provide the conditions under which industry and commerce in Coventry and elsewhere can create sustainable jobs for young people and others. We are ensuring through our expansion of the youth training scheme and other measures that young people have constructive and worthwhile opportunities to help equip themselves for employment.

Construction Workers (Coventry)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the number of jobless construction workers in the Coventry travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on unemployment by industry has not been available at local level since May 1982 when there were 3,209 people in the old Coventry travel-to-work area registered as unemployed at job-centres, whose last employment had been in the construction industry.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people in the Coventry travel-to-work area are taking part in the youth training scheme; how many places have not been taken up; and how many left before their scheme was completed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information in respect of the Coventry travel-to-work area is not available. However, at the end of February there were 3,064 young people in training on the youth training scheme in the Coventry and Nuneaton local authority districts. Some 4,200 places under the scheme were approved in these districts in 1984-85. It is not possible to give a precise figure for the number of places not taken up, mainly because not all approved places will actually be available for occupation.

Between 1 April 1984 and the end of February 1985, 1,654 young people in Coventry and Nuneaton left the youth training scheme four weeks or more before the completion of their programme.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, for the latest available date, the percentage of recruitment into full-time employment by region, from (a) small and medium-sized companies currently involved in providing work experience places for the youth training scheme by region and (b) large-sized companies currently involved in providing work experience places for the youth training scheme by region.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on the destination of leavers from the youth training scheme analysed by size of company providing work experience and by region is not available.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, for the latest available date, the numbers of injuries to participants in the youth training scheme, reported by region.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is contained in the table:

*YouthTraining Scheme injuries 1 April 1983 to 31 December 1984

Region	Fatalities	Major Injuries(†)	Minor Injuries
Scotland	2	44	300
Northern	1	33	302

Region	Fatalities	Major Injuries(†)	Minor Injuries
Yorks and Humberside	—	24	193
North West	—	38	386
Midlands	1	47	400
Wales	—	22	202
South West	2	11	136
South East	1	19	159
London	—	5	45

* Manpower Services Commission accident figures for the Youth Training Scheme are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, Commission figures will include a number of accidents, in particular road traffic accidents during scheme time and accidents to trainees in educational establishments, which may not have been reportable to the Executive had the individuals been employed.

† Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurences Regulations 1980.

Health and Safety Executive (Pesticides)

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans his Department has to disclose the basis on which the Health and Safety Executive decides whether or not, in each case, to pursue a prosecution under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act when it has investigated a pesticide incident.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None

Deaf People

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has recently received about the employment prospects of young deaf people; and what was the nature of his replies.

Mr. Alan Clark: Towards the end of last year my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for the disabled brought to my attention and to the attention of other Ministers with appropriate responsibilities the British Deaf Association's report entitled "Deaf Discrimination". I wrote to the general secretary of the British Deaf Association on 9 January about the report's comments on the employment prospects of deaf people, including young deaf people. In my letter, I said that I accepted that deaf people should have full access to training programmes designed to help improve people's employment prospects and pointed out the special arrangements which had been made on the youth training scheme to meet the needs of young deaf and other disabled people.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what studies have been made by his Department of the difficulties facing young deaf school leavers seeking employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department has not initiated or participated in any study concerned specifically with young deaf people. I am aware of a report produced by the British Deaf Association, entitled "Deaf Discrimination", which among other things comments on the difficulties facing young deaf school leavers seeking employment or wishing to participate in the youth training scheme. I wrote to the general secretary of the British Deaf Association on 9 January about the comments made in the report and invited the association to bring any particular difficulties concerning the youth training scheme to the attention of the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number of deaf people who are unemployed; and what proportion of them is aged 16 to 19 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is not available.

Community Industry

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Employment how he envisages community industry developing alongside his plans for youth training and work experience.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government have already announced in the White Paper "Education and Training for Young People", Cmnd. 9482, that they will be keeping community industry under review.

Leicester

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number of people covered by the Leicester travel-to-work area; and how this compares with each of the past three years.

Mr. Alan Clark: Annual population estimates are not prepared for travel-to-work areas.

Electricity Regulations

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employees have (a) been cautioned and (b) been prosecuted, and with what result, for infringement of regulation 28 of the Electricity Regulations 1908 in each of the last five years to the nearest convenient date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No employees were prosecuted for infringement of regulation 28 of the Electricity Regulations 1908 during the period 1980-1984. Figures for cautions given are not kept centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employees have (a) been cautioned and (b) been prosecuted, and with what result, for infringement of the Electricity (Factories Act) Special Regulations 1908 and 1944 in each of the last five years to the nearest convenient date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The numbers of employees prosecuted for infringement of these regulations in the period 1980-84, and the results of these prosecutions, are as follows:

1980—No prosecutions
1981—3 prosecutions
£50 fine (£25 costs)
£50 fine (£25 costs)
£75 fine (£34 costs)
1982—No prosecutions
1983—No prosecutions
1984—1 prosecution;
£150 fine

Figures for cautions given are not kept centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Integrated Noise Meters

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many integrated noise meters the Health and Safety Executive now has.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Two hundred and sixty-seven.

TRANSPORT

Airline Competition Policy

7. Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the exchange of routes between British Airways and British Caledonian, set out in his 1984 White Paper on airline competition policy, to be completed.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Civil Aviation Authority has licenced the two airlines for all points involved in the route exchange. Services are now being operated by British Airways to South America and by British Caledonian to Saudi Arabia. British Airways will no doubt serve the other points involved in the exchange when it judges them to be commercially attractive.

Air Service Agreements

11. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he is making towards agreeing more liberal bilateral air service agreements with other European countries.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We have negotiated liberal air services arrangements with the Netherlands, Germany and Luxembourg. We are making a major effort, in the Community and bilaterally, to build on these successes. Meetings with France, Italy and Switzerland are planned.

Bus Services (Deregulation)

13. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any further representations regarding the deregulation of bus services and the safety of the public.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since the publication of the Transport Bill at the end of January, we have received around 800 letters and a number of petitions about various aspects of the policy, including the implications for safety.

Channel Link

16. Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the French Minister of Transport to discuss the criteria for the construction and financing of a fixed Channel link.

15. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet agreed with his French counterpart about the conditions to be followed by developers of a Channel link.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary met the French Ministers on 20 March and reached agreement on the guidelines for promoters which were issued on 2 April.

Motorways (Speed Limits)

17. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now consider increasing the maximum speed limit applicable to motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall be responding shortly to the Transport Committee's recommendation on this matter.

Trains (Punctuality)

18. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise the subject of the percentage of trains which ran late in 1984.

Mr. David Mitchell: At their regular meetings, my right hon. Friend and the chairman of British Rail have discussed train punctuality and the chairman has described the measures the board is taking to achieve the punctuality standards the board has set.

Aircraft Accident Reports

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that aircraft accident reports are completed more quickly than the time taken in relation to the helicopter crashes off the Scilly Isles on 16 July 1983 and at Aberdeen airport on 4 July 1983.

Mr. Michael Spicer: An aircraft accident which is the subject of a formal inspector's investigation involves a most detailed investigation of all aspects of the accident. This invariably takes time, particularly if any tests or research are required. In addition, there is a lengthy and comprehensive statutory procedure to be followed in which the various parties to the investigation are invited to make representations. This procedure can be more prolonged for example if a foreign manufacturer is involved.

It must be stressed that immediate action is taken if during an investigation any evidence is unearthed which has safety connotations. There is no question of having to wait for the report to be published before disseminating safety information. It is important that the maximum value is obtained from an accident investigation so that further accidents can be prevented. It is considered that the present procedures strike a reasonable balance between the need for a detailed technical investigation and the time taken to publish the report.

Helicopter Safety

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that the crew of commercial helicopters will be required at all times whilst on board to wear lifejackets incorporating dual frequency (121.5 and 243 Mhz) personal locater beacons, in line with the safety recommendations of the inspector's aircraft accident report 8/84 on the accident involving British Airways' helicopter S-6IN, G-BEON, in the sea near the Isles of Scilly.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall answer this question shortly.

Goods Vehicles (Operators' Licences)

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the Council on Tribunals about the procedures governing public inquiries into goods vehicle operators' licence applications since the introduction of environmental considerations as factors to be taken into account in such inquiries; and if he will place copies of those representations in the Library.

Mrs. Chalker: The only communication we have received since the environmental provisions came into effect has been an informal enquiry as to whether we propose to issue guidance notes to persons making representations at public inquiries. We will be seeking the views of the licensing authorities on this suggestion.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport which inquiry procedure rules are applicable to public inquiries into goods vehicle operators' licence applications held under the Transport Acts 1968 and 1982; whether the rules of natural justice apply at such public inquiries; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the non-statutory guidelines on procedure used by licensing authorities at such public inquiries.

Mrs. Chalker: There are no specific inquiry procedure rules or non-statutory guidelines issued by the Department for goods vehicle operator licensing inquiries held under the Transport Acts 1968 and 1982. The licensing authorities are bound by Regulations 17, 18, 19 and 20 of the Goods Vehicle (Operators' Licences, Qualifications and Fees) Regulations 1984 which are relevant to the rights of appearance at the public inquiry; the conduct of the inquiry is also governed by regulation 23 of the same regulations. Beyond this the procedure is a matter for the licensing authority. The rules of natural justice apply to such inquiries.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Transport if persons representing parties at inquiries into goods vehicle operators' licence applications may call expert witnesses to support their case on environmental factors.

Mrs. Chalker: Yes.

Airedale Route

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether, during the recent consultation exercise relating to the Airedale route to the east of Bingley, he took steps to consult interested parties other than those living in the immediate vicinity of Saltaire, Shipley and Bingley and the appropriate local authorities.

Mrs. Chalker: Wide media coverage was given to the exhibition of alternative routes. I took account of all representations received including those forwarded by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller).

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what account he took of accident casualty rates on the A650 trunk road between Cottingley Bar and Fox Corner, Shipley, before reaffirming the decision to terminate the Airedale route at Cottingley Bar.

Mrs. Chalker: Accident rates are one of a number of important matters taken into account in the choice of a route.

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what effect he expects the decision to terminate the A650 Airedale route at Cottingley Bar will have on projected traffic levels on the proposed Shipley eastern bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: The choice of route to the east of Bingley is unlikely to have any significant effect on the amount of the forecast traffic on the Shipley eastern bypass southwards from the point where traffic from the Airedale route will join it. North of that point the traffic level is expected to be about half of the amount on the southern part of the bypass.

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, for the past five years, he will provide comparative accident casualty statistics showing (a) deaths, (b) serious injuries and (c) minor injuries for the section of the A650 trunk road between Cottingley Bar and Fox Corner, Shipley, and for convenient equivalent sections between Kildwick and Cottingley Bar.

Mrs. Chalker: The following is the information available. 1984 figures are not yet to hand.

Section	Length (kilometres)	Number of accidents 1980				1981				1982				1983
		FA	SER	SL	T	FA	SER	SL	T	FA	SER	SL	T	FA	SER	SL	T

Note: FA = Fatal SER = Serious SL = Slight T = Total

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current daily traffic flow on the A650 trunk road between Bingley and Cottingley Bar and the forecast daily traffic flow on the proposed Airedale route between the same points.

Mrs. Chalker: The current daily traffic flow on the A650 between Bingley and Cottingley Bar is about 31,000 vehicles per day. The traffic flow on the proposed Airedale route between the same points in the design year 2001 is expected to be about 35,000 vehicles per day.

Vehicle Taxation and Road Costs

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated loss to public funds for last year and the current year of tax concessions on business cars and for heavy lorries (a) the money raised by excise duty and (b) the estimated value of the damage, wear and tear on roads.

Mrs. Chalker: None. Business cars pay the same rates of excise duty (fuel duty and VED) as other cars. Both cars and heavy lorries pay substantially more in duty than their shares of road track costs (which cover road construction as well as maintainence).

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many rear seat passengers have died in vehicle accidents since September 1983; how many have suffered serious injury or slight injury during the same period; and whether the relative proportion of fatal and serious injuries between seat belt wearers and non-wearers since that date has altered.

Mrs. Chalker: From October 1983 to September 1984 the number of rear seat passenger casualties were as follows:

Rear seat car passenger casualties
1 October 1983 to 30 September 1984

	Number
Fatal	368
Serious	4,476
Slight	20,040

The proportion of fatal and serious injuries between seat belt wearers and non-wearers is as follows:

	1 October 1982 to 30 September 1983 Per cent.	1 October 1983 to 30 September 1984 Per cent.
Wearing belt	2·6	3·5
Not wearing belt	83·6	83·9
Not recorded	13·8	12·6
Total	100·0	100·0
(Number)	(4,685)	(4,844)

Coach Services

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the working party he has set up to deal with matters relating to coaches and coach operators in London; what liaison there is between the working party and the Greater London council, the London boroughs and other interested organisations; and if he is satisfied his Department has access to all information required and the working party the necessary expertise to act upon it.

Mrs. Chalker: I have asked for a report by officials drawing together the information currently available within the Department. Among the issues under consideration are whether this information is sufficient and what consultation will be desirable in the future stages of policy development. I will make further statements as appropriate.

Seat Belts

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many lives were estimated to have been saved since the introduction of the compulsory wearing of seat belts; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if any evidence is available to him indicating an increase in the number of casualties and deaths of pedestrians and cyclists since the introduction of the compulsory wearing of seat belts; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: From February 1983 to September 1984, the 20 months immediately following the introduction of compulsory wearing of seat belts, there were 421 (18 per cent.) fewer car driver deaths and 235 (20 per cent.) fewer front seat passenger deaths than in the corresponding 20 months before compulsion.

The number of car drivers and front and rear seat car passengers who were killed or seriously injured over the same period fell by 11,110 (19 per cent.); whereas the numbers of pedestrians and pedal cyclists who were killed or seriously injured by cars increased by 1,129 (5 per cent.) and by 1,223 (19 per cent.) respectively.

Overall, the number of fatal and serious injuries to car occupants and to pedestrians, pedal cyclists, and motor-cyclists who were hit by cars fell by 10,702 (10 per cent.). This included a reduction of 453 (7 per cent.) deaths.

My Department will be issuing a paper later this year analysing the changes since seat belt wearing became compulsory.

Okehampton Bypass

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect of the recent decision of the joint committee on the Okehampton bypass special procedure orders on the timetable for the provision of the A30, Okehampton, bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I am considering the implications of the Joint Committee's report, and have no statement to make at this stage.

Roads (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what factors were considered in his decision not to make the extra 65 miles of London roads, proposed to be trunked, the responsibility of the appropriate borough councils as with designated roads.

Mrs. Chalker [pursuant to the reply, 4 April 1985; c. 740]: As key routes serving an area wide purpose, it is appropriate that these should be the Secretary of State's responsibility.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Dogs

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the effect of the Dogs (Northern Ireland) Order 1983 in controlling dogs.

Dr. Boyson: The main provisions of the Dogs (Northern Ireland) Order 1983 were brought into operation on 19 December 1983 and their impact on the exceptional problems caused by stray dogs in the Province has been most encouraging.

In the year to 31 December 1984, district councils issued licences in respect of some 86,600 dogs; under previous legislation some 46,650 licences were issued in 1982, and some 58,400 in 1983 (when there was public awareness of the imminence of the new regulations), 12 guard dog kennels and 519 breeding establishments were registered.

Some 8,300 stray dogs were impounded, of which 810 were sold 1,650 were reclaimed and 5,820 had to be humanely destroyed; in addition, some 1,340 stray dogs were returned directly to their owners with a warning or a fixed penalty. Some 2,170 dogs were collected by councils from owners who no longer wished to keep them, of which some 160 were sold and 2,010 were destroyed.

Councils received some 6,830 complaints, relating to straying, attacks on people and livestock, uncontrolled dogs, fouling and unlicensed dogs. Most were dealt with through advice and warnings, but some 360 fixed penalties were imposed, and 43 prosecutions were undertaken in respect of serious offences resulting in 39 convictions; a further 156 cases were under consideration with a view to prosecution.

Birth Statistics

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the mean birthweight and standard deviation for (a) total births, (b) live births and (c) stillbirths in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

Grams

Year	Total births		Live births		Still births
	Mean birth weight	Standard deviation	Mean birth weight	Standard deviation	Mean birth weight	Standard deviation
1980	3,357	600	3,368	580	2,161	1,261
1981	3,349	588	3,360	572	2,090	982
1982	3,358	583	3,368	568	2,081	1,015
1983	3,373	584	3,382	569	2,053	996

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the mean birthweight and standard deviation for (a) total births and (b) live births in 1983 and 1984, respectively, for each area health board in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information for 1983 is as follows. Final figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Grams

Health and Social Services Board	Total births		Live births
	Mean birth weight	Standard deviation	Mean birth weight	Standard deviation
Eastern	3,365	584	3,374	569
Northern	3,371	587	3,382	572
Southern	3,391	561	3,400	545
Western	3,371	600	3,379	586
Northern Ireland	3,373	584	3,382	569

Driving Licences

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how long it now takes to process an application for a provisional driving licence in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: Eleven working days normally.

Remanded Prisoners (Counsel)

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to enable prisoners on remand to have access to counsel of their choice.

Mr. Scott: Prisoners in custody on remand are allowed reasonable access to solicitors and counsel of their choice, provided these are available.

Housing Executive (Modernisation Schemes)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the total amount of money spent by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive on modernisation schemes each year since 1980 in (a) Newry and Mourne district council area and (b) in Armagh District Council area.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 4 April 1985, c. 730]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive; however, I understand from the chairman that total capital expenditure on modernisation schemes was as follows:

Year	Armagh	Newry & Mourne
	£	£
1979-80	293,458	409,122
1980-81	210,442	369,952
1981-82	830,556	671,551
1982-83	2,099,286	2,565,250
1983-84	585,284	1,353,339
1984-85	1,434,139	2,047,996

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the proposed expenditure by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive on modernisation schemes during 1985-86 in (a) Newry and Mourne district council area and (b) Armagh district council area.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 4 April 1985, c. 730]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. However, I understand from the chairman that it is estimated capital expenditure on modernisation schemes will be as follows:

Armagh	1,311,039
Newry and Mourne	2,772,575

Housing Executive (Contracts)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many contracts advertised by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive during the financial year 1983-84 were cancelled after tenders were received, and if he will list them;

(2) how many contracts advertised by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive during the financial year 1984-85 were cancelled after tenders had been received; and if he will list them.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 4 April 1985, c. 730]: I am advised by the chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that the information is as follows:

1983-84

One: re-roofing, Unity Flats, Belfast (work deferred for inclusion in overall improvement scheme).

1984-85

Nil (to date).

SCOTLAND

Birth Statistics

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will give the mean birthweight and standard deviation for (a) total births, (b) live births and (c) still births in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 respectively, in Scotland;

(2) if he will give the mean birthweight and standard deviation for (a) total births and (b) live births in 1983 and 1984, respectively, for each health board in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Information is given in the tables. Figures for 1983 are provisional and those for 1984 not yet available.

Development Projects (Funding)

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will provide additional funding for development projects for unemployed adults in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Substantial Government funds are spent on special employment measures, operated through the Manpower Services Commission in Scotland, including about £76 million on the community programme in 1984-85. The measures, and their funding requirements, are kept under review and as announced in the Budget speech the community programme is to be expanded in 1985-86 by 100,000 places in Great Britain. Scotland can expect to derive its full share of these extra places. A sum of £10 million is also being made available to fund pilot projects in Great Britain to explore, on an experimental basis, further ways of helping the long-term unemployed.

Quangos

Sir Philip Holland asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in the 12 months to 31 March the Advisory Committee on Medical Establishments submitted advice to his Department; and what action was taken by his Department on each occasion as a result of the advice given.

Mr. John MacKay: The committee met three times during the year. On each occasion its advice was accepted by the Scottish Home and Health Department and reflected in decisions conveyed to health boards on control of medical manpower at training and career levels.

Sir Philip Holland asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in the 12 months to 31 March the Advisory Committee on Scotland's Travelling People submitted advice to his Department; and what action was taken by his Department on each occasion as a result of the advice given.

Mr. Ancram: On three occasions. The committee submitted, in June 1984, a report on the number of pitches required at regional or sub-regional level to provide a full network of sites for travelling people in Scotland and a report on a modification to the Government's policy of toleration and non-harassment which links this policy to pitch targets, and, in March 1985, a report on the number of pitches required at district level.

My right hon. Friend has accepted the committee's advice on each occasion. Departmental circulars conveying his decisions in the light of the Committee's recommendations were issued to local authorities on 8 November 1984 and 10 April 1985.

Sir Philip Holland asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in the 12 months to 31 March the Hill Farming Advisory Committee for Scotland submitted advice to his Department; and what action was taken by his Department on each occasion as a result of the advice given.

Mr. John MacKay: The committee, through discussion at its two meetings last year chaired by a senior official of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, tendered advice on a number of general and specific matters relating to hill farming including the interaction between farming and forestry, the re-definition of the less-favoured areas, the administration of hill livestock compensatory allowances, and the sheep and beef support schemes.

The views expressed by members are being taken into account in the administration of the Government's agricultural policy towards the hills and uplands of Scotland.

Fishery Protection Service

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to increase the fishery protection service in Scottish waters in advance or upon the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Community.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend is of the opinion that the resources available to the fishery protection service in Scottish waters are sufficient for it to be able to fulfil its tasks following the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Community. We shall, however, keep the matter under review.

Peterhead Prison

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many prison officers are employed at Peterhead prison; and what are the average weekly hours undertaken by the officers.

Mr. Ancram: The number of members of the prison officer grade employed at Peterhead prison on 1 April 1985 was 226. They are conditioned to a 40-hour week and over the period 6 January to 2 March 1985 they worked an average of 11 hours overtime per week per officer.

Teachers

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the impact which the present teachers' dispute is having on the education of pupils in Scottish schools.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In the period from 15 January to the beginning of the Easter holidays 5·22 million pupil hours out of a possible total of 125·5 million have been lost in Scotland as a result of the teachers' industrial action. Selective strikes have affected all regions in Scotland but the action has been concentrated on certain schools in the constituencies of Ministers and Conservative MPs. The pupils in these schools have been seriously affected.

The teachers' unions' boycott of curricular development work has led to postponement for one year of the introduction of phases 2 and 3 of standard grade, planned to begin August 1985. Also while Standard grade courses in phase 1 which have already started (English, mathematics, science and social and vocational skills) will continue for first examination in 1986, Ordinary grade examinations in English, mathematics and arithmetic will also be retained in 1986 as an emergency measure for pupils who in the light of the teachers action cannot fairly be assessed on the basis of standard grade. We expect schools to continue teaching standard grade wherever possible.

The 1985 SCE examinations are taking place as planned. The threatened disruption of procedures was countered by the Scottish Examination Board's contingency arrangements; and the Educational Institute of Scotland has advised teachers after all to co-operate with the holding of practical examinations, and the submission of project work and internally assessed marks. The board cannot make allowance in marking for loss of teaching time resulting from the dispute but it will be taken into account as grounds for appeal, and appeals can be made on the basis of available evidence for A and B band awards as well as simply against failure.

I am extremely concerned about the effects of the dispute and I expect education authorities to do everything possible to limit the damage and inconvenience caused to pupils and their parents. The Scottish Education Department has written to authorities asking for a report on the action being taken, particularly for pupils who are to sit examinations this year and next. We have suggested various steps which could be considered such as opening schools during the holidays and providing financial assistance to enable pupils to receive private tutorial help.

In addition, we have asked authorities to take account of such powers as they may have to suspend employees who refuse to work normally, to deduct pay in respect of work not performed and to dismiss employees and offer re-employment under new contracts. Authorities may also wish to consider taking legal action against any of the teachers' unions, on the basis that the union may be acting unlawfully in causing the authority to breach its statutory duty to provide adequate and efficient school education.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set up a committee to undertake a complete review of the educational system in Scotland covering pupil education and supervision, teachers' conditions of service and pay structure, teacher grading according to ability and qualifications, shortages of teachers in engineering, maths, science and technological subjects, and other related matters.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I do not consider that this is necessary. The Scottish Education Department, with the relevant statutory and advisory bodies and the education authorities as appropriate, keeps the various aspects of the educational system in Scotland under close review.

Fisheries Agreement

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied that the agreement reached between the European Commission and Spain and Portugal will properly safeguard the interests of the Scottish fishing fleet in all waters where the fleet at present operates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend is satisfied that the terms on which Spain and Portugal are to join the European Community safeguard the interests of the Scottish fishing fleet. I would refer my hon. Friend to the statement given to the House by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 2 April.

Housing Defects Act

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why the issuing of the pamphlet to district councils on the operation of the Housing Defects Act has been delayed; and if he will make it his policy to ensure that this pamphlet will be issued without further delay.

Mr. Ancram: The issue to local authorities of the booklet for private owners has been held up largely because of the delay in reaching agreement on the arrangements required to enable building societies to accept repaired PRC houses as being suitable for a loan on their security. Copies of the booklet will be sent to local authorities within the next few weeks.

DEFENCE

School of Music, Deal

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the decision was taken to site the new defence school of music at Deal.

Mr. Lee: 2 July 1984.

Peace Chapel, Molesworth

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence with whom his Department is going to consult over the future of the peace chapel at Molesworth.

Mr. Lee: The partial structure referred to is not a chapel in the recognised sense since we understand it has never been awarded any formal religious status. Furthermore, it was erected without either the permission of the owner of the land or planning consent. Consultations over its future are taking place with the relevant bodies. The details must remain confidential.

Service Records (Pension Calculations)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether all service records held on computers for the purpose of pension calculation are now accurate.

Mr. Lee: Every effort is made to ensure the accuracy of all service records. There is no evidence of any general defect in the systems in use.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what errors have been identified resulting from the computerising of Royal Navy and Royal Marine personal records which have led to wrong awards being made to pensioners when reaching the age of 55 years; what steps he is taking to remedy the situation for future pensioners in all services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Sixteen cases have been identified where Royal Navy ratings and Royal Marine other ranks have reached age 55 and the wrong increase has been paid. Of these seven were underpayments. Pensioners in all these cases are not receiving the correct award and arrears of pension have been paid. Steps have been taken to ensure that similar errors do not recur. The errors arose mainly from wrong information being passed to the Paymaster General's office. They did not arise from the computerisation of personal records as such.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what errors have been identified in the awarding of Royal Air Force and Army pensions since personal records have been computerised; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: There is no evidence of error in the awarding of RAF and Army pensions arising from the computerisation of personal records.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give an assurance that following the decision to transfer Royal Navy and Royal Marine pensions from the Director General of Defence Accounts, Worcester, to HMS Centurion, no action will be taken to transfer the work and personal files until all individual pension rights have been checked.

Mr. Lee: No. The transfer of responsibility will proceed as planned. Appropriate arrangements will be made at the time for any checking that remains to be done.

Service Pensioners

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy that in all cases where Service pensioners have been found to be underpaid, interest will automatically be paid when additional sums are due.

Mr. Lee: No. Payment of interest may, however, be considered where an underpayment of pension is of a substantial amount, where it arose from departmental error, and where the period of underpayment is protracted. The amount of interest would be equal to that which would have been paid had the underpayment been invested in a building society ordinary account at the relevant time.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total sum so far returned to service pensioners as a result of errors arising from the computerisation of pension records; what was the highest, lowest and average award made; and what is the continuing cost each year.

Mr. Lee Pensions errors are corrected when detected and no separate record is maintained. However, from the available information since 1 April 1983 £188,372 was returned to service pensioners as arrears of pension previousy underpaid. The highest individual sum was £8,208; the lowest £8; and the average sum of arrears £1,265. These figures relate to the correction of all underpayments irrespective of their cause. They were in the main clerical errors and do not point to any general defect in the systems in use. During this period the sum of money paid out as servicemens' pensions, not including lump sums, exceeded £1,000 million pounds.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his response to the offer by the United States of America of participation by North Atlantic Treaty Organisation countries in the research programme for the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Butler: The Government are now considering a response to the formal invitation from the US Secretary of Defence to indicate areas of research in which the United Kingdom would be interested in participating.

RAF Molesworth

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many days repair work has been necessary to (a) the outer fence and (b) the inner fence at RAF Molesworth since the day of the erection of an outer perimeter fence.

Mr. Lee: There have been a number of minor instances of fence cutting at RAF Molesworth on both the outer barbed wire fence, and the inner permanent weld mesh fence. None of these incidents has been of any security significance, and work on the site has progressed normally and has not been impaired in any way.

RAF Aircraft (Accident Information)

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take steps to require that information about accidents involving Royal Air Force aircraft is passed on to the original manufacturers, civil airworthiness authorities and thence to commercial users of similar aircraft, in view of the findings of the report of the crash of the Bristow Tiger helicopter G-TIGP at Aberdeen airport on 4 July 1983.

Mr. Butler: There are well established procedures which ensure that all necessary information about accidents involving Royal Air Force aircraft is passed to the design authority for the aircraft type, normally the manufacturer. If at the time there are similar aircraft listed on the British Civil Register the information is also passed to the Civil Aviation Authority to enable them to advise civil operators.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Lobbyists

Mr. Alton asked the Lord Privy Seal if he has any plans to bring forward proposals to regulate the activities of parliamentary lobbyists in relation to Select Committees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have nothing to add to my reply to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) in the course of business questions on 4 April at column 1350.

Select Committees (Overseas Trips)

Mr. Alton asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission (1) what is the policy of the Commission towards the involvement of private outside sources of finance in the financing of overseas trips by Select Committees;

(2) what criteria the Commission has laid down for the financing of overseas trips by Select Committees of the House of Commons.

Mr. Beith: The Commission has responsibility for determining the annual amount to be included in the Vote for House of Commons administration on account of Select Committee overseas travel. Subject to guidelines concerning matters such as the class of travel to be used, responsibility for detailed decisions on the use and apportionment of this total sum has been devolved to the Liason Committee. The guidelines do not address the issue of private financing; but I understand that the Liaison Committee in the last Parliament agreed on one occasion that it was not appropriate for a Select Committee to accept an offer of facilities or finance for overseas travel from private sources.

Members' Travel

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Lord Privy Seal, further to his answer of 3 April to the hon. Member for Workington, if he will explain the reasons for the increase in the amount of money allocated for hon. Members' travel, by air, within the United Kingdom between 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Biffen: Estimate provision for Members' travel within the United Kingdom by air, rail or car, cannot be determined precisely since the costs are demand related. The reasons for the increase in the provision for Members' travel by air in the United Kingdom between 1983-84 and 1984-85 are as follows:

(a) 1983-84 was a general election year and travel facilities for Members were withdrawn during the dissolution period, resulting in a reduction in total travel costs by comparison with expenditure which would otherwise have been incurred in a full year;

(b) a general upward trend in the use of air travel by Members;

(c) an increase in the cost of air travel.

Debates

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Lord Privy Seal what was the average number of debates on orders, regulations and other statutory instruments per week in the current and in each of the previous 10 Sessions of Parliament.

Mr. Biffen: The average number of debates in the House each week relating to statutory instruments and measures for the current Session and each of the previous ten Sessions was as follows:

Year	Number of weeks	Number of debates	Average
1984-85	19	48	2·53
1983-84	42	105	2·50
1982-83	23	51	2·22
1981-82	35	73	2·09
1980-81	33	76	2·30
1979-80	49	109	2·22
1978-79	17	29	1·71
1977-78	33	56	1·70
1976-77	30	59	1·97
1975-76	38	79	2·08
1974-75	40	66	1·65

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will take steps to arrange debates on groups of statutory instruments requiring debate on occasional days at the commencement of public business instead of after 10 pm; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: There are a great many demands on parliamentary time which must be taken into consideration when arranging debates. My hon. Friend will however wish to know that so far this Session there have been six occasions on which statutory instruments were taken as the first item of public business.

Adjournment Times

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Lord Privy Seal what has been the average time at which the House has adjourned on Mondays to Thursdays in the current Session of Parliament to date.

Mr. Biffen: The average time at which the House rose on Mondays to Thursdays in the present Session, to Wednesday 3 April, was 12.52 am.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Lord Privy Seal on how many sitting days, excluding Fridays, the House has adjourned at 10.30 pm in the Session to date.

Mr. Biffen: The House has adjourned at 10.30 pm on one day this Session.

Business of the House

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will estimate the savings to public funds which would accrue if no business was dealt with after 10 pm; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: No. The assumptions on which such an estimate would have to be based would inevitably be hypothetical and unreliable. For information about the identifiable costs of late night sittings I refer my hon. Friend to answers given recently to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 21 March at columns 575-6, and 22 March at columns 639-640.

Norman Porch

Mr. Burt asked the Lord Privy Seal why the door to the Norman porch was not opened to visitors wishing to follow the line of route until 3.40 pm on 29 March instead of 3 pm.

Mr. Biffen: There was a delay in opening the Norman porch entrance on the afternoon of Friday 29 March because of a problem with the redeployment of staff. Steps have been taken to ensure against any recurrence.

Mr. Burt asked the Lord Privy Seal whether he is satisfied with the arrangements at the Norman porch for the entry of visitors to the line of route through the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Biffen: The arrangements for the administration of the line of route are currently under review by the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee of the Services Committee.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Population Statistics

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people, showing men and women separately, he forecasts will be retiring at normal retirement age in each of the next five years.

Mr. Whitney: The Government do not forecast the number of people who will be retiring in future years; not all men and women give up employment at the minimum pensionable age of 65 for men and 60 for women and awards of retirement pension are made to people who have been receiving another benefit as well as to people who have retired. Estimates are, however, made of the number of men and women who will reach minimum pensionable age and be awarded retirement pension in future years as follows:

Great Britain

Year	Men '000s	Women '000s*
1985-86	270	190
1986-87	255	190
1987-88	245	185
1988-89	230	180
1989-90	230	180

* Including married women receiving pension on their husband's contributions

Industrial Injuries Scheme

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the number of appeals and references decided under the industrial injuries scheme by each of the medical appeals tribunals in England and Wales, listed separately, for the last three years for which figures are available;

(2) what was the number of appeals and references decided favourably to the claimant in the last three years for which figures are available by each of the medical appeal tribunals in England and Wales, both in absolute terms and as a percentage of those submitted; what was the number decided unfavourably to the claimant both in absolute terms and as a percentage; and what was the number of unchanged decisions both in absolute terms and as a percentage;

(3) what was the number of appeals and references decided by each of the medical appeal tribunals for England and Wales, listed separately, for mobility allowance for the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: I regret that information is not available in the form requested. The tables show figures for the industrial injuries scheme in each region in England and Wales and for mobility allowance for Great Britain as a whole.

1. Industrial Injuries Scheme

Under this scheme, a decision which is unfavourable to the claimant does not necessarily mean that benefit entitlement is extinguished.
